SHAW, J. The plaintiff, Half Moon Bay Land Company, the defendants Cowell et al., who are appellants, and the defendant Torello, each own separate tracts of land through which runs a stream of water known as San Vicente creek. The plaintiff Quilici is a tenant of the plaintiff land company, and some of the appellants are tenants of the Cowells and the Cowell estate, who are the owners of the tract of land referred to as owned by the appellants. The object of the action was to ascertain the amount of water of the stream that each owner was entitled to under his riparian rights and to apportion to each the proper amount for use on his riparian lands and to enjoin each of the defendants from diverting more than his reasonable share of the water. It appears that the plaintiff's parcel of land contains 108 acres, that the land of the appellants contains 195.96 acres, and that of the defendant Torello 714.22 acres. The land of the defendant Torello lies highest on the stream; next comes that of the appellants, and below that is the land of the plaintiff Half Moon Bay Land Company. A considerable portion of the land lies on steep hillsides. The court made findings that 66 acres of the plaintiff's land is suitable for profitable irrigation and is riparian to said creek; that a portion of the land of the appellants is not within the watershed contributing to said creek, and that of the land within the legal watershed of the stream only 34.25 acres was capable of profitable irrigation from the creek; and that of the land of the defendant Torello only 96 acres could be profitably and advantageously irrigated from said stream. It further found that one miners' inch of water continuous flow during the irrigation season was sufficient to irrigate 10 acres of land; that 8 miners' inches would be sufficient to irrigate the said 66 acres of the plaintiff; that $4\frac{1}{2}$ miners' inches would sufficiently irrigate the land of the appellants susceptible of irrigation from the stream; and that $10\frac{1}{2}$ miners' inches would sufficiently irrigate the lands of the defendant Torello found to be susceptible of irrigation. The appellants claim a prescriptive right to a portion of the water by use upon a part of their lands situated beyond the ridge which divides the land sloping to San Vicente creek from the land sloping to an adjoining stream known as Dennison creek. The court found that this claim was without foundation, because the use of the water of San Vicente creek on said land was not adverse, but was permissive so far as plaintiff and their predecessors in interest were concerned.

Thereupon, it was adjudged that plaintiff is entitled to a continuous flow of 8 miners' inches for irrigation of its riparian land; that the appellants are entitled to a continuous flow of $4\frac{1}{2}$ miners' inches of water for irrigation of their riparian land; and that Torello is entitled to a continuous flow of $10\frac{1}{2}$ miners' inches of water for the irrigation of his riparian land; that if at any time there is less water flowing in the creek than the aggregate amounts allotted to the several parties then each should take less in the same proportion; that when more water is flowing than the aggregate of the amounts allotted and any additional area of land belonging to the appellants or to the defendant Torello within the watershed of the creek should prove to be capable of profitable irrigation, said appellants, or said Torello, should be allowed to use on such additional land the additional water therein in excess of the amount allotted by the judgment and in proportion to the amount of additional land so capable of profitable irrigation. It is further adjudged that the appellants have no right to divert water from said creek to non-riparian lands, and they are enjoined from so doing. It is also provided that nothing in the judgment should prevent the appellants or Torello from using more water on their riparian lands when the plaintiff or other lower proprietors do not object thereto. Other provisions were inserted which are not necessary here to mention. The defendants, other than Torello, appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The first point urged in support of the appeal is that the court erred in determining that more than 9.61 acres of the irrigable land of the plaintiff is riparian to the creek and entitled to water therefrom as riparian land. The first reason advanced for this claim is that before this action was begun one Quilici, from whom the plaintiff derived title, had conveyed in fee to the Ocean Shore Railway Company a strip of land 60 feet in width extending through the tract and cutting off all except 9.61 acres from access to said creek. This, it is said, cut off access to the stream from the remainder of the tract, and deprived the land so separated of riparian rights therein. The answer is that the railroad right of way does not cut off that part of the land from the stream. The creek runs under the railroad, through the strip deeded for railroad purposes, and through the part of the tract lying westerly of the railroad. This is sufficient to give all that part of the tract the character of riparian land, and entitles the owner to the use of the water from said stream thereon. It is unnecessary to determine whether or not a conveyance of land to a railroad for a right of way would cut off riparian rights from land thereby wholly severed from the stream. A further claim is made because, as appellants say, the slope of the abutting land of the plaintiff would carry water away from the stream, and that upon the principles laid down in Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158, and Anaheim, etc., Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 327, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, it is not riparian, and the owner thereof is not entitled, as a riparian owner, to the use of water of the stream upon said land. The topographical character of the land involved in these two cases was so different from that of the land here involved that the decisions cannot be said to have any application. This 66 acres of the plaintiff's land lies in the flat territory bordering upon the ocean near the outlet of the creek. It can scarcely be said to have any grade or slope. The proof indicates that its general slope is toward the ocean, and from a fourth to a half of 1 per cent. from horizontal. In delta land situated at the lower end of a stream, the water in the bed of the stream is often higher than the adjacent land, and that was the situation in the case at bar. This occurs to land properly within the watershed and from natural causes. The torrential flow from the steeper grades carries the debris down to the flat land, where it is deposited, raising the bed above the level of the land adjoining. It would be an extremely unwise and unjust adherence to a supposed rule to declare that land thus made to slope away from the stream, is thereby deprived of the riparian character and rights. In Bathgate v. Irvine the water was taken out of the creek and carried around the nose of a ridge separating the watershed of that creek from that of another stream, and for use upon land situated in a different valley some miles away. In the Anaheim Union Water Company Case the water was taken from the Santa Ana river over an intervening elevation to be used upon land sloping away from the river and into another and distinct stream, the only connection between the two watersheds being that the last-mentioned stream entered the Santa Ana river a considerable distance below the land upon which the water was to be used. None of the reasons existing there and given as the foundation of the rule exist in this case. In such a case, "When the reason of a rule ceases, so should the rule itself." Civ. Code, § 3510. The above decisions have no just analogy to the case at bar, and the rule there applied cannot be applied here.

[3, 4] The finding that the water diverted by the appellants from the stream and carried from the watershed to lands sloping toward Dennison creek was permissive is sustained by sufficient evidence. The court may reasonably have inferred from all the evidence that the discussions of the parties on this subject were nothing more than efforts to accommodate all parties concerned without controversy, rather than the assertion of a right by one party and a yielding thereto by the other. The evidence at best is conflicting on the subject, and it would serve no useful purpose to discuss it further. The finding to that effect is conclusive here. The use being permissive, no right to continue it would accrue from long continued use.

[5, 6] The appellants further claim that the apportionment of the water made by the court does not give them a reasonable share. The court did not attempt to apportion the entire quantity of water that might, at any time, be flowing in the stream. The apportionment was made of the respective shares of the parties at a time when the stream had a flow of only 23 miners' inches. The year which gave rise to this suit was the driest that had been known for many years, and the apportionment included no greater quantity than was flowing in the stream in the dry season of that year. The decree, in effect, declares that each riparian owner shall be entitled to a share of the water equal to 1 inch for each 10 acres of his riparian land capable of profitable irrigation, if there is enough in the stream to serve all at that rate, that when there is not enough for all, each shall share the water in the proportion that his area of land so irrigable bears to the total area so irrigable, but that when only 23 miners' inches is flowing they shall be respectively entitled only to the specific amounts stated; provided, that either one may take a greater quantity so long as none of the other parties objects. The mere objection by one riparian owner, in such a case, is not sufficient to deprive any other riparian owner of the use of the water of the stream. Each owner has the right to use the whole or any part of the water on his own riparian land at any time when such use does not interfere with the actual use by the other owners of their due shares. If any such owner is not using the water himself, he has no right to object to the use of it by another riparian owner on riparian land. The decree should have declared this rule more clearly. We presume that this was what was intended by the form used, and that the parties so understood it, since the appellants do not object to its form in this particular. Nevertheless, to prevent further dispute, we think it well to modify the decree in accordance with the above views. But as no objection has been made regarding this point, the appellants will not be entitled to costs on account of the modification.

[7, 8] In apportioning the waters of a stream among the riparian owners, where there is not sufficient for the needs of all, many different facts are to be considered. In Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 681, 29 Pac. 326, the court, in considering this question, said:

"The length of the stream, the volume of water in it, the extent of each ownership along the banks, the character of the soil owned by each contestant, the area sought to be irrigated by each—all these, and many other considerations, must enter into the solution of the problem."

See, also, Southern, etc., Co. v. Wilshire, 144 Cal. 71, 77 Pac. 767. So far as we are aware no court has even undertaken to lay down a comprehensive rule on the subject. We are satisfied that the court may also consider the practicability of irrigation of the lands of the respective parties, the expense thereof, the comparative profit of the different uses which could be made of the water on the land, and that when the water is insufficient for all the land, or for all of the uses to which it might be applied thereon, and there is enough only for that use which is most valuable and profitable, the shares may properly be limited to and measured by the quantity sufficient for that use, and the proportions fixed accordingly. The party taking, under such a decree, could, of course, put his share so fixed to another beneficial use if he so desired. The decree here does not, and it should not, prohibit him from doing so. The apportionment made appears to have awarded to each his reasonable share of the limited quantity of water flowing in the stream during the dry season of the excessively dry year taken as the basis upon which the apportionment was made. The fact that it was made with regard to the area of land capable of profitable irrigation does not, of necessity, make the apportionment inequitable. It was a reasonable division for a year of that character. No reason appears why it should not be equally fair and reasonable to divide the water in the same proportions in other years when there is more water. As we have said, the fact that it is divided by reference to the area capable of profitable irrigation does not limit the use of any share to that purpose, but merely furnishes a standard for apportionment, and there is nothing in the evidence to prove that such apportionment would not be fair in other years for all the uses which the parties may desire to apply the water. The evidence as to the number of acres of the land of the respective parties that are susceptible of profitable irrigation is conflicting, and we find no ground upon which we could disturb the findings on that subject.

[9] The court found that the appellants have used the water in the stream for watering stock and for domestic purposes. The findings do not state the amount used or the amount necessary for these purposes. We cannot say that the quantity necessary will not be too trifling to require any allowance on account of it. Our attention has not been called to any evidence as to the quantity necessary for that purpose, or that any is necessary in addition to the quantity allotted. Therefore, in aid of the judgment, we will presume that the court below so considered the allowance sufficient to cover all purposes. Furthermore, the court made no specific allowance to the other parties for these uses. All are on the same basis regarding it. In time of scarcity all alike must make shift with the share allotted, and each must use it for such purposes as may be deemed most necessary, if he has not enough for all uses. This is clearly equitable and just. The appellants have merely mentioned the point in their briefs. They do not argue it. We, therefore, refrain from further discussion upon it.

[10] The appellants contend that it does not appear that the 96 acres of Torello, for which he was allowed water for irrigation, has ever been actually irrigated. The point is immaterial. The court found that it could be profitably irrigated from the stream. If so, Torello is entitled to use his reasonable share of the water thereon at any time he may choose to do so. He does not gain such right by use, nor does he lose it by disuse. His failure to use it in the past does not impair his right to use it in the future. So long as he makes no actual beneficial use of it, the other owners may take and use it even over his objection.

[11] It is claimed that the evidence shows that 78 acres of the Cowell land is susceptible of irrigation for which the court made no allowance. There is evidence to show that if the appellants could have obtained from Torello the right to make a diverting dam on his land above the Cowell land, and a right to maintain and use the dam and a ditch leading from it to their land, water could be carried by gravity to higher levels of the Cowell land than if it were taken out within the lines of that land, and that if this were done, about 78 acres of that land could thereby be irrigated. The claim is based upon this evidence. But this does not establish the fact that it would be possible for them to obtain such right. It may be presumed that Torello would not give the right except for a valuable consideration. Conceding, but not deciding, that a mere possible right of this character could be considered at all, it was incumbent upon the appellants to prove that it would not cost too much to render the scheme profitable. They offered no evidence at all upon this point. The finding excluding this land from the right to the water for irrigation in times of scarcity is therefore sustained by the evidence.

The judgment is modified by adding thereto the following clause:

Providing, however, that nothing in this decree shall operate to prevent any one of the parties from taking and using the water of the stream on his own land at any time when such taking and use does not interfere with the use by any of the other owners, upon his riparian land, of his reasonable share of the water, as above limited.

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. The order denying a new trial is also affirmed. The appellants shall not recover costs of appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by Charlotte L. McArthur and another against D. M. Goodwin and others. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Will D. Gould appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Blanchard and Will D. Gould, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Carter, Kirby & Henderson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. One of the defendants, Will D. Gould, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The action was one brought by Charlotte L. McArthur to quiet her title to lots 1, 7, 10, 11, and 13 of the Hillard tract in the county of Los Angeles. The original defendants were D. M. Goodwin, Will D. Gould, and certain persons sued by fictitious names. The complaint, in addition to the usual allegations in such suits, contained the averment on information and belief that the claim of defendants to an interest in the property was based upon certain tax deeds. Defendant Gould answered denying the allegations of the complaint except those which contained a statement of his adverse claim of title, and he averred that he was seised and possessed of all of the lots of land described in the complaint "as the sole owner thereof." This answer was filed January 23, 1909. Three and a half years later, on July 15, 1912, a few days before the time set for the trial, the appellant filed and served a cross-complaint and interpleader, in which he set up certain equitable matters. Charles H. McArthur answered this pleading and charged Will D. Gould with fraud in the purchase of a certain mortgage which, according to the pleading, was bought by Gould (who is an attorney at law) for his own benefit while he was acting as counsel for Charles H. McArthur in an action to foreclose the mortgage. In his brief filed in the superior court, Mr. Gould disclaimed any intention of depending upon the efficacy of any tax deeds as vesting title in him. He admitted that he was Mr. McArthur's attorney of record at a time when he compromised certain litigation to which we shall refer more fully hereafter.

In his brief before this court, however, the appellant asserts that his case presents these questions:

"(1) Can a cestui que trust quiet title to the property against the trustor before the determination of the trust?

"(2) Can the title to property be quieted against a mortgage held by a joint owner or an attorney in the case who has purchased it to protect the title?

"(3) Can the title to property be quieted against taxes paid by a joint owner who paid them to protect the title?"

The land known as the "Hillard tract" was purchased by Charles H. McArthur and Will D. Gould from Margaret A. Hillard in 1890. It was subject to a mortgage for $5,000, but the court found that:

"It is not true that Charles H. McArthur and Will D. Gould, or either of them, assumed or promised to pay a note and mortgage for $5,000, or for any other sum as part consideration of the deed executed to them by Margaret A. Hillard or otherwise."

At the trial it was stipulated that Gould deeded to C. H. McArthur an undivided half of lot 7 on June 26, 1891, and that he deeded to said C. H. McArthur an undivided half of lot 10 on July 1, 1892. By an instrument dated August 2, 1897, Gould deeded an undivided one-half interest in lots 1, 11, and 13 to Mary E. Linton. It will thus be seen that he had divested himself of the record title long before this suit was instituted. It also appears that the record title is in the plaintiff Charlotte L. McArthur.

[1] At the trial appellant introduced certain tax deeds. These represented alleged tax titles bought by Gould, as he asserted, through persons representing him, to whom he advanced the money for the purchase price. However, he failed to prove a chain of title because he began with the introduction in evidence of the deeds from the state. No deeds to the state were offered. Appellant's chain of title depending on the tax deeds was therefore incomplete. County Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Jack, 148 Cal. 437-442, 83 Pac. 705, 113 Am. St. Rep. 285. Numerous other criticisms of appellant's alleged tax title are made by respondent. These are in the form of technical objections to the sufficiency of the proceedings leading up to the execution of the tax deeds, and, although they are all apparently of much force, we need not examine them in detail in view of the failure upon the appellant's part to prove his chain of title depending upon the alleged sales of the property for delinquent taxes.

[2] But appellant bases his claim of interest in the land mainly upon payments which, as he avers, he made to protect the interests of the plaintiff and the other adversaries mentioned in his cross-complaint. In that pleading he took the position that after he and Charles H. McArthur acquired title from Mrs. Hillard they made improvements and sold certain lots; that they paid to the mortgagee, one Albertson, $2,705 in consideration of which sums he released certain lots not here in controversy from the effect of the mortgage; that in 1894 and 1897 upon specified dates Mrs. Hillard, Charles H. McArthur, and Will D. Gould renewed and extended the note and mortgage; that Charles H. McArthur, acting for himself and the plaintiff Charlotte L. McArthur, induced Gould to convey his interest in lots 1, 11, and 13 to Mary E. Linton as trustee for the benefit of Charlotte L. and Charles H. McArthur in consideration of the promise of Charles H. McArthur for himself and in behalf of plaintiff, who is his daughter, and also in behalf of Mary E. Linton, his sister-in-law, that they and each of them would fully pay the note and mortgage then a lien upon the unsold portion of the Hillard tract, Gould and Charles H. McArthur (so runs the pleading) having promised to pay the note and mortgage as a part of the purchase price of the tract; and that the promises made by Charles H. McArthur were made fraudulently and without intention of keeping them. The pleading contains further allegations substantially setting forth the failure of the grantee of Gould and the beneficiaries of the trust to pay the note or the taxes, the sale of these five lots at public auction and the purchase of the tax titles in appellant's behalf and at his expense, the eventual transfer of said titles to him, the commencement by one Knight of an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage mentioned above, and the purchase by Gould through intermediaries of the note and mortgage. It will thus be seen that the only important matter to be determined is whether or not, under the pleadings and the evidence, Gould was entitled to a lien on the land for moneys properly expended in behalf of the trustee and the beneficiaries.

Gould was attorney for Charles H. McArthur at the time when he purchased the note and mortgage and the alleged tax titles. He did these things after the action for foreclosure had been dismissed as to him. He acted in opposition to the interests of his clients and his purchases were therefore void. An attorney at law is forbidden to purchase an interest in the thing in controversy adverse to his client. Webster v. King, 33 Cal. 348; Eoff v. Irvine, 108 Mo. 378, 18 S. W. 907, 32 Am. St. Rep. 609; Cunningham v.

Jones, 37 Kan. 477, 15 Pac. 572, 1 Am. St. Rep. 257.

The court found that Gould did not tell Charles H. McArthur of his purchases. The assignments of the mortgage by and through Gould's representatives, George Gould and James H. Blanchard, and finally to appellant himself, were not recorded at the time of the trial. The tax deeds were not recorded until a very few days before the cross-complaint was served on plaintiff. Regarding the suit to foreclose the mortgage, the court found, upon abundant evidence, that Gould, without Charles H. McArthur's knowledge, "settled, satisfied, and discharged" the said action for $250; that he operated through others to conceal the fact of settlement from McArthur and his successors; and that this course was taken "for the fraudulent purpose of compelling said Charles H. McArthur and his successors in interest, to pay on account of said note and mortgage a much larger sum of money than said Will D. Gould had paid to satisfy and discharge the same."

[3] Appellant attacks the first finding, which is to the effect that plaintiff is the owner of and entitled to the possession of the five lots in controversy. He calls attention to the fact that the pleadings admit Mary E. Linton's trusteeship under his deed. But that admission does not help him, if his averment regarding the consideration for his deed to Linton be not true, and the court specifically found that the alleged promise to pay the note was not the consideration for the deed to Linton; that Gould did not rely upon any such promise in executing the deed; and that there was other consideration for the transfer of appellant's interest to Linton. Gould never pretended that the trust was in his favor. He pleaded that it was for the benefit of plaintiff and her father. We are not here concerned with the details of the trust imposed upon Mary E. Linton, because it does not appear that Gould was interested therein.

Appellant argues that there was no evidence of any other consideration for his deed to Mary E. Linton save the promise of payment of the note and mortgage because Mr. McArthur at the trial did not explain the consideration. The deed imported a consideration (section 1614, Civ. Code), and Mr. McArthur denied that he had promised to pay the note secured by the mortgage. Instead of questioning him about the true consideration, the appellant chose not to cross-examine Mr. McArthur.

[4] Appellant seeks to shift the burden of proof because of the partnership which he says was existing between himself and Mr. McArthur and the consequent fiduciary relation arising therefrom. There is no force in this contention. The fraud in the execution and delivery of the Linton deed was pleaded in the cross-complaint by which Charles H. McArthur was brought into the case. The burden was upon Gould to establish this alleged fraud. The Linton deed was drawn by appellant himself. It contains no statement of any promise to be performed by the McArthurs or by Mary E. Linton, but it does contain language to the effect that it was made "subject to" the mortgage. In the foreclosure suit Gould made his affidavit disclaiming all interest in the property. In addition to all this Mr. McArthur testified that before the Linton deed was made appellant told him that the mortgage was barred, and that was the very position taken by Mr. Gould as attorney for Mr. McArthur in preparing the demurrer to the complaint in the action to foreclose the mortgage. From the foregoing it will be seen that the court was justified in finding that the respondents were not guilty of any inequitable conduct.

[5] Nor does the evidence sustain appellant's argument that the plaintiff is not entitled to have the title to these lots quieted in her favor until she at least repays him the actual outlay made by him in causing the dismissal of the foreclosure suit and paying the amounts due because of the delinquent taxes. If Mr. Gould had shown that he acted on behalf of and under the orders of his client or of the other beneficiaries, when he made the outlays for which he seeks reimbursement, there would be some strength in his position; but the court found, under competent evidence, quite the contrary. In the purchase of the tax titles he was a volunteer and one, moreover, acting secretly so far as his client was concerned. Plaintiff is under absolutely no obligation to repay these outlays. If they had been made by Gould to protect his client's interests, he naturally would have sought a settlement and would not have waited many years before seeking to establish an interest in himself as grantee under a tax deed. But he insists that the payments made by him in procuring the assignment of the mortgage to him were in protection of the rights of Mr. McArthur and those of the plaintiff and Mrs. Linton, and for such advancements he is entitled to repayment. But, as we have seen from the court's findings, he fraudulently concealed his course in this matter and became an involuntary trustee through his own fault. Therefore he has none of the rights ordinarily existing in favor of a trustee. Civ. Code, § 2275.

[6] Appellant attacks finding No. 2, which is to the effect that McArthur and Gould did not assume or promise to pay the note and mortgage as part consideration of the deed to them from Margaret A. Hillard. The language of the deed surely created no such personal obligations on their part. The mere recital in the deed that it was made "subject to the mortgage" did not impose any personal liability upon the grantees for the payment of the mortgage debt. Such liability only arises by distinct assumption of the debt or contractual obligation to pay it. Hibernia Savings and Loan Society v. Dickinson, 167 Cal. 616, 140 Pac. 265; 27 Cyc. 1343. Mr. McArthur testified that they never did assume personal liability for the mortgage. In this he was contradicted by appellant. The court's finding upon this conflicting testimony must stand.

[7] The court also found that Mr. Goodwin and the others who acted for appellant in purchasing tax titles had no interest in the property. This was correct. Appellant freely admitted that they were acting for him and at the time of the trial they had divested themselves in his favor of such record title as they had possessed. This finding is not, as contended, a misplaced conclusion of law. The statement of ownership, title, or interest by the court as resting in any individual is a finding of ultimate fact and not a conclusion of law. 2 Hayne, New Trial and Appeal, p. 1339. The same may be said of the finding that Gould was not compelled to pay any money on account of taxes or the mortgage. He had been dismissed as a party to the suit to foreclose the mortgage, and there was evidence which the court accepted that he had received no instructions from his client to pay any sums whatever. Therefore he had no interest to protect.

Other specifications of alleged error are argued in the briefs, but they are without merit and are answered substantially in the foregoing discussion. We will not, therefore, review them in detail.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 14, 1916.)

1. TRUSTS — 41 — SECRET TESTAMENTARY TRUST—EVIDENCE—INTIMACY.

Mere intimacy between testatrix and a legatee which would make it easy for them to enter into a secret trust is no more significant, as an independent fact, in a suit to establish that the legacy was given on a secret trust for an illegal purpose, than in an attack on a will for undue influence, so that plaintiffs have the burden of establishing the trust by direct or circumstantial evidence.

2. TRUSTS — 44(1) — SECRET TESTAMENTARY TRUST—EVIDENCE.

That in a prior will testatrix attempted to give more than allowed by law to a charity is not evidence that a bequest to an individual was given on a secret trust to evade such law.

3. TRUSTS ~~44~~(1) — SECRET TESTAMENTARY TRUST—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a suit to establish a secret testamentary, to evade Civ. Code, § 1313, as to amount which may be bequeathed for charity, held insufficient, being consistent with legatee's position of a legatee not bound to carry out a trust.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Suit by James F. Garner and others against Charles A. Purcell, as trustee and individually. From an adverse judgment and order, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 167 Cal. 176, 138 Pac. 704.

Ball & Ball, Thomas Ball, and Murphey & Poplin, all of Los Angeles, and Park Henshaw, of Chico, for appellants. Valentine & Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

This is the third time that this court has been concerned with litigation connected with the estate of Mary B. Purcell, deceased. These plaintiffs, who are heirs at law of said Mary B. Purcell, attempted to have the probate of her will revoked upon the grounds of fraud, of want of testamentary capacity of the testatrix, and of lack of due execution of the said will. Nonsuit was directed, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiffs unsuccessfully appealed. Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 Pac. 932. Later an appeal was taken from the decree of distribution which plaintiffs had attacked upon the ground that the residuum given to Charles A. Purcell by the seventeenth paragraph of the will was bestowed in violation of section 1313 of the Civil Code, which limits the proportion of an estate which may be devised or bequeathed in trust for charitable uses. In that appeal the plaintiffs also failed. Estate of Purcell, 167 Cal. 176, 138 Pac. 704. Plaintiffs then sued in equity, praying that the court should impress a trust upon the property distributed to Charles A. Purcell. The defendant answered, and a trial was had upon the issues joined, resulting in the granting of his motion for nonsuit at the close of the testimony offered by plaintiffs.

The pleadings were simple, and the principal contention of plaintiffs was that a secret understanding existed between the testatrix and Charles A. Purcell in pursuance of which he was to distribute to charity more than one-third of the estate, which was given to him absolutely under the terms of the will, but in reality for the purpose of having him violate section 1313 of the Civil Code. It was alleged by plaintiffs and admitted by defendant that he claimed the residuary portion of the estate in his own right. It was similarly alleged and admitted that for nine years prior to execution of the will, and up to the time of her death, defendant had been Mrs. Purcell's trusted adviser and financial agent. Appellants quote the seventeenth clause of the will, and insist that by the very terms of the testament it suggests a trust because it makes both a specific and a residuary bequest to Charles A. Purcell; that in the residuary clause testatrix refers to her wish to bestow some of her fortune in charity, and that she also expresses her "full confidence" in Mr. Charles A. Purcell "that he will respect and endeavor to carry out" her "wishes and desires." All of these contentions are interesting, but they were disposed of by this department in Estate of Purcell, 167 Cal. 176-178, 138 Pac. 704, 705, where we said:

"The words of the will are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical significance, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected. Civ. Code, § 1324. From the words of the seventeenth clause there can be no doubt that the testatrix did not intend to create a trust. She inserted the most emphatic disclaimer to any such intention; and, unless we feel bound to say that she was totally disingenuous, we must give full value to her declaration that she desired to place no limitation upon Charles A. Purcell in respect to the legacy. The meaning of her words is unmistakable, and her intention not to create a trust must govern."

That decision disposes of the contention that from the will itself an inference in favor of the existence of a trust is to be drawn. See, also, In re Sharp, 17 Cal. App. 634, 120 Pac. 1079; O'Donnell v. Murphy, 17 Cal. App. 625, 120 Pac. 1076; Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 Pac. 964, 64 Pac. 1071; Kauffman v. Gries, 141 Cal. 295, 74 Pac. 846; Estate of Mitchell, 160 Cal. 618, 117 Pac. 774.

[1] Nor do the admitted confidential relations between the defendant and the testatrix amount to any more than the establishment of a state of facts which would make it easy for them to enter into an understanding with reference to a secret trust. But mere intimacy as an independent fact is no more significant in a case of this sort than it is in an attack upon a will on the ground of undue influence. In other words, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiffs to establish the alleged secret trust either by direct or circumstantial evidence, and the fact of intimacy between Mrs. Purcell and this defendant is not more than a mere showing of opportunity by them to confer confidentially upon the desired disposition of her property.

[2] The plaintiffs introduced in evidence a former will, in which were bequests to them one-half as great as those made by the later will, and in which testatrix sought to dedicate the residue of her estate to an institution to be known as "Purcell Home for Aged People," and it is argued that the building and endowment of some such institution were enjoined upon the defendant by the precatory words of the later will. But it does not by any means follow that because the testatrix once contemplated the founding of such a charity, she cherished the same purpose when the second will was executed. We must read her last will by itself, and construe it without reference to other and earlier instruments. The very fact that she caused another will to be prepared indicated that she was not satisfied with the previous will.

[3] William H. Garner, a legatee, testified regarding two conversations, in one of which defendant informed him that he would not have to pay a certain note held by the estate. Purcell told witness that:

"It was just the same with the note as with the charity money in clause seventeenth; that he knew the charities she wanted it to go to, and knew her intentions, and intended to carry them out to the letter."

Later when witness went to Charles A. Purcell to get a settlement, the latter said he could not settle, that the money was going to charities, and that he purposed to carry out the known wishes of his aunt. He promised, however, to consult with the other executors, and to see what he could do in case of a settlement. This testimony, as respondent suggests, is entirely consistent with his position as residuary legatee not bound to carry out a trust. As trustee of a fund he could hardly agree to exempt a debtor of the estate from the payment of a note. Another witness detailed a conversation in which Mr. Purcell told her that his aunt's personal effects would be sold, and the proceeds would go to charity. Other witnesses told of statements by Charles A. Purcell, to the effect that he wrote the will, and Mr. Valentine, the attorney, put it in proper form. This was all of the evidence offered, and it utterly failed either to establish a secret trust or a conspiracy by Mr. Purcell and Mr. Valentine to evade the law expressed in section 1313 of the Civil Code as alleged in one count of the complaint. No one can dispute the existence of the rule that a court of equity may impose and enforce upon a legatee a trust where he has procured the legacy to be given him upon a promise, express or implied, that he will take and hold the property for some particular use; and, where the secret trust is created for a purpose which is contrary to law, if no other disposition is made of the legacy by the will, the legatee will be declared by a court of equity the holder of the property in trust for the benefit of the heirs. But, as was said by Mr. Justice Hall, who delivered the opinion of the court in O'Donnell v. Murphy, supra:

"Before this may be done the evidence must establish that the legacy was given upon a promise, express or implied, that it would be taken and used for the particular trust."

There is here no such showing, and no testimony from which the existence of such secret trust might justly be inferred.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MACHADO v. MACHADO. (Civ. 1944.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 12, 1916.)

DIVORCE — ALIMONY PENDENTE LITE — ORDER COMMANDING ISSUANCE OF EXECUTION.

Where, before issuance of mandate by the trial court to its clerk commanding him to issue writ of execution to enforce an order for payment of alimony pendente lite, the order granting alimony was reversed so that the wife was not entitled to the amounts, the order granting writ of mandate will be reversed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Maria Machado against Frank R. Machado. From an order granting a writ of mandate addressed to the clerk of the court below commanding him to issue a writ of execution to enforce an order for the payment of alimony pendente lite, defendant appeals. Order reversed.

See, also, 26 Cal. App. 16, 145 Pac. 738.

A. M. Free and C. L. Witten, both of San Jose, and R. V. Burns, of Mountain View (F. H. Bloomingdale, of San Jose, of counsel), for appellant. Joseph Rafael, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon the petition of the plaintiff the court below granted a writ of mandate addressed to the clerk of the court, commanding him to issue a writ of execution to enforce an order for the payment of alimony pendente lite. It appears, however, that before the issuance of the writ of mandate the order granting alimony had been revoked, and that the petitioner was not entitled to the amounts for the enforcement of payment of which the execution was issued. Under these circumstances there is nothing for this court to do but to reverse the order appealed from, and that will be the judgment of the court.

MERWIN v. SHAFFNER. (Civ. 2003.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 11, 1916. Rehearing Denied Oct. 10, 1916. Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 9, 1916.)

1. BROKERS — EMPLOYMENT TO SECURE LESSEE—RIGHT TO COMMISSION.

Where defendant agreed in writing to pay plaintiff a commission if he procured a lease of her realty upon terms specified by her, or terms acceptable to her, and he procured three persons, and produced them to her, who were ready, able, and willing to lease the property on terms, which, by defendant's written acknowledgment, were acceptable to her, though their offer to lease specified no time for the commencement of the lease, plaintiff was entitled to his commission, the implication being that the term of the lease should commence upon its making, there being no condition specified in the offer as to any different time.

2. BROKERS ¶63(1)—RIGHT TO COMMISSION—REPUDIATION BY PRINCIPAL.

Where defendant employed plaintiff to lease her realty, agreeing to pay $2,500 commission "along during the first year," and refused to enter into any lease at all, and repudiated her liability for commission, plaintiff, having procured prospective lessees on terms acceptable to defendant, was entitled to recover the full commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by W. B. Merwin against Rosalia B. Shaffner. From judgment of dismissal on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed.

Benjamin E. Page and Arthur C. Hurt, both of Los Angeles (Arthur F. Coe, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Denis & Loewenthal and George W. McDill, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover commissions alleged to have been earned by procuring a lessee for real property owned by the defendant. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend. A judgment of dismissal followed, from which this appeal was taken.

In the complaint it was alleged that on or about the 22d day of January, 1913, the defendant made and delivered to the plaintiff the following instrument in writing:

"Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 22, 1913.

"W. B. Merwin, 424 H. W. Hellman Bldg., Los Angeles, Cal.—Dear Sir: You are hereby authorized to find a lessee for my property at (611 West Sixth street), the east 40 feet of the west 85 feet of lots 1 and 2, block 102, Bellevue Terrace tract, for the term of 99 years, at the annual net rental of $3,000.00, payable monthly in advance for the first ten years, and an annual net rental of $4,800.00 for the remainder of the 99 years term, payable monthly. Should you secure a lessee acceptable to me on the above terms, or terms acceptable to me, I agree to pay you a commission $2,500, payable along during the 1st year. This is exclusively good to you for 60 days from date.

"A building not to cost less than $40,000 to $50,000 on or before 10 years from date of lease, to be built upon the property.

"Yours respectfully, Rosalia B. Shaffner."

It was then alleged that pursuant to the authority given by this writing the plaintiff procured three individuals to make an offer to lease the property described, the offer being submitted in the following form:

"Los Angeles, Jan. 24, 1913.

"W. B. Merwin & Co., H. W. Hellman Building, Los Angeles, California.—Gentlemen: On behalf of myself, Mr. Jeff. P. Chandler and Mr. Leo S. Chandler, I hereby make you the following proposition: We will lease, for a period of ninety-nine years, the Mrs. R. B. Shaffner lot, having a frontage of forty (40) feet and a depth of one hundred twenty (120) feet on the north side of Sixth street, eighty (80) feet west of Grand avenue, in this city, at the following rentals, viz.:

"At the rate of $3,000 per year for the first year.

"At the rate of $2,400 per year for the next five years.

"At the rate of $3,000 per year for the next four years.

"At the rate of $3,600 per year for the next five years.

"At the rate of $4,200 per year for the next five years.

"At the rate of $5,000 per year for the last twenty-nine years.

"All rentals payable monthly in advance.

"We will agree to build a building upon the property costing not less than $40,000 within ten years, and we will pay all taxes and assessments of every kind that may be levied against or become a lien upon the property during the life of our lease.

"Yours truly,

Shirley C. Ward."

The allegation then follows that the plaintiff communicated the offer last set out to the defendant, and that the defendant thereupon made the following indorsement upon the paper containing the offer:

"Los Angeles, Calif., January 25, 1913.

"Messrs. W. B. Merwin & Co., Los Angeles, Calif.—Dear Sirs: I hereby accept the terms and conditions of the above agreement.

"Rosalia B. Shaffner."

It was then alleged that the persons mentioned in the offer, of which acceptance was made by defendant, were and continued to be ready, able, and willing to execute a lease upon the property, and that they did within 60 days from the 22d of January, 1913, communicate to defendant their readiness to execute the lease, and offered to so execute it, but that defendant refused and continues to refuse to enter into any lease with such proposed lessees, and disclaimed and repudiated any liability to plaintiff for commissions.

[1, 2] We think the demurrer to this complaint was improperly sustained. The defendant agreed in writing to pay to the plaintiff a commission if he procured a lease upon the terms specified by her or other terms acceptable to her. He did procure persons and produced them to her who were ready, able, and willing, according to the allegations of his complaint, to enter into a lease upon terms which by the written acknowledgment of the defendant were acceptable to her. Considering the allegations of the complaint, no ground appears to excuse the defendant from entering into the lease as proposed and accepted, and the plaintiff, having done all that it was conditioned he should do, appears to have fully earned the commission agreed to be paid. The fact that in the offer of Ward and his associates to make a lease no time was specified for the commencement thereof, was not a defect fatal to the validity of the offer. There being no condition specified in the offer as to any different time for the commencement of the lease, it would be implied that the term was to commence upon the making thereof. It has often been held that where the agreement to pay commissions upon the sale or leasing of real estate is in writing, the agent, as a condition to the earning of his commissions, need only produce to his principal persons who are ready, able, and willing to contract according to the terms proposed or acceptable to such principal. In the first instrument signed by the defendant the time for the payment of the commission was stated to be "along during the first year." As it appears in the allegations of the complaint that the defendant refused to enter into any lease at all, but repudiated her liability to pay commission, the well-established rule would apply which permits the other party to the contract in such a case, after having rendered fully all of the consideration to be by him rendered, to sue to recover the amount agreed to be paid. As we view the complaint, it stated a good cause of action, and was not subject to the objection raised by the demurrer.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. CARDER. (Cr. 355.)

CRIMINAL LAW § 762(5)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY—OPINION AS TO GUILT.

In a criminal prosecution, where the jury returned into court and its foreman informed the presiding judge that in his opinion the jury could not agree, the judge's remark that the question of fact was for the jury "though it seems very plain to me," and his question, after the jury had again returned and reported their inability to agree, as to "how many contrary ones are there?" and his further remark that there ought not to be any trouble, that in a good natured way they should work it out, in view of the jury's final verdict of conviction, were such that the jury must have concluded that he was convinced of the defendant's guilt, and that as honest men it was their duty to so find, and hence reversible error; though it was proper for the judge to admonish the jury to consult together, to listen to argument, and to endeavor earnestly to reach an agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Henry Carder was convicted of the larceny of a calf, and, from the judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was convicted of the larceny of a calf, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

Among the alleged errors, the most serious is involved in certain remarks to the jury made by the trial judge. It seems that after the case was submitted the jury returned into court at 3:35 p. m. on Friday, and asked to have certain evidence read to them. This was done and they again retired. A few hours later they returned to the courtroom and the foreman informed the presiding judge that in his opinion the jury could not agree. The trial judge then said:

"You must work this out, gentlemen. If there is anything I can help you in I can do it, and I will be here 10 minutes longer to help you. You oughtn't to make up your mind you are not going to agree on this kind of a case, simply calls for the sensible reasoning of men according to the evidence and talk it over together."

Furthermore, in reply to a juror's question, the court said:

"I don't want to decide any question of fact for you; that question though it seems very plain to me."

A little later he used this language:

"You must try and reconcile the testimony if you can and come to a verdict, gentlemen, if you possibly can. These cases are expensive to try."

The jury returned again into court on Saturday morning at 10:35, and the transcript reveals the following:

"Clerk: Have you reached a verdict, gentlemen? A. We have not. Court: Well, what can I do for you, gentlemen? Jurymen Yates: Your honor please, there isn't a possibility, I don't think, in the minds of any of the jury, that we can agree. We have went over the evidence and every particle of that; we can agree as to what the evidence is, but we can't agree on a verdict. The Court: You can't agree, you think? Jurymen: No, sir; done everything that we could to reach a verdict since you left here last night. The Court: How many contrary ones are there? Jurymen: Two. Court: Well, I tell you, gentlemen, you can work just as good on this, a jury can on holidays, Sundays, and any other time, and the law is all right in that respect, and the court can take the verdict at any time, too, on Sunday as well as Saturday afternoon. Now, if there is any question of law that you need that you are in doubt about, why I will give it to you. Questions of fact you must decide. There oughtn't to be any trouble. It's a case you ought to decide, ought to agree upon, and don't make up your minds that you can't agree, don't get contrary, but just in a good humor, good natured way work it out. Jurymen Cleland: Your honor, we worked all night in there and we have talked all night. I think we have got it down to where they say we have made up our minds and no use to argue. Court: Well, of course, men go into the jury room. They think their minds are made up, and some little question comes up, they come to the conclusion then they ought to change it. If they keep working on the theory they are not going to change their minds, it is made up, of course they will not, but that's not the way for a jury to do, want to work at it with the possibility always in view that I may be wrong about this and I'll change if I am.

 * * * You think there is no question of fact the court can help you on by having it read?
 A. I don't think so. Court: Well, go back and go to work, gentlemen. The court will be here any time when you agree."

The jury returned later to have some of the testimony read. They retired again for deliberation, and finally brought in a verdict of guilty.

We think it quite apparent that from the statements of the learned trial judge the jury must have concluded that he was convinced of the defendant's guilt and that as honest men it was their duty to so find. A portion of the remarks we have quoted was quite appropriate and calls for no criticism, but the statements we have italicized constitute, in our opinion, an infringement of the special prerogative of the jury. It was proper for the presiding judge to admonish the jury of their duty to consult together, to listen to argument, and to endeavor earnestly to reach an agreement, and, although of somewhat questionable propriety to remind the jury of the expense of a new trial, such remark could not justly be held sufficient ground for reversal, nor perhaps even for criticism; but to characterize the two dissentient jurors as "contrary" and to declare that there should be no trouble about agreeing upon a case like this, and that it simply called for the sensible reasoning of men according to the evidence, transcends the proper limits of judicial discretion and authority. The "contrary" jurors were undoubtedly for acquittal. It is not likely that if the other ten had been opposed to conviction they would so readily have yielded to the persuasive suggestions of the trial court. Of course, these two jurors had the same legal and moral right to their opinion of the guilt of the defendant as had the other ten, and their attitude should not have been ascribed to obstinacy. That under our system, in the determination of the guilt or innocence of a defendant, the jury must be left free from coercion or influence of the trial judge, will not be gainsaid. This right and privilege accorded by the Constitution to one charged with crime is manifestly fundamental and vital. If serious infractions of it are to be tolerated, then trial by jury becomes a delusive formality.

The case here is controlled by the principle of the decision in People v. Kindleberger, 100 Cal. 367, 34 Pac. 852, and People v. Conboy, 15 Cal. App. 97, 113 Pac. 703. In the former, the trial judge said to the jury:

"In view of the testimony in this case the court is utterly at a loss to know why twelve honest men cannot agree."

And in the latter, the objectionable remark was:

"Now, gentlemen, I think I have read to you about all the instructions you desire upon these points, and I suggest to you that there is no reason why twelve honest, intelligent, reasonable men should not reach a conclusion in this case, and I am surprised that you have not done so already."

The case at bar, for the same reason, is equally subject to animadversion, and the only reasonable conclusion, as we conceive it, is that the jury were prejudicially influenced against the defendant. It may be said as to this that the principle is thoroughly considered and the cases reviewed by Mr. Justice Kerrigan in the Conboy decision, supra, and therefore we need pursue the subject no further.

The other questions discussed will probably not arise again, and we forego specific consideration thereof; but, for the reason stated, we think the defendant did not have a fair trial, and the judgment and order are reversed.

1. COSTS ⇨254(5)—COSTS ON APPEAL—EXPENSE OF TRANSCRIPT OF TESTIMONY—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1027, providing for the recovery as costs of the amounts actually paid out by a party in connection with his appeal, where plaintiff obtained the reporter's transcript of the testimony solely to assist her counsel in preparing amendments to a bill of exceptions proposed by defendant on its motion for new trial in the superior court, the amount paid for the transcript was purely an expense in the conduct of the case in the superior court, and was not a part of the preparation of the record for appeal, so that the item could not be allowed as costs on appeal.

2. COSTS ⇨70—RIGHT TO—TIME OF ACCRUAL.

The general rule is that the right to costs accrues when the judgment is rendered, though the judgment has not become final, or entry thereof has been stayed.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨834 — FORCE AND EFFECT OF JUDGMENT.

A judgment on appeal, like a judgment of a trial court, has the force and effect of a judgment from the time of its entry, though rehearing may be ordered, suspending operation of the judgment.

4. COSTS ⇨258—COSTS ON APPEAL—STATUTE.

Respondent, upon affirmance, was entitled to have only the costs on appeal to which she was entitled by law at the time of the rendition of the judgment in her favor, and not those to which she was entitled when remittitur was sent down to the superior court, despite Code Civ. Proc. § 1034, providing that whenever costs are awarded to a party by an appellate court, the time within which he may file in the superior court a memorandum of such costs is limited to begin after filing of the remittitur, and cannot recover costs of printing brief on petition for rehearing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Samuel E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Jennie Eaton and J. O. Eaton, her husband, against the Southern Pacific Company. There was judgment for plaintiffs, which was affirmed (22 Cal. App. 461, 134 Pac. 801), and from an order denying its motion to strike out respondent's memorandum of costs, defendant appeals. Order taxing costs and allowing items complained of reversed, with direction that the superior court enter an order disallowing the items.

H. P. Starbuck and Canfield & Starbuck, all of Santa Barbara, for appellant. Richards & Carrier and John J. Squier, all of Santa Barbara (John William Heaney, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Upon a former appeal by the defendant in this case the judgment was affirmed (22 Cal. App. 461, 134 Pac. 801). The judgment on appeal was rendered July 7, 1913; became final August 6, 1913; an application for a rehearing in the Supreme Court was denied within 30 days thereafter; a remittitur from this court went down to the superior court on September 8, 1913. Thereafter respondent filed her memorandum of costs, and appellant applied to the superior court for an order to strike out the memorandum of costs on the ground that the same had been illegally filed, and also demanded that certain items in the cost bill be stricken out upon the ground that they are not legally allowable as costs of the appeal. The items in dispute are: (1) $104 paid for a reporter's transcript of the testimony taken at the trial and which respondent claims as an expense "for transcript of testimony used by plaintiffs in preparing record on appeal and amendments to defendant's bill of exceptions used upon appeal." (2) $10.80 claimed by respondent as cost of printing answer to defendant's petition for a rehearing in the Supreme Court. This appeal is by the defendant from an order denying said motion.

[1] By an amendment to section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to costs on appeal, which amendment became effective on the 10th day of August, 1913, it is provided as a part of that section that:

"The party entitled to costs, or to whom costs are awarded, may recover the amounts actually paid out by him in connection with said appeal and the preparation of the record for the appeal, including the costs of printing briefs: Provided, however, that no amount shall be allowed as costs of printing briefs in excess of fifty dollars to any one party."

The record on this appeal shows that the reporter's transcript was obtained by respondent solely for the purpose of assisting her counsel in the preparation of amendments to a bill of exceptions proposed by the defendant on its motion for a new trial in the superior court. The expense thus incurred was purely an expense in the conduct of the case in the superior court, and was not a part of the preparation of the record for the appeal. Therefore the item in question cannot be allowed even if, as contended by respondent, her right to costs is governed by the amendment of section 1027. Bank of Woodland v. Hiatt, 59 Cal. 580.

[2-4] With respect to the other item, it is necessary to determine whether respondent's right to costs on appeal accrued prior to August 10, 1913, or subsequent thereto. The general rule is that the right to costs accrues at the time when the judgment is rendered, notwithstanding that the judgment has not become final or that entry thereof has been stayed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1033. Respondent claims, however, that her right to costs on appeal did not accrue until the remittitur was sent down to the superior court. This contention is based upon section 1034, Code of Civil Procedure, from which it appears that whenever costs are awarded to a party by an appellate court the time within which he may file in the superior court a memorandum of those costs is limited to begin after the filing of the remittitur. It seems to us, however, that since the right of the prevailing party to recover any costs on appeal is obtained by virtue of the judgment as rendered, this necessarily includes the assumption that he is to have those costs and only those costs to which he is entitled by law at the time of the rendition of such judgment. A judgment on appeal, like a judgment of a trial court, has the force and effect of a judgment from the time of its entry. The fact that within a limited time thereafter a rehearing may be ordered, while it may suspend the operation of the judgment, does not in the meantime deprive the judgment of its inherent attributes as an act of the court, any more than one could say that a judgment of the superior court is no judgment until it has become final. It follows that in the present case respondent is not entitled to recover the cost of printing her brief in answer to the petition for a rehearing in the Supreme Court.

The order taxing costs and allowing the items above mentioned is reversed, and it is directed that the superior court enter an order disallowing the said items.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Pearls, Judge.

Phillip Winner was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Reversed, with direction to grant defendant's motion for new trial.

Wesley P. Grijalva, of Bakersfield, Henry R. Holsinger, and A. B. Campbell, of Bakersfield, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Upon an information filed by the district attorney of Kern county the defendant was, on March 16, 1916, convicted of the crime of grand larceny. On March 20th he presented to the court a motion for a new trial, the hearing of which was by the court continued to March 27th, at which time the court, as shown by the minutes thereof, made an entry as follows:

"By consent of counsel for respective parties in open court, it is by the court ordered that said motion for a new trial be and the same is hereby submitted upon briefs to be presented within five, five, and two days."

On April 4th, more than 15 days after defendant's conviction, the court made an order denying his motion for a new trial. Thereupon defendant, within due time, made a motion for a new trial upon the ground that more than 15 days had elapsed since the date of the conviction of defendant, and upon the same ground objected to the court pronouncing judgment upon defendant, which motion the court likewise denied. The ruling constitutes error.

Section 1191, Penal Code, provides that:

Upon a defendant being convicted "the court must appoint a time for pronouncing judgment, which must not be less than two, nor more than five days after the verdict or plea of guilty: Provided, however, that the court may extend the time not more than ten days for the purpose of hearing or determining any motion for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment: And provided, further, that the court may extend the time not more than twenty days in any case where the question of probation is considered in accordance with section 1203 of this Code; provided, however, that upon the request of the defendant such time may be further extended not more than ninety days additional."

And section 1202 of the Penal Code provides that:

Unless judgment be "rendered or pronounced within the time so fixed or to which it is continued under the provisions of section eleven hundred and ninety-one of this Code, then the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial."

[1] As said by the court in People v. Polich, 25 Cal. App. 464, 143 Pac. 1065, quoting from Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 189, 106 Pac. 718:

"If the judgment was not pronounced within the time limited, a new trial was made imperative if the defendant so desired; he became 'entitled' to it. * * * If the court should refuse a new trial and render judgment against the defendant after the authorized time has passed, its action would be erroneous, and the judgment would be reversed on appeal if an appeal should be taken."

To the same effect is People v. Okomoto, 26 Cal. App. 568, 147 Pac. 598, where it was held that the defendant was entitled to a new trial, but lost his right thereto by reason of not asking for it in the trial court.

[2] Conceding the error, the Attorney General in support of the court's action insists that it was cured by the fact, as shown that counsel for defendant in open court consented to the postponement of the time for sentence. In support of this contention a number of cases arising under section 1382, Penal Code, providing for the dismissal of prosecutions in cases therein specified, are cited. In our opinion, such cases are not in point and throw no light upon the interpretation to be given sections 1191 and 1202, which should be construed in accordance with the plain import of the language used. Thus construed, as held in People v. Polich and People v. Okomoto, supra, the delay beyond the time specified for pronouncing judgment renders it imperative that defendant have a new trial if he asks for it. Prior to the enactment the courts with consent of parties or otherwise, not infrequently indulged in prolonged delays before pronouncing sentence upon those convicted of crime. Such practice was recognized by the Legislature as an evil, to cure which sections 1191 and 1202 were adopted, not as a benefit conferred upon defendant which he might waive, but as a matter of public policy intended to insure a swifter infliction of the penalty which the law requires to be imposed upon those convicted of crime. To uphold the contention of respondent and recognize the consent of the parties as justifying an indefinite postponement of the time for pronouncing judgment beyond that specified for so doing would not subserve, but, on the contrary, nullify, the plain purpose and intent of the Legislature in adopting the provision.

The judgment and order are reversed, and, for the reasons stated, the court directed to make an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Petition for mandamus by Alfred Blanchard against Mark Keppel, Ex Officio Secretary, etc. From a judgment for petitioner, defendant appeals. Judgment reversed.

A. J. Hill, of Los Angeles, and Hugh Gordon, Deputy County Counsel, for appellant. John W. Luter, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus wherein the defendant has appealed from the judgment. By the terms of the judgment the defendant, as superintendent of schools of the county of Los Angeles and ex officio secretary of the county board of education, is required to approve and present to the county board of education the application of the petitioner (together with the recommendation of the president of the State Normal School at Los Angeles) for the issuance to the petitioner of a preliminary elementary school certificate authorizing him to do practice and cadet teaching, without salary, in any of the elementary schools of Los Angeles county, without the payment of a fee of $2 demanded by appellant. The superior court held that a preliminary elementary school certificate as described and referred to in the Political Code in section 1775 (subdivision "c" of subdivision 1) and in section 1771 (subdivision "c" of subdivision 3) is not a teacher's certificate within the meaning of section 1565 of that Code.

The fee of $2 demanded by appellant from respondent as an applicant for a preliminary school certificate is required by section 1565 to be paid by every applicant for a teacher's certificate, "except for a temporary certificate." Section 1543 provides for the issuance of "temporary certificates" good for not exceeding six months and which are issued upon certain credentials shown, by the superintendent of schools of the county. Various other forms of certificate mentioned in section 1771 and in other sections of the Political Code are issued by the county board of education. In the list of these last-mentioned certificates we find no reference to a "temporary certificate," but it does include "preliminary elementary certificates" which shall not be valid for a longer period than two years. It does not appear that the Code anywhere uses the term "temporary certificate" as applied to any form of certificate issued by a county board of education.

We shall not follow respondent's counsel in his argument based upon alleged unreasonableness of the $2 fee. The language of the Code being in this instance clear and unmistakable, we cannot indulge in a discussion about what the Legislature ought to have intended to do.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Frank Goodrum was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying him new trial. Reversed and remanded, and rehearing denied.

J. M. Lee, of Red Bluff, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. Under an indictment charging him with the crime of assault to commit murder, the defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 18 months. This appeal is prosecuted by the defendant from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The assault was committed on the wife of the defendant, in the city of Red Bluff, on the 20th day of December, 1915. Domestic dissensions had led to the separation of the parties, and for some little time prior to the date of the assault the defendant had not lived with his wife. The undisputed facts are: That on the said 20th day of December, between the hours of 5 and 6 o'clock p. m., Mrs. Goodrum and her mother, Mrs. Harriet B. Reyon, who was then stopping at the home of the former, were on their way home from the business part of the city, when they were approached from the rear by the defendant. He placed his hand upon the shoulder of his wife, and, addressing her, said: "Belle, I want to speak to you a minute." Both Mrs. Goodrum and Mrs. Reyon turned and faced him, and at the same time the defendant drew a revolver and pointed it in the face of his wife. Mrs. Reyon grabbed the weapon, a tussle ensued, and the weapon was discharged, no one, however, being struck by the bullet. Thereupon the defendant drew a knife and began cutting and slashing his wife about the head and left arm. Several ugly, though not serious, wounds were thus inflicted upon the head, left arm, and hand of Mrs. Goodrum. Mrs. Reyon called loudly for assistance, and finally the defendant desisted from his attack and stepped away a distance of 12 or 15 feet and threatened, and apparently attempted, to commit suicide. Mrs. Goodrum was taken to a drug store near by, where she received the attention of a physician, and the defendant was placed under arrest, taken to the county jail, and subsequently on account of a gash across his throat, inflicted by a knife, presumably by himself, and weakness resulting from said wound, was conveyed to the county hospital, where he remained for several weeks.

The defense interposed at the trial was that of insanity, and testimony was introduced to support it, a number of "intimate acquaintances" testifying that in their opinion the defendant was insane on the day upon which the assault was committed. And the defendant himself testified that he had no recollection of the assault or of any incidents connected with himself occurring on that day.

The complaint against the result reached by the jury is based solely upon certain instructions given by the court upon the issue of insanity, and also upon the action of the court in rejecting certain instructions proposed by the defendant upon that question.

While it was expressly admitted in court by the district attorney that the defendant was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor at the time of the assault, it was the theory of the people at the trial that, if the defendant's mentality was not wholly normal, or was, to the extent of rendering him irresponsible, impaired on that occasion, such condition of mind was occasioned wholly by the use by him of intoxicating liquors for some period of time prior to the assault. And in harmony with this theory the court instructed the jury, basing its instructions upon that question upon section 22 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows:

"No act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition. But whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time, in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act."

The court correctly instructed the jury, in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing section, that temporary insanity produced by the voluntary use of intoxicating liquor is no excuse for the commission of crime. It is claimed, however, that since it was admitted that the defendant was not in an intoxicated condition on the day that the assault was committed, there was, under the proofs, ample room for the theory that the alleged insanity of the accused was not of a temporary character as the result of his voluntary intoxication, but the effect of long-continued intoxication for a period prior to the time of the commission of the act, and was, within the meaning of the law, "settled insanity"; that the court should have instructed upon that theory, and erred to the prejudice of the defendant by refusing to do so. In view of the fact that there was some testimony tending to show that the accused had, previously to the day of the difficulty, habitually imbibed intoxicating liquors to excess, and of the further fact that the people admitted that the defendant was not in a state of intoxication on the day of the assault, we think there is some force to this contention.

[1, 2] There is a well-recognized distinction in law between temporary insanity or mental aberration brought on by voluntary intoxication and "settled insanity" superinduced by long-continued indulgence in alcoholic liquors.

"A sane man, * * * who voluntarily drinks and becomes intoxicated is not excused because the result is to cloud his judgment, unbalance his reason, impair his perceptions, derange his normal faculties, and lead him to the commission of an act which in his sober senses he would have avoided. Upon the other hand, if one, by reason of long-continued indulgence in intoxicants, has reached that stage of chronic alcoholism where the brain is permanently diseased, where the victim is rendered incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, and where permanent general insanity has resulted, then and in such case he is no more legally responsible for his acts than would be the man congenitally insane, or insane from violent injury to the brain." People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 233, 239, 54 Pac. 830, 832.

See, also, People v. Travers, 88 Cal. 233, 239, 26 Pac. 88; People v. Rogers, 18 N. Y. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 484; People v. Hower, 151 Cal. 638, 642, 643, 91 Pac. 507.

[3] While there can be no doubt that the case as made by the evidence justified the giving of an instruction upon settled insanity brought about by an incessant and excessive use of intoxicating liquors for a long period of time prior to the commission of the assault, we believe that those rejected instructions which purported to contain concrete statements of the law as applied to the present case were, under the evidence, framed in language entirely too general. The evidence strongly tends to show—indeed, there is no other character of showing upon that subject—that, to whatever extent the defendant's mentality had been impaired, his condition in that regard had been caused by the use of intoxicants; but some of the instructions proposed by the accused, but rejected, were so phrased as to have submitted to the jury, if given, the question, not whether the defendant was afflicted with settled insanity caused by the use of intoxicating liquors, but whether from any cause he was the victim of permanent insanity, as to which latter proposition there was no evidence presented or received. All the concrete instructions on the question of insanity in this case should have been, with proper qualifications, made applicable solely to insanity caused by the use of intoxicating liquors so that the jury could not have been misled as to the recognized distinction in law between the mental derangement so caused which would not excuse a criminal act and the insanity so caused which would, because of a defect of criminal or any intent necessarily the result of such insanity, excuse such an act. This is not to say, however, that an abstract or a general instruction on the question of insanity as applied to crimes should not have been given. To the contrary, we think such an instruction should have been submitted for the purpose of enlightening the jury upon the general proposition that one committing a criminal act while laboring under a state of "settled" insanity resulting from any cause whatsoever cannot be held liable for such act.

[4] But we are of the opinion that the learned trial judge, ordinarily singularly accurate and correct in the statement of pertinent legal principles to juries, permitted himself to be led into error seriously prejudicing the defendant by giving an instruction in which, without qualification, it was declared:

"On this subject [that of insanity] the Appellate Court in a recent decision uses this language, which I will read to you as a part of the instructions in this case: 'Defendant's normal condition was that of a sane man. His alleged mental derangement was not only transient in character, but such condition was the result of his voluntary acts in the use of alcoholic liquors. Under such circumstances, one prosecuted for the commission of a crime cannot urge such condition as a defense thereto.'"

The foregoing language was taken from the opinion in the case of People v. Bremer, 24 Cal. App. 315, 316, 317, 141 Pac. 222, and the principle stated thereby is unquestionably correct as an abstract proposition. But, as applied to the present case, the instruction plainly invaded the province of the jury. Whether the defendant's mental derangement was only of "a transient character" and his condition the result "of his voluntary acts in the use of alcoholic liquors" was one of the most important questions of fact involved in the case, and one, obviously, whose solution was solely and exclusively a function of the jury. It has been suggested, however, that since the court declared that it was taken from an appellate court decision, the instruction, so far as it purports to deal with facts, must be viewed as having reference, not to the present case, but to the case from the opinion in which its language was taken, and that its effect, therefore, so far as this case was concerned, was merely to state the application generally of the rule relating to the effect of voluntary intoxication upon the commission of a criminal act by one when suffering from a mental derangement so superinduced. But we do not feel at liberty to so view the instruction or to declare that the jury did not understand it as applying particularly to this case. While the court did explain that the language was taken from the decision in another case, it also declared that it would be adopted as part of the instructions in the case at bar; and from this it is to be assumed, as we may justly presume the jury assumed, that, according to the opinion of the court, the facts of this case were precisely the same as the facts in the case giving rise to the language of the instruction, and that the principle therein declared was therefore peculiarly applicable and pertinent to the present case. In any event, as stated, the instruction, notwithstanding the particular source whence it was derived, was expressly made a part of the court's charge, and, as declared, it involved a clear instruction upon a vital question of fact in the case. And, since the effect of the instruction was to take from the jury one of the most vital questions of fact in the case, it cannot in our opinion be held that the error in giving it is one of those which may properly be said, after a review and consideration of the entire record, not to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. It is very true, as well we may suggest in the present connection, that if the defendant was not wholly irresponsible by reason of insanity when he attacked his wife, his assault upon her was unprovoked and of a most atrocious character; but, however vicious and unjustifiable his attack might have been, he was entitled to have his only defense, viz. insanity, passed upon and determined solely by the jury.

The judgment and the order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. In their petition counsel for the people say:

"On the outset of this matter we admit that the decision heretofore rendered in this case is correct in principle, but we claim that the people tried one case and the court decided another."

The point is that the defendant at the trial tried his case solely upon the theory of temporary insanity brought on by "recent indulgence in alcoholism," that such was the theory upon which the learned trial court instructed the jury, and that this court decided the case upon the erroneous supposition that the defense interposed by the defendant was that he was wholly irresponsible and not accountable in law for his act because of settled insanity superinduced by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors.

In proof of their position, counsel for the people call attention to certain language of the attorney for the defendant in his opening statement to the jury in which he declared:

"In other words, I think, gentlemen, we will show you beyond question in this case that Frank Goodrum, at the time this assault was made, knew nothing about it, that he was simply laboring under a case of delirium tremens, simply insane from the effect of alcohol that he had consumed in the week or two before that, and that he was in a state of mind not to be accountable for what he did. We will show you that the acts that he did in the manner in which this offense has been portrayed here were not natural, but unusual—an improbable way of doing that kind of thing; that he had nothing against his wife at any time. Now, I say, if we show you that, then that is a defense to this action."

Again, in his opening address, the attorney said:

"We will show you that he was nervous; that he had all the indications, gentlemen, that make up a case of alcoholic insanity, not drunkenness, gentlemen, but the effects of alcohol after the stimulant has died out—the effect on the nerves. * * * I think I will show you what I have said, and even more on that line."

Thus, it is contended, the counsel for the defendant expressly limited the purpose of proof upon the question of the mental condition of the accused at the time of the commission of the alleged assault to the establishment of the fact that he was suffering only from temporary mental derangement as the result of the use of intoxicating liquors, and this proposition is, it is asserted, emphasized and clearly sustained by the statement of counsel that he would show that the defendant, on the occasion of the assault, was suffering from an attack of delirium tremens, a condition which is a mere temporary effect of alcoholism, and not a characteristic of settled insanity caused by alcoholism.

[5] It is to be conceded that the attorney for the accused, in his opening statement to the jury, was not altogether happy in his expressions or the presentation of this case as he proposed to make it. Obviously mere temporary mental derangement resulting from the use of intoxicants, whether it manifests itself in the form of delirium tremens or in some milder form, cannot operate to absolve a person from liability for a criminal act, and testimony disclosing that precise mental state at the time the criminal act was committed is admissible only where the existence of a particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element of the crime charged, and then it may be considered by the jury, not as the predicate for the full exoneration of the accused, but solely to enable or assist them in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act. Pen. Code, § 22.

But we think that the opening statement of counsel is broader in its scope than the people ascribe to it. Whether the attorney for the defendant, in his opening statement, did or did not state to the jury in apt technical language that he proposed to rely upon the defense of insanity for the complete exoneration of the accused, it is clear to our minds that said statement clearly enough and so sufficiently shows that that was what he intended and endeavored therein to say. On numerous occasions, in the course of his statement, he declared that he would show or attempt to show that the defendant, when the assault was made, was insane, and that he was suffering from "alcoholic insanity," adding in one instance, when using the latter language, the statement, "not drunkenness," thus attempting to emphasize the proposition that he did not refer to mere temporary mental aberration or derangement, but to settled insanity, that the accused was "in a state of mind not to be accountable for what he did," and many other like expressions, all indicating with sufficient clearness that what he intended to say to the jury was that he proposed to prove that the defendant, by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors for a time prior to the assault, had become afflicted with insanity to a degree that, in a legal view, he was at the time of the assault wholly irresponsible, and not accountable for his act.

[6, 7] But a defendant in a criminal case, in making a defense and proving his case, is not necessarily required to remain strictly within the literal scope of the defense outlined by his counsel in his opening address to the jury. It may happen, as doubtless it has happened, that a lawyer may not succeed in stating his case to the jury in a strictly proper manner or in correct technical nomenclature. This may naturally occur in a criminal case where the attorney for the defendant, generally well learned in the law, has had no experience in the practice of the criminal law, and whose practical familiarity with the rules and doctrines of that branch of jurisprudence is decidedly limited. Hence that would be a strange and, indeed, a manifestly unjust rule which would, in a case where his defense had not been properly explained in the opening statement, preclude the defendant from making his case as he intended to prove it and as he had reason to believe he could only prove it as in complete answer to the charge against him. But, even assuming that the opening statement of counsel for the accused in this case is amenable to the interpretation to which it is subjected by the people, the trial court in this case, so far as the proof was concerned, accorded to the defendant the right to traverse a broader field than the said opening statement, as so interpreted, warranted; for it allowed opinion testimony of intimate acquaintances of the defendant that he was insane at the time or in near proximity to the time at which the assault occurred. This testimony, even if it may truly be said that the opening statement did not, squarely and broadly brought into the case as a vitally important issue therein the question whether the defendant was insane to the extent that he was so bereft of reason and the power of volition as to have rendered him wholly irresponsible for his act. And the fact that the testimony offered in support of that issue might have been insufficient in probative force to prove it by the requisite degree of proof, or the fact that other witnesses might have given testimony tending to show or even satisfactorily showing that the mental condition of the accused was only temporary and the result of mere drunkenness, could not have the effect of taking insanity from the case as one of the vital issues. The issue was there, and some testimony received in its support, and, as declared in our former opinion, and as is obviously true, it was wholly for the jury to say whether it was proved to a sufficient degree to entitle the defendant to an acquittal on the ground that thus he was not in a mental condition to be responsible legally for the assault. Hence it was, as we have held, error, prejudicial to the accused, for the court to have practically taken that question from the jury, and, moreover, under our view of the record as above pointed out, we may add to what we said in our former opinion that the court further erred to the serious detriment of the defendant by confining the jury to the consideration of the evidence upon the defendant's intoxication to the mere determination by them of the particular "purpose, motive, or intent" with which the accused committed the act. In other words, we think that an instruction on insanity brought on by the use of intoxicating liquors that will, in law, excuse a criminal act, should have been given, and that, such an instruction having been proposed by the defendant and disallowed, the action of the court in that respect constituted prejudicial error.

There can be no possible doubt that the trial court intended to and did, under its conception of the case, give the defendant a fair trial; but we think the scope of the defendant's position in the case was misapprehended by the prosecuting attorney, and that the court, erroneously adopting the misconceived theory of the people, made the errors above referred to and which we think undoubtedly demanded the reversal heretofore ordered.

Rehearing denied.

Ex parte SAUL. (Cr. 498.)

DIVORCE—289—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—POWER OF COURT TO AWARD.

Civ. Code, §§ 136, 138, provides that, though judgment of divorce is denied, the court may, in an action for divorce, provide for the maintenance by the husband of the wife and children, and during the pendency of the action, or at the final hearing, or at any time thereafter during the minority of any of the children, make such order for their custody, education, etc., as may seem necessary. Civ. Code, § 214, provides that when a husband and wife live separated without divorce, a court may award the custody of a minor child to either, etc., and Civ. Code, § 246, declares the considerations to guide the court in awarding the custody of a minor child. Held, that the jurisdiction of the superior court in divorce to award custody of minor children does not depend on the question of whether a divorce is granted or denied.

Application for habeas corpus by John E. Saul. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Davis & Rush, John S. Cooper, and Wm. A. Gaines, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Harry A. Chamberlain, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Habeas corpus. The petitioner is held in custody by the sheriff of Los Angeles county under an order made by the superior court of that county, wherein petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt, in that he willfully violated certain orders of that court. The return filed herein by the sheriff sets forth a commitment entered in a certain action, wherein John E. Saul was plaintiff and Emma Saul defendant. The commitment is in the form of an order signed by a judge of the superior court, which, after reciting that the plaintiff John E. Saul was then before the court in person and with counsel in response to an attachment and arrest for the alleged contempt, continues as follows:

"And it appearing to the satisfaction of the court, after a full hearing had, that heretofore, to wit, on the 25th day of March, 1908, a judgment was duly given and made and thereafter duly entered herein in Book 168, page 184, of Judgments, Records of the County of Los Angeles, State of California, and notice thereof was duly given to the plaintiff herein, John E. Saul, wherein and whereby it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows, to wit: 'That the care and custody of the minor children of plaintiff and defendant be and the same hereby is awarded as follows, to wit: The care and custody of Eddie Saul and of John Saul to the plaintiff herein; the care and custody of George Saul, Dinah Saul, and Walter Saul to the defendant herein.' And it further appearing to the court that subsequent to the entry and rendition of said judgment and heretofore, to wit, on the 18th day of February, 1916, and while the said George Saul and Dinah Saul were in the care and custody of the defendant herein, Emma Saul, pursuant to the terms of said judgment hereinabove referred to, said plaintiff herein, John E. Saul, did by stratagem and fraud and willfully and unlawfully and contrary to the provisions of said judgment, take the said George Saul and Dinah Saul from the custody and care of the defendant herein, Emma Saul, without her knowledge or consent and against her will, and took said George Saul and Dinah Saul without the jurisdiction of this court. And it further appearing to the satisfaction of the court that said plaintiff, John E. Saul, now has the custody and care of Dinah Saul, contrary and in disobedience to the judgment of this court hereinabove referred to. And it further appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the said plaintiff, John E. Saul, has refused, and still refuses, to return and deliver the care and custody of the said Dinah Saul, to the defendant herein, Emma Saul, in accordance with and pursuant to the terms of said judgment herein referred to and made a part hereof, and that the said failure to deliver the care and custody of said Dinah Saul consists in the omission to perform an act which is yet in the power of the said plaintiff, John E. Saul, to perform: Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff herein, John E. Saul, is guilty of a contempt of this court, and that he be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, until he shall have delivered the custody and care of Dinah Saul to the care and custody of Emma Saul, defendant herein. You are therefore commanded forthwith to convey the said John E. Saul to the jail of the county of Los Angeles, and there commit him until he shall have delivered the custody and care of Dinah Saul to Emma Saul, or be discharged according to law."

In the petition for the writ of habeas corpus it is stated that the action of John E. Saul against Emma Saul was tried upon a complaint of the plaintiff and cross-complaint of the defendant and the answers thereto, each of said parties seeking a divorce upon grounds stated in their several pleadings. Copies of those pleadings and of the findings and judgment are made part of the petition in this proceeding. It appears therefrom that the court found each party guilty of the misconduct alleged in the complaint and cross-complaint, respectively, and for that reason entered its decree denying a divorce. Thereupon and as a part of the same decree the court proceeded to award the care and custody of their minor children, some of them to the plaintiff and some of them to the defendant, in the terms quoted in the foregoing order of contempt. That decree was entered in March, 1908, and the minors George and Dinah Saul remained in the custody of their mother, Emma Saul, until they were taken from her by John E. Saul in February, 1916.

The allegations in the petition, showing that the action of Saul v. Saul was for a divorce and that the petition for divorce was refused, are not denied in the return filed herein; therefore those allegations must be taken as true. Ex parte Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 370, 77 Pac. 180; In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 114, 119, 99 Pac. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75; In re Collins, 151 Cal. 340, 342, 90 Pac. 827, 91 Pac. 397, 129 Am. St. Rep. 122. Or if formal proof thereof be necessary, it undoubtedly could readily be supplied in this case. Counsel for respondent in effect admits the facts as stated, but merely relies upon the point that we are limited to an examination of the return. Holding, as we do, that the facts alleged in the petition, showing denial of a divorce in the principal action, are subject to proof herein, we shall, in view of the statements of counsel, consider them as admitted. This will bring us to the petitioner's main proposition, which is, that where in an action for divorce the judgment denies a divorce, the court is without power, then or thereafter in that action, to make an order affecting the custody of children.

Sections 136 and 138 of the Civil Code are found in article 4 of the chapter concerning divorce, which article contains sundry general provisions relating to divorce actions. Section 136, under the heading, "Maintenance by Husband, where Judgment is Denied," reads as follows:

"Though judgment of divorce is denied, the court may, in an action for divorce, provide for the maintenance by the husband, of the wife and children of the marriage, or any of them."

Section 138, under the heading "Custody and Maintenance of Minors during Actions for Divorce," reads as follows:

"In actions for divorce the court may, during the pendency of the action, or at the final hearing or at any time thereafter during the minority of any of the children of the marriage, make such order for the custody, care, education, maintenance and support of such minor children as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time modify or vacate the same."

Section 214 of the Civil Code occurs in the title on "Parent and Child" and in the chapter entitled "Children by Birth." Section 214 says:

"When a husband and wife live in a state of separation, without being divorced, any court of competent jurisdiction, upon application of either, if an inhabitant of this state, may inquire into the custody of any unmarried minor child of the marriage, and may award the custody of such child to either, for such time and under such regulations as the case may require. The decision of the court must be guided by the rules prescribed in section two hundred and forty-six."

Section 246 declares the considerations by which the court is to be guided in awarding the custody of a minor. Where the custody of children is to be awarded, whether in a divorce action or in a separate proceeding under section 214, the superior court is the court having jurisdiction of those matters. It thus appears that there are two classes of actions or proceedings wherein superior courts have jurisdiction to determine the custody of a child at the instance of one or both of its parents. In addition to this, it may be observed that where children are brought before a court in habeas corpus proceedings involving adverse claims of right to their custody, the court is not obliged to recognize either parent as entitled to the custody as of right, but may take into consideration such facts as are necessary to enable the court to determine what are the best interests of the children.

The petitioner does not deny the existence of these powers and judicial processes as provided by law. His contention is that the power of the court with respect to the custody of children in a divorce action is wholly derived from the statutes, and that by the terms of the Code sections to which we have referred the right to award custody of children in a divorce action is strictly limited as an incidental power to be exercised only when a divorce is granted. On the other side it is contended that the jurisdiction exercised by the superior court in divorce cases is a part of its general chancery jurisdiction which includes the care of children as wards of the court; that since the parents of these children came before the court as a court of equity demanding relief on behalf of their children, and since they might have done that same thing by filing petitions for that purpose without asking for a divorce, no good reason appears why the court, though it denies the divorce, should turn the parties entirely out of court in order that they might come back into the same court to demand separately the same relief as was sought in this action so far as the children are concerned. Such was the opinion of the Supreme Court of Arkansas, in Horton v. Horton, 75 Ark. 22, 86 S. W. 824, 5 Ann. Cas. 91. In that case, as here, no separation of the family was brought about by the court's order. The court merely recognized and found the facts as they existed, and then made an order for the well-being of the children.

The decisions upon this subject are conflicting. In some states it has been held that where the divorce is denied, custody of the children may be awarded. Horton v. Horton, supra; Hoskins v. Hoskins (Ky.) 89 S. W. 478; Knoll v. Knoll, 114 La. 703, 38 South. 523. Decisions cited to the contrary effect are Redding v. Redding (N. J. Ch.) 85 Atl. 716; Thomas v. Thomas, 250 Ill. 354, 95 N. E. 345, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1158, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 344. See, also, Davis v. Davis, 75 N. Y. 221, 226, Robinson v. Robinson, 146 App. Div. 533, 131 N. Y. Supp. 260, and Light v. Light, 124 App. Div. 567, 108 N. Y. Supp. 931. In Thomas v. Thomas, supra, there is a well-reasoned dissenting opinion by Carter, J., closing as follows:

"The parties being before a court of equity, what more proper time can there be to adjudicate the rights of the parents to the custody of the children? 2 Nelson on Divorce and Separation, p. 979. The court having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties to the suit at the instance and by the prayer of plaintiff in error, I cannot reach any other conclusion than that, on the plainest principles of equity, she should be precluded from questioning the jurisdiction of the court which she herself has invoked."

Section 138, Civil Code, quoted above, recognizes the power of the court, in an action for divorce, to make orders concerning the custody of the children of the marriage, either during the pendency of the action or at the final hearing or at any time thereafter during the minority of the children. If the court at the final hearing, in making its decree granting or refusing a divorce, is silent with respect to the custody of children and fails to make any provision for this custody and care, it would seem that this is a complete and final determination of that case. But if the court, in view of the facts found by it, deems that the welfare of the children requires that some order for the custody and maintenance of the children be made and makes that order as a part of its decree, or in specific terms retains the case for the purposes of such custody and maintenance, we find no sufficient reason for holding that such action by the court is beyond its powers as declared in section 138. The section itself does not state any limitation of its effect to cases in which divorce is denied. If such limitation be imposed upon the language of the statute, it must be a limitation by construction. But it has been held that the section is designed for the protection of children, and should be liberally construed. Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 341, 350, 98 Pac. 32. It seems to us that this rule of liberal construction may fairly be applied to the question here presented.

The petition herein, and the sheriff's return, show that the petitioner is also detained in custody by virtue of another commitment for a second contempt of the authority of the superior court, in a matter arising out of the same divorce action of Saul v.

Saul. In view of our decision upon the matters herein discussed, it is not necessary to make a further statement, which would involve the same questions and lead to the same result.

The writ is discharged, and petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. HOWARD. (Cr. 345.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 9, 1916.)

1. LARCENY $\S$ 40(4)—PRINCIPAL AND ACCESSORY—CONVICTION.

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 971, abolishing the distinction between accessory before the fact and principal, defendant could only be shown to be a principal in the larceny charged by showing that he aided and abetted in its commission, and could not be convicted if he aided and abetted an embezzlement or some other offense.

2. EMBEZZLEMENT $\S$ 16—LARCENY $\S$ 15(1)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSES.

Where one honestly receives goods upon trust and afterwards fraudulently converts them to his own use, he is guilty of embezzlement; but if he obtains possession fraudulently with intention to convert the same to his own use, and the owner does not part with the title, the offense is larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 17, 18, 21; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 16; Larceny, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 15(1).]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Embezzlement; Larceny.]

3. LARCENY $\S$ 14(1)—REQUISITES—INTENT.

To constitute an act of taking the money of an employer larceny, it must appear that the possession of the money was obtained by the employé fraudulently, or by means of some trick, conspiracy, or artifice, with the felonious intent of converting it to his own use.

4. LARCENY $\S$ 68(1)—PRINCIPAL—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the circumstances indicating that defendant aided and abetted his wife in the felonious taking of the money of her employer, together with their flight, warranted an inference that he did so was a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 180, 181; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 68(1).]

5. LARCENY $\S$ 40(4)—EVIDENCE—"CLERK" OR "SERVANT."

Evidence in a prosecution for grand larceny, committed in aiding and abetting his wife in her taking money from her employer, held to show that the wife, while in the service of her employer, was a "clerk" or "servant" of the corporation, and that the money she was charged with taking from the corporation came into her "control and care by virtue of her employment as such clerk or servant," so that her offense was embezzlement, within Pen. Code, $\S$ 508.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 110, 125; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 40(4).]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Clerk; Servant.]

6. EMBEZZLEMENT —13—CLERK OR SERVANT —“PERMISSION”—“AUTHORITY.”

Under Pen. Code, § 508, declaring every clerk or servant, fraudulently appropriating to his own use any property of another coming into his control by virtue of such employment, to be guilty of embezzlement, the “permission” to an employé to handle the money in a cash register gave her “authority” under the employment to receive the money for goods sold and to make change if required out of money in the register, since “permission” to do an act is “authority” to do it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. §§ 11, 12; Dec. Dig. —13.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Authority; Permission.]

7. LARCENY —40(4) — PROSECUTION — VARIANCE.

In a prosecution as a principal in the crime of grand larceny by reason of aiding and abetting his wife in the commission thereof, proof that the crime committed by the wife was that of embezzlement, as defined by Pen. Code, § 508, was a fatal variance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 110, 125; Dec. Dig. —40(4).]

8. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION —32(2)— FORMAL REQUISITES — STATUTE — CONCLUSION.

Although Pen. Code, §§ 809, 951, require an indictment to conclude by charging the offense to be contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute, etc., an information, by one count, charging larceny of money, by the second the embezzlement of such amount, and by the third, the receiving of such money knowing it to have been stolen, and ending with such conclusion, was sufficient, as such conclusion is merely a matter of form.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 124; Dec. Dig. —32(2).]

9. JURY —136(8) — CHALLENGES — NUMBER —COUNTS OF INFORMATION.

Under Pen. Code, § 1070, entitling a defendant in a prosecution for an offense not punishable with death or life imprisonment to 10 peremptory challenges, defendant charged by one count of an information, with larceny of money, by another count with an embezzlement of it, and by the third count with the receiving of it knowing it to have been stolen, was not entitled to exercise 10 peremptory challenges on each count, but only 10 in all.

10. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION —132(5)— ELECTION OF COUNTS—STATUTE.

Under Pen. Code, § 954, permitting the charge of different offenses under separate counts relating to the same act, and not requiring the prosecution to elect between different counts, where an information in three counts charged the larceny of money, the embezzlement of such money, and the receiving of such money knowing it to have been stolen, it was not necessary for the district attorney, before offering proof, to elect on which count he intended to rely for a conviction, since it was proper for him to prove the facts and ask for a conviction of that offense appropriate to the facts proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 444; Dec. Dig. —132(5).]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

W. A. Howard, true name Walter H. Allen, was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Cross & Lynch, of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The information is in three counts, each stating a different offense, viz. the first charging the larceny of $305 in money, the second the embezzlement of said sum, and the third the receiving of said money knowing it to have been previously stolen.

The attack upon the verdict is upon numerous grounds, which, generally stated, are that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the information, in disallowing certain voir dire questions by the defendant to a certain juror, in denying the challenge by the defendant of a certain venireman upon the ground of actual bias, in refusing to require the people to make an election of the particular count of the several set out in the information upon which they intended to rely, in refusing to allow the defendant 30 peremptory challenges, the theory being that he was entitled to 10 such challenges upon each of the offenses stated in the information, in its rulings upon questions involving the legal propriety of the admissibility of certain evidence, and in disallowing certain instructions proffered by the accused. It is further insisted that, if the defendant was guilty of any crime whatsoever, it was not that of grand larceny, of which the jury convicted him, but that of embezzlement. This last point necessarily involves, and its solution depends upon, the question whether the evidence supports the verdict.

Under the several heads above specified, many specific objections to the legal soundness of the result reached at the trial are here interposed and argued in the briefs. Such of these as we deem entitled to special notice and review we shall consider.

The facts, as gleaned from the evidence, may be summarized as follows: In the early part of the month of August, 1915, the defendant and his wife arrived at the city of Stockton and, under the name of Howard, took rooms at a house known as the “Adams Apartments.” They were strangers in Stockton, and at said apartments represented themselves as being husband and wife. A few days thereafter they moved to a rooming house in said city, known as the “McPhee Apartments,” where they remained until their departure from Stockton, on the 30th day of said month of August. While stopping at the last-named apartments, and about the middle of the month named, “Mrs. Howard" secured employment as a stenographer with a commercial college in said city known as the Western School of Commerce. Said college was incorporated, and at the time of the employment of Mrs. Howard, one John R. Humphreys was president of the corporation and principal of the school, and as such was authorized to employ such assistants as were found necessary to aid in carrying on the business of the institution. When she applied for employment she represented to Humphreys that her name was "Miss Helen Burns," and under that name she accepted the employment. "Mrs. Howard" worked at a desk located in the office of the secretary of the corporation. At about the hour of 12 o'clock, noon, on the 30th day of August, 1915, she left the office of the secretary and did not return. A short time after her departure and after the time at which she should have returned to the office and resumed the discharge of her duties, it was discovered upon investigation that the sum of $305 was missing from the cash register, which was kept in the office of the secretary.

It transpired that, on the day last mentioned, Howard and his wife met at a point on one of the streets of Stockton and hired a taxicab, in which they were driven to Lodi, a distance of a few miles north of Stockton. At Lodi, Mrs. Howard purchased some wearing apparel at one of the stores in said town, and Howard, at another store, bought a suit of clothes and a suit case. The clothes worn by him to Lodi he left at the store at which he purchased and donned the new suit. Howard also went to the bank at Lodi and exchanged some gold for paper money. Within a brief time thereafter, Howard and his wife at Lodi boarded a north-bound train and went to Sacramento, at which place they bought tickets for the East, and on the said 30th day of August together left for the East. They were later arrested in the East and returned to Stockton. While in the East, and before their arrest, the defendant, whose true name is Walter Howard Allen, gave his name and registered at hotels variously as "Taylor," "Churchill," and "Howard."

There is, in the record, testimony from which the jury could justly have inferred, as perhaps they did conclude, that the defendant down to the day upon which he with his wife left Stockton, was wholly without financial means, with the exception of $5 in gold from which he paid for some drinks at a bar for himself and one R. J. Richardson, who, with his wife, also occupied rooms at the McPhee Apartments, and to whom the defendant explained that he had received the money from his wife.

It further appears that Mrs. Howard, a day or two before the date of her departure from Stockton, took to her apartments a bank book which was the property of the institution by which she was then employed, and that while she and the defendant were eating their lunch on that occasion, Mrs.

Richardson, wife of the party of that name above referred to, came into their apartments, whereupon the defendant picked up the bank book from the table where it had been placed by Mrs. Howard, and, addressing Mrs. Richardson, remarked:

"Look what my little girl has banked to-day. Three hundred and sixteen dollars! Wouldn't that make a fine trip?"

To this Mrs. Howard rejoined:

"No, the straight and narrow path for me."

It was further shown that, on two several occasions, Mrs. Howard asked the secretary of the corporation, J. W. Rousch, whether she "should take money received at the school to the bank," and the secretary replied that she should not.

It was shown, and, in fact, the defendant admitted, that, within an hour before he and his wife left Stockton for Lodi, he held a conversation with his wife through the telephone from a saloon which he had been in the habit of frequenting while in Stockton, that within brief time thereafter his wife called and talked with him over the same telephone, and that immediately thereupon the defendant left the saloon, met his wife, and immediately left with her for Lodi in the manner above described.

Certain statements made to the sheriff by the defendant after his arrest were received in evidence at the behest of the people. Thus it was shown that, among other declarations, the defendant said that he could not be convicted of any offense which might be charged against him without the testimony of his wife disclosing that he was implicated in the crime, and that his wife could not testify against him without his consent. He further asseverated his innocence of any connection with the commission of the crime by his wife, and declared that he had no knowledge before she took the money that she intended to do so. He admitted, however, that, when he met his wife just before leaving Stockton, she told him that she had taken the money, and that he then said to her that she had better "beat it," by which he meant to say that it was better for her to get away from Stockton. He also explained that he registered at hotels in the East under fictitious names only because he desired to protect his wife and so prevent her apprehension, and not because he was himself conscious of having been guilty of committing any wrong in connection with the transaction. These declarations were, as before stated, proved or brought into the record by the people as having been extra-judicially made by the accused.

Thus we have reproduced in substance all the testimony introduced by the people bearing upon the defendant's connection with the crime committed by his wife.

[1, 2] It will not, of course, be disputed that, since the defendant himself did not actually take the money, it must be made to appear, before a conviction of larceny can stand against him, that the taking of the money by his wife constituted larceny. In other words, since the defendant can only be made out a principal in the crime charged by showing that he aided and abetted in the commission thereof (Pen. Code, § 971), he obviously cannot be convicted of larceny if the crime in the commission of which he aided and abetted is that of embezzlement or some other offense than that of larceny. The distinction between embezzlement, in a general sense, and larceny is thus stated in People v. Tomlinson, 102 Cal. 19, 36 Pac. 506:

"* * * If one honestly receives goods upon trust, and afterward fraudulently converts them to his own use, he is guilty of embezzlement; * * * if he obtains possession fraudulently, with intent to convert the same to his own use, and the owner does not part with the title, the offense is larceny."

Section 503 of the Penal Code defines embezzlement as "the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted."

Section 508 of the same Code reads:

"Every clerk, agent, or servant of any person who fraudulently appropriates to his own use, or secretes with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, any property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such clerk, agent, or servant, is guilty of embezzlement."

[3] Thus it will be observed that, to constitute the act of taking the money by the wife of the defendant larceny, it must be true and shown that the possession of said money was obtained by her fraudulently or by means of some trick, conspiracy, or artifice, with the felonious intent of converting the same to her own use. If, for illustration, it was clear that Mrs. Howard (or Allen) had designedly and fraudulently and for the purpose and with the felonious intent of taking the money from the possession of the School of Commerce, to be converted by her to her own use, sought employment with said school so as to place herself in a position in which she could the more readily execute her evil or felonious design and intent, then, she having under such circumstances taken the money, the crime would be larceny. People v. Rae, 66 Cal. 423, 424, 6 Pac. 1, 56 Am. Rep. 102. On the other hand, if honestly she received possession of the money on trust (People v. Tomlinson, supra), or if, as a duly employed clerk, agent, or servant of the school, the money came "into her control or care by virtue of her employment as such clerk, agent or servant," and she fraudulently appropriated such money to her own use, or secreted it with the intention of appropriating it to her own use (Pen. Code, § 508), then she is guilty of embezzlement and not of larceny of the money (People v. Tomlinson, supra).

[4, 5] There are, it will be observed from the testimony presented by the people and thus far and above stated herein, but two circumstances, aside from the fact of flight, which tend in any measure to indicate that the accused aided and abetted his wife in the commission of the felonious taking of the money, viz.: (1) The remark of the defendant that the amount of money shown by the bank book to be on deposit in a bank in the name of the school would "make a fine trip"; (2) the fact of the telephonic communications between the defendant and his wife while he was at the saloon referred to just prior to the time at which he met her and the two together left for Lodi. Whether these circumstances, together with that of flight, were sufficient to warrant a substantial inference that the defendant aided or abetted or advised his wife to take the money was, of course, a question for the jury. And, conceding that thus the jury might have justly concluded that he did so aid and abet his wife in whatever crime her act constituted, still it will certainly not be contended that those circumstances showed that, prior to her employment by the School of Commerce, there was a conspiracy or understanding between them that she was to seek and, if possible, secure such employment for the purpose and with the design and intent of making available to her an opportunity for the felonious asportation of the money of said school. In other words, it will not be seriously claimed that those circumstances, whatever may be their probative value in some other direction, show that the taking of the money was the result of a fraudulent and felonious design of the defendant and his wife, conceived before she secured employment with the school. The fact of flight and the assumption by him of fictitious names after he left California are the strongest circumstances which were presented against him. Both these facts, when proved constitute, it is to be conceded, strong incriminatory circumstances against an accused. But it will not be claimed that either can have the effect of disclosing, or of serving as the test for determining, the legal character or nature of the crime committed. In this case it cannot, of course, be determined from those circumstances when the design to commit the crime was formed—whether before Mrs. Howard went to work for the school or after she entered upon the discharge of her duties as an employé of the school. Thus it is clear that whether the crime committed by the wife was larceny or embezzlement does not appear from the testimony thus far considered. We are therefore required to examine and consider the testimony disclosing the circumstances attending her employment and showing the scope and extent of her duties and authority as an employé of the school to determine the legal character of the crime committed by her. Upon this question, the only testimony brought into the case was that given by the witness Humphreys, principal of the school and president of the corporation into which the institution had been organized.

It will be recalled that Humphreys testified that he, as president of the corporation, conducted the negotiations culminating in the employment of Mrs. Allen. He further testified that he employed her as a stenographer; that the desk at which she performed her duties was located in the office of the secretary of the corporation; that the corporation kept a stock of "petty merchandise," such as pencils, paper, etc.; that among the duties assigned to Mrs. Howard was that of selling the articles of merchandise mentioned, to receive the money therefor, and to deposit the same in the cash register, which was kept in the secretary's office; that she, by reason of the authority so conferred on and exercised by her, had—

"free access to the cash, and made change, sold the merchandise, and had general authority that a stenographer has in an office. Q. She sold merchandise? A. Yes, sir; had free access to the drawer. Q. Received money from the sale of merchandise? A. Certainly, just as any other employé would. Q. You state that this money that you allege was embezzled from the Western School of Commerce was in the till—the cash register? A. Yes, sir. I do not know that all the money she took was in the cash register, because there was other money in the room which was not in the cash register. Q. How much money was in the room at that time? * * * A. Approximately $1,300 to $1,500, * * * a large portion of which was in the cash register."

No doubt exists in our minds that the foregoing testimony clearly shows that Mrs. Allen, while in the service of the school, was a clerk or servant of the corporation within the meaning of section 508 of the Penal Code, and that the money which she is charged to have taken from the corporation came into her "control and care by virtue of her employment as such clerk or servant," there can be no possible room for doubt, in our opinion. She was, by virtue of her employment, authorized to receive money in exchange for goods sold, and to make change from the moneys in the cash register when necessary. In short, as Humphreys testified, she had free access to the cash register, with authority to handle the money deposited therein for any purpose within the scope of her authority as a clerk or employé. The money in the cash register was, to the extent of her authority and the use to which it was necessary for her to put it as such employé, as clearly and as much intrusted to her control and care as the money in a bank is intrusted to the control and care of the cashier, or the money received into the cash till of a general store is intrusted to the control and care of the sales clerks in such store. If a sales clerk in an establishment dealing in general merchandise, during working hours and while actually performing his duties as such clerk, were to fraudulently take and convert to his own use money from the till, to which he had authorized access, and in which it was his duty to place money received for merchandise, and from which it was within the scope of his authority to take money for the purpose of making change, no one would be found to doubt for a moment that his act would constitute embezzlement. The case stated is in no respect different from the present case under the facts as proved at the trial and above stated in substance.

[6] Emphasis is, however, placed upon the statement of the witness Humphreys, in one part of his testimony, that Mrs. Howard was not given authority but merely permission to handle the money in the cash register. But we cannot perceive that that statement in any way shows a qualification of the authority of Mrs. Howard, under her employment, to receive the money for goods sold and to make change, if required, out of the moneys in the register. "Permission" to do an act is "authority" to do it. Every agent is authorized to do whatever the terms of his agency permit him to do, and, stating the proposition conversely, is permitted to perform any act within his authority as agent. Moreover, the contractual relation between the principal and the agent must be determined by the facts upon which the relation is founded, and not by the conclusion of the one or the other of the parties from the facts.

[7] Under the testimony of Humphreys, and in view of the fact that, as above shown, there is no proof whatever showing that the act of Mrs. Howard in taking the money was the result of a conspiracy between her and the defendant, conceived and planned before she entered upon the discharge of her duties under her employment with the corporation, it is clear to us that the crime which the evidence appears to sufficiently show was committed by Mrs. Howard was that of embezzlement, as defined by section 508 of the Penal Code. It therefore follows as a matter of law that there exists a variance between the charge of which the defendant was found guilty and the proof. In other words, the conviction of the defendant of grand larceny under the evidence presented by the record cannot be sustained, since, as we have pointed out, he cannot legally be adjudged guilty of an offense different from that in the commission of which he has aided and abetted.

The conclusion thus arrived at is, of course, decisive of the case, and therefore, so far as is concerned the result so reached, it is wholly unnecessary to consider other points made by the defendant. But, in view of a probable retrial of the case, we deem it proper to review some of those points.

[8] 1. There was no prejudicial error in the order overruling the demurrer to the information. The particular ground of objection to the information arises from the absence therefrom at the end of each count the conclusion, "contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute," etc. At the common law, in cases where several different offenses or different statements of the same offense were set up in different counts, and where in such cases the rule was disregarded and the form omitted as so required, the omission was held sufficient to vitiate the accusatory pleading. And there are some cases which hold that under the code system each count must be followed by the conclusion mentioned. In this case, after stating the different offenses, the information ends with said conclusion; and we think that this was sufficient. The conclusion referred to, although required by the statute (Pen. Code, §§ 809 and 951), involves a conclusion of law and is a mere matter of form and not of substance. If an indictment or information states facts disclosing that a public offense has been committed, the statement that the commission of such offense is "contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state," etc., adds nothing to the force of the charge as made, and conveys no information which does not necessarily inhere in or proceed from the mere statement of the offense itself. Of course, we are not thus to be understood as holding that the form in which the Legislature has declared that an indictment or information shall be molded need not be adhered to. To the contrary, we hold that the form as prescribed must, or should, be observed. What we have said relative to the proposition is only for the purpose of showing that the objection against the information here goes only to a matter of form, and that, since that pleading does end with the conclusion required by the statutes, the effect of the omission to end each count with such conclusion, even if necessary in a strict view of the statute, could not, had he been convicted of the proper crime, justly be held to have affected or impinged upon the substantial rights of the accused, or in any degree deprived him of a full and fair trial on the charge of which he was so convicted. While section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is not applicable to this proposition inasmuch as the cause must be reversed, still the views above expressed are in harmony with the spirit of that provision of our organic law, and are, moreover, in perfect harmony, not only with the spirit, but with the letter, of section 960 of the Penal Code.

[2] 2. The contention that the defendant was entitled to exercise 10 peremptory challenges on each of the counts, or 30 in all, is wholly destitute of merit. The ultimate object of the law in authorizing the statement of different offenses in the same indictment or information is to prevent mistrials, and experience has demonstrated that this can in certain cases the better be accomplished by setting forth several different offenses of the same general class, thus so framing the accusatory pleading as to authorize, where the evidence justified it, a conviction of the accused of the precise crime which the evidence shows he has committed. It often being difficult to determine, until the facts are all brought out and have been presented in regular and concrete form, what particular crime of several belonging to the same general class has been committed. And, both in theory and in fact, it is only that particular offense, if any at all, which the evidence discloses that the accused has committed upon which he is to be tried or, in the last analysis, is tried; for, very clearly, he can, in contemplation of law, neither be tried upon, nor convicted under, all the counts. It follows that the accused was legally entitled to exercise the right to interpose but 10 peremptory challenges. Pen. Code, § 1070.

[10] 3. It was not necessary for the district attorney to make an election, before offering proof, of one particular count, of the three stated in the information, upon which he intended to rely for a conviction. As we have already shown, it was the proper practice for the district attorney to prove the facts and then ask for a conviction of the accused of that offense of the several charged legally appropriate to the facts so proved. Indeed, if, as the attorney for the accused contends is true, it was legally incumbent upon the people to make an election before any evidence was presented, the very primary purpose of section 954 of the Penal Code would be defeated. There would, in such case, be no efficacy in charging different offenses.

There are no other points to which special attention need be given.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment and the order are reversed.

MORE v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 12, 1916.)

1. COUNTIES ⇐3—AMENDMENT OF CHARTER—DIRECT REPEAL OF SECTIONS.

The amendment to the charter of San Bernardino county approved by the electors in November, 1914, and by the Legislature by resolution filed with the secretary of state January 30, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1727), was fatally defective as an attempted direct repeal of any sections of the original charter, adopted at the general election of 1912, and approved by the Legislature (St. 1913, p. 1652 et seq.), it being impossible to determine what sections of the charter were intended to be repealed.

2. COUNTIES ⇐3—AMENDMENT OF CHARTER—IMPLIED REPEAL.

Such amendment, providing that all county officers, other than supervisors, shall be elected at each general election, is effective, in that it adds to the charter a new section, and so impliedly repeals the provisions of the original charter (St. 1913, p. 1652 et seq.), which relate to the same subject-matter and are in conflict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. § 3.]

3. COUNTIES § 3—AMENDMENT OF CHARTER—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

There is no inconsistency between the amendment, providing that all county officers, other than supervisors, shall be elected at each general election, and article 2, sections 1 and 2, of the original charter (St. 1913, p. 1652 et seq.), designating the county officers, repealing sections 1 and 2 by implication.

4. COUNTIES § 3—COUNTY OFFICERS—"SHERIFF"—"CORONER"—STATUTE.

The "sheriff" of San Bernardino county, under County Charter, art. 2, § 1 (St. 1913, p. 1652 et seq.), providing that the sheriff shall be ex officio coroner, by virtue of his appointment as sheriff, becomes coroner of the county, and, when performing the duties of a coroner, he is, in contemplation of law, the coroner of the county as distinctly and completely as any other duly appointed or elected person would be, when lawfully performing those duties, the office of "coroner" being separate from that of sheriff, with separate duties provided by law.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Coroner; Sheriff.]

5. COUNTIES § 3—AMENDMENT TO CHARTER—EFFECT—STATUTE.

Under Pol. Code, § 4013, providing for certain county officers and such other officers as may be provided by law, the amendment to the charter of San Bernardino county (St. 1915, p. 1727), providing that all county officers, other than supervisors, shall be elected, as provided by general law, and that their powers and duties shall be such as provided by general law, did not abolish the offices of county purchasing agent and county highway commissioner, created by articles 4 and 6 of the original charter (St. 1913, p. 1652 et seq.), the charter still having effect as to what county offices exist and their powers and duties.

6. COUNTIES § 3—CHARTER PROVISIONS—SUPERSESSION BY POLITICAL CODE—CONSTITUTION.

In view of Const. art. 11, § 7½, authorizing the framing of charters by counties, subdivision 4, providing that county charters shall provide for the powers and duties of boards of supervisors and for the consolidation and segregation of county offices, the provisions of the charter of San Bernardino county (St. 1913, p. 1652 et seq.), as amended by St. 1915, p. 1727, providing that all county officers, other than supervisors, shall be elected at each general election, with respect to the consolidation of county offices, are not superseded by Pol. Code, §§ 4017, 4018, providing that boards of supervisors of counties may, by ordinance, consolidate the duties of certain officers.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst and J. W. Curtis, Judges.

Application for writ of mandamus by Hiram H. More against the Board of Supervisors of the County of San Bernardino and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rex B. Goodcell and Robt. M. McHargue, both of San Bernardino, for appellant. T. W. Duckworth, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In this proceeding the plaintiff applied for a writ of mandamus, requiring the defendants to appoint some fit and proper person to the office of county coroner of the county of San Bernardino, the plaintiff claiming that there is a vacancy in that office. From a judgment in favor of the defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 7½, art. 11, of the Constitution of California, the charter for the county was adopted at the general election of 1912, and thereafter approved by the Legislature. Stats. 1913, p. 1652 et seq. That charter consists of seven articles. Six of those articles contained sections numbered 4, 5, and 6. Section 4 of article 1 made it the duty of the board of supervisors, at its first regular meeting after noon of the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1915, to appoint each and all of the county officers provided for by the charter or by general law for a term of four years. Sections 5 and 6 of that article relate to the appointment and duties of deputies in the several county offices.

At the general election held in November, 1914, the electors of San Bernardino county approved an amendment to the county charter, which amendment was duly approved by the Legislature by resolution which was filed with the secretary of state January 30, 1915. Stats. 1915, p. 1727. That amendment, without naming any article of the charter, purported to strike from the charter "sections 4, 5, and 6 of said charter," and insert in lieu thereof the following amendment, to be known as section 4 thereof, to wit:

"Section four (4): All county officers other than supervisors of said county shall be elected at each general election by the qualified electors of said county as is now or may be hereafter provided by general law, and all deputies and assistants to such county officers shall be appointed as is now or may be hereafter provided by general law; and the powers and duties of such officers, deputies and assistants shall be such as are now or may be hereafter provided by general law, and any part of this charter in conflict herewith is hereby repealed."

Section 1 of article 2 of the charter provides for certain county officers, including a sheriff and a coroner. Section 2 of the same article provides that:

"The following county officers are hereby consolidated: * * * (b) The sheriff shall be ex officio coroner." Stats. 1913, p. 1656.

Section 4 of article 2 provides that:

"Each county officer shall have the powers and perform the duties now or hereafter prescribed by general law as to such officer, except as otherwise provided by this charter; and shall have and perform such other powers and duties as are or shall be prescribed by this charter."

[1-4] As an attempted direct repeal of any sections of the original charter, the amendment is fatally defective because it is impossible to determine what sections of the charter are intended to be repealed. But the amendment is effective in that it adds to the charter a new section, and by so doing impliedly repeals those provisions contained in the original charter which relate to the same subject-matter as the new section and are in conflict therewith. The county officers appointed in January, 1915, will continue to hold their offices until the time regularly appointed by general law for the election of county officers, at which time their successors will be elected the same as if the present officers had been elected under the general law. The charter amendment does not state what county officers shall exist in San Bernardino county. Those officers are designated by sections 1 and 2 of article 2, and there is no inconsistency between the amendment and these two sections which would require us to hold that the latter are repealed by implication. The office of coroner is a separate office from that of sheriff, with separate duties and powers as provided by law. The sheriff by virtue of his appointment as sheriff becomes coroner of the county; he is "ex officio coroner." When performing the duties of a coroner he is in contemplation of law the coroner of the county as distinctly and completely as any other duly appointed or elected person would be when lawfully performing those duties. Upon the facts of this case we think that there is no sound reason for holding that the office of coroner of San Bernardino county is at this time vacant.

[5] Counsel for plaintiff insist that the amendment, in providing that all county officers other than supervisors shall be elected as is now or may be hereafter provided by general law, and that the powers and duties of such officers shall be such as are now or may be hereafter provided for by general law, intended to refer only to those officers provided for by general law; and that thereby the amendment eliminated some county officers provided for by the charter. Article 4 of the charter provides for a county purchasing agent and article 6 for a county highway commissioner, defining their powers and duties. It is contended that since the general law does not provide any powers or duties for either of these officers, the offices no longer exist. From this it is argued that the provisions of the charter as to consolidation of certain county offices are no longer effective because such consolidation affects directly and materially the powers and duties of the officer. But we think that the consequences thus contended for do not follow. As we have above suggested, the powers and duties pertaining to the office of coroner are not affected by providing that the person appointed as sheriff shall also be the coroner. Neither do we see any reason for holding here that the offices of county purchasing agent and county highway commissioner are abolished by this amendment. The general law of the state provides for certain county officers, among whom are a sheriff and a coroner, and "such other officers as may be provided by law." Pol. Code, § 4013. The charter of San Bernardino county is a law. If by general law the Legislature shall hereafter prescribe the duties of a county purchasing agent or of a county highway commissioner, such designation of the duties of the office will (under the above-quoted amendment of 1915) supersede the description of those duties as now contained in the charter. In the meantime the designation of those duties as contained in the charter is not in conflict with any general law, since the general law has not spoken upon the subject. For these reasons we do not agree with counsel for plaintiff in their contention that the charter is no longer of any effect either as to what county offices exist or as to how they shall be filled or as to what shall be their powers and duties.

[6] Our attention is directed to the fact that in sections 4017 and 4018 of the Political Code it has been enacted that boards of supervisors of counties may, by ordinance, consolidate the duties of certain officers named in section 4017, and that the consolidation of the duties of sheriff and coroner is not included therein. So it is urged that the effect of the provision of the charter that the sheriff shall be ex officio coroner is to impose upon him duties not imposed upon him by general law, and that under the very terms of the 1915 amendment the powers and duties of sheriff are limited to those provided by general law. Some light may be thrown upon this matter by referring to section 7½, art. 11, of the state Constitution, which authorizes the framing of charters by counties for their own government. It is therein provided (subdivision 4) that county charters shall provide—"for the powers and duties of boards of supervisors and all other county officers, for their removal and for the consolidation and segregation of county offices, and for the manner of filling all vacancies occurring therein; provided, that the provisions of such charters relating to the powers and duties of boards of supervisors and all other county officers shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

Thus it is seen that when the 1915 amendment of the San Bernardino county charter states that the powers and duties of the county officers shall be such as are or may be provided by general law, it merely repeats in substantially the same words the terms of the Constitution on the same subject. Therefore it is the Constitution rather than the charter which constitutes the effective declaration of law upon the subject; a declaration which in the same paragraph, above quoted, of the Constitution authorizes county charters to provide for the consolidation of county offices. Having in view these provisions of the Constitution, we think that even under the charter amendment there is no valid ground for holding that the charter provisions with respect to the consolidation of county offices are now superseded by the terms of section 4017 of the Political Code upon the same subject.

The judgment is affirmed.

JONES v. CALIFORNIA DEVELOPMENT
CO. et al. (L. A. 3796.)

Rehearing Denied Nov. 20, 1916.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES § 171(1) —
UNUSUAL FLOW—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

Rights of owners in the Imperial Valley, during the Salton Sea overflow by diversion of the Colorado river, cannot be measured by the principles governing surface waters, or recurrent flood waters, or attempted changes of natural conditions which impose a greater servitude or positively injure lower lands bound to receive such waters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 216, 217, 221, 222; Dec. Dig. § 171(1).]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES § 171(1) —
UNUSUAL FLOW—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

Under extraordinary water conditions, as in the Salton Sea district at time of diversion of the Colorado river, the landowner may use every reasonable precaution to prevent injury to the land, and whether his conduct is reasonable is determinable by existing conditions and not subsequent consequences.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 216, 217, 221, 222; Dec. Dig. § 171(1).]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES § 171(1) —
UNUSUAL FLOW—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

When, at the time of the diversion of the Colorado river to the Salton Sea, hundreds of square miles of land were inundated, and the flood was constantly increasing, so that outlet had to be provided in some way, the acts of a landowner, near the New River channel, in dynamiting the channel wider and deeper, were reasonable, and no recovery could be had, though the consequent off-flow damaged lands of another, and though the explosives tore out hardpan in the channel and increased erosion, especially where the damaged land was unimproved, and defendant's land, which was only threatened, was highly cultivated.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by A. N. Jones against the California Development Company, the Imperial Water Company No. 1, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying new trial, the Imperial Water Company No. 1 appeals. Reversed.

W. N. Goodwin, Hunsaker & Britt, and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Luce & Luce, of San Diego, and W. B. Mathews and S. B. Robinson, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff on his own behalf and on behalf of his assignors, one and all owners of land in Imperial Valley, brought this action to recover damages for injuries sustained by their lands because of the asserted negligent and unlawful acts of the defendants. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and from that judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial the defendant Imperial Water Company No. 1, a corporation, has appealed. The controversy cannot be understood without a presentation of facts in most respects remarkable, in some respects unique.

The great Colorado river, draining a large portion of the southwestern United States, and corresponding in this respect to the Mississippi, leaving the United States on its southerly course passes through northern Mexico and empties its waters into the head of the Gulf of California. In the past ages it has deposited enormous quantities of silt in what was then the upper waters of the Gulf of California, until it finally reclaimed a vast territory from the waters of that gulf. But it did this, not in the usual way of depositing detritus, until new land rose above the level of the ocean, but rather by forming a barrier of high land to the southward, this barrier being erected by the collision between the tidal, sand-carrying waters of the gulf and the silt-carrying waters of the river. The result was the formation of what was long known as the Colorado desert. With that portion of the Colorado desert to the west of the river, now bearing the name Imperial Valley, and now erected into a county of this state known as "Imperial," we are here concerned. The effect of this curious action of the elements was to leave Imperial Valley a waterless waste below the level of the ocean. While the general course of the Colorado river was south into the head of the Gulf of California, the land gradient of Imperial Valley was in an opposite direction northward, so that from the Mexican line Imperial Valley slopes down toward the north at a gradient of 4 to 6 feet to the mile. At the northern end of the valley is Salton Sink, which was and for some years had been a dry depression, from 250 to 275 feet below the level of the sea. The Colorado river from the neighborhood of the Mexican border southward carries its waters somewhat sluggishly through this higher land to which reference has been made. Late spring or early summer is the period of normal high water in the Colorado river, and at such seasons it is not unusual for it to overflow its westerly bank, where the waters, gathering in natural depressions locally known as lakes, flowed from these depressions in a northerly direction by two natural channels toward and, upon occasion, into the Salton Sink. The nearest to the river of these natural waterways leading from Mexico northward was known as the Alamo river, and the channel farther to the west was called New river. The distance between these two waterways at the international line is about 8 miles. The distance from the boundary to Salton Sink along the course of New river is approximately 40 miles. In its natural state, and before the occurrences hereinafter narrated, the channel of New river was from 2 to 8 feet deep, with an average width of 40 feet. The Alamo river channel was similar to it in size and characteristics, saving that the course of the Alamo was a little more direct, its channel consequently somewhat shorter, and its gradient a little steeper. The soil of Imperial Valley is a soft, friable silt, the climate extremely warm, the atmosphere very dry, the rainfall negligible. Under these conditions of course enormous quantities proportionately of the waters that found their way into the Alamo and New rivers seeped into the soil or were taken into the air by evaporation. So that, as has been said, while the terminal flow of these waters was Salton Sink, for some 7 or 8 years before the happening of the events to be recorded, Salton Sink was dry.

Upon an examination of the soil it was found that Imperial Valley, though without vegetation, was a desert only for lack of water. Further it was found to be a practicable engineering feat to tap the Colorado river near the international boundary line and through canals carry and put the water by gravity upon the lands of Imperial Valley both in Mexico and in the United States, the general course of these canals following the land gradient northerly and their surplus water flowing into the Salton Sink. This engineering feat was performed by the defendant the California Development Company, and the application of the water to these lands, taken with the climatic conditions, showed an amazing fertility and productivity of the soil. Irrigated farms were laid out and sold, towns sprung up, a railroad was constructed, and in verity this desert was made to blossom like the rose. The defendant Imperial Water Company No. 1, which will for convenience be called the Water Company, is a mutual company organized for the purpose of acquiring water for distribution to its stockholders upon the land owned by them within the territory lying north of the Mexican line and between the channels of the Alamo and the New rivers. It was the purveyor of water to approximately 100,000 acres, taking this water by purchase from the canals of the California Development Company. It had 736 individual stockholders. It was supplying water to these stockholders upon their tracts of land varying in acreage from 6 to 320. It had its own checkerboard system of canals and irrigating ditches, aggregating more than 300 miles in length. The towns of Calexico, Heber, El Centro, Imperial, and Brawley, extending from Calexico upon the border northerly, were all within the territory of the Water Company. The lands were protected from the invasion of waters from New river by levees.

In the spring of 1904 the defendant California Development Company cut a new headgate to divert water from the Colorado river a few miles below the international boundary line. This cut through the silt formation was inadequately protected. The result was that the Colorado river, eating through and around the protecting headgates, soon was beyond control. It eroded the canals, spread over the country, and, finding a steeper gradient in Imperial Valley to the northward than its normal course southward to the Gulf of California, left its old channel and proceeded to make a new one ending in Salton Sink, which by the inflow of these waters rapidly became a lake, and is now known as Salton Sea, a lake of more than 400 square miles in area. The Development Company was using the Alamo waterway as part of its canal system, and to relieve the pressure of these waters upon a dam on the Alamo, dug a channel from the Alamo to the New river waterway. The construction of this is charged upon the appealing defendant jointly with its codefendants, but it is unquestioned that it had nothing to do with this act, and the construction of this ditch is therefore out of the case, saving so far as that it aided in turning the waters to the New river channel and in relieving the Alamo channel from the tremendous erosion which subsequently took place in the channel of New river. Nevertheless, while the flow in the Alamo channel was controlled and never exceeded 3,000 second feet, this channel was eroded southerly from Salton Sea until it was 35 feet deeper and 200 feet wider than formerly under normal conditions. From June, 1905, the waters of the Colorado river stood over the Imperial Valley and flowed down New river in ever increasing volume, so that notwithstanding the enormous loss by seepage and evaporation Salton Sink upon July 1, 1905, had received 400,000 acre feet of water (an acre foot being that quantity of water which will cover an acre to a uniform depth of one foot), while upon July 1, 1906, the Sink was filled to a depth of 58 feet and held 7,380,000 acre feet. The Colorado river, which in October, 1905, was discharging into Imperial Valley vagrant waters to the amount of 483,118 acre feet, steadily increased the quantity of this discharge so that in March, 1906, the flow was 1,561,771 acre feet; in April, 1,834,119 acre feet; in May, 3,324,896 acre feet; and in June, 5,008,493 acre feet.

The situation existing in the spring of 1906 was that for the first time in history the Colorado river had completely left its natural channel and was pouring all of its waters uncontrolled in and over the lands of Imperial Valley. Those lands upon the Mexican side were submerged and upon the California side, saving where protected by levees, were in like condition. More than 60 square miles of the valley north of the international line were inundated. The calamity was of more than local consequence. It was considered of national importance. The attention of the President and of Congress was directed to it, and, under assurances of repayment, the Southern Pacific Company was requested to use its best efforts to stem the torrent and return the river to its old channel. For more than 6 months the Southern Pacific Company had been endeavoring to do this thing, but without success. There was no certainty that the river could ever be controlled, and, if not, it meant the eventual filling, first, of the Salton Sink, and gradually of all the lands in the Imperial Valley, until the whole became a lake. Besides the private properties already inundated and thus threatened with destruction, the existence of the towns in the valley was equally imperiled. The quantity of water as the season of high water in the river approached was enormously increased. It was certain that the volume would steadily grow, and there was every reason to believe that within a short time the flow into Imperial Valley would be twice the existing flow. The lands of plaintiff and his assignors were all submerged and had been for a year. The lands of defendant and the towns temporarily protected by levees were in danger of like inundation. The water was finding its outlet into the Salton Sink principally by the channel of New river, and had already enlarged, deepened, and cut back that channel from Salton Sink southward 25 miles. Where cut, instead of the former insignificant water course, it was a gorge 1,000 feet and more in width, and from 70 to 100 feet deep. Thus it was manifest that these vagrant waters of the Colorado river were actively engaged in making for themselves an adequate channel for the carrying of their enormous volume. Moreover, it was apparent (in the event of the failure to divert the Colorado river back to its original channel) that the only relief from the actual and threatened inundation of these lands was by means of this new and adequate channel. About the middle of April, 1906, and for some weeks thereafter, the defendants Development Company and Water Company employed men who threw sticks of dynamite into the stream to clear away obstructions in the channel and to aid the force of the water in eroding a deeper channel.

The complaint charged and the court found (and this is the gravamen of appellant's offense) that there existed at various points along the course of New river certain reefs or riffles of hardpan which rose nearly to the bottom of the bed of the original channel of Old river; that these riffles and reefs of hardpan acted as natural dams and prevented and would have prevented the further deepening and widening of the channel to the southward by erosion; that if this natural condition had been allowed to remain, the water, standing in a vast lake over these inundated lands, would have drained off slowly and without appreciable injury to them; that the effect of this dynamiting was to shatter this hardpan and thus to subject it to ready erosion; and that in turn the effect of this rapid erosion and widening of the stream was to cause the water standing upon plaintiff's lands to be drained off more rapidly than it would have been in the course of nature, and that the effect of this rapid withdrawal was to cause a gulying and erosion of the lands of plaintiff and his assignors. These acts of dynamiting are admitted. Concerning them the court found as charged in the complaint and as above indicated, and the judgment which it rendered in favor of plaintiff was based upon its findings to that effect—that the dynamiting was wrongful and was the proximate and efficient cause in producing the damage to the lands.

For reasons which will hereinafter appear we will do no more than refer to many of the attacks which appellant makes upon this judgment, as that the amended complaint, upon which trial was had, if it stated a cause of action at all charged upon an entirely different cause of action from that pleaded in the original complaint, and that the cause of action charged upon was barred by the statute of limitations. Nor will we pause to consider the asserted insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, as that the reefs of hardpan did not exist, or that if they did exist they were not of such character as in any way seriously to retard the erosive force of the water. Nor yet will we discuss the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that the dynamiting of the channel was an efficient cause of the erosion, herein appellant asserting that as compared with the devastating power of the water itself the acts of its men in throwing sticks of dynamite into the stream contributed no more to the inevitable result than these men would have contributed to it if they had tossed their hats into the mighty torrent. We pass over these matters to come to one consideration which is both determinative and fundamental. Herein assuming the truth and sufficiency of the findings in all other respects, the vital question is: Did the admitted acts of the defendant, the consequences being what they were, subject it to the legal liability here declared?

For the purposes of the consideration of this question the appellant may be regarded as a private landowner who by artificial means has aided in deepening the natural channel which the waters were making. Moreover, since the facts of this case are unique, it would be a waste of time to seek for adjudications where those facts are in any essential way paralleled. Equally useless would it be to review the innumerable decisions dealing with the drainage and flow of surface waters and of flood waters, the right of defense against the sea or vagrant waters as a common enemy, and the asserted conflict between the common law and the civil law upon all these and kindred questions. The case here presented, we repeat, is unique in its facts. If the waters were surface waters, they were something essentially more. If the waters were storm waters or flood waters they differed radically from the ordinary storm or flood waters which in the course of nature would cease to flow. Here presented is the case of a mighty river leaving its channel and pouring and continuing to pour all its volume over the lands of a great and fertile valley. At first, and because of the lack of an adequate channel, these waters spread out and formed a vast shallow lake. In time the waters themselves selected and proceeded to form an adequate channel. Unless the art and ingenuity of man could arrest this flow and restore the river once more to its natural channel, the outcome was inevitable. It meant the submergence and destruction of all property in Imperial Valley. Thus, as surface water, these waters had stood upon the unleveed lands for more than a year. They were pressing upon the levees of the protected lands of appellant. Their volume, it was certain, would be enormously increased within a very short time, and unless an adequate channel was ready to receive these waters their devastating effect upon the protected lands and towns was a matter of grave and serious apprehension. Temporary security could be assured only if the channel were made adequate southward to the Mexican boundary. Nature was doing her best to accomplish this and the appellant aided her in the work. The result of their combined efforts was success. But this success worked injury to the lands long submerged, by causing the waters to withdraw from them with such rapidity as to eat away and gully the freehold.

[1] Manifestly the acts of this appellant, and its right to do those acts, are not to be measured by the familiar, indeed the commonplace, principles touching the right to relieve oneself from or protect oneself against ordinary surface waters, or the ordinary recurrent flood waters, nor with attempted changes in natural conditions which impose either a greater servitude upon or work a positive injury to the lower lands bound to receive such waters, principles declared in such cases as Los Angeles C. Ass'n v. Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375, Rudel v. Los Angeles Co., 118 Cal. 281, 50 Pac. 400, Sanguinetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 69 Pac. 98, 89 Am. St. Rep. 169, Wood v. Moulton, 146 Cal. 317, 80 Pac. 92, and Heier v. Krull, 160 Cal. 441, 117 Pac. 530. The fact that in our decisions we have departed from what was conceived to be the rules of the common law, in favor of the more equitable principles of the civil law, does not mean that we are upon this or any other question irrevocably committed to the doctrines of either system of jurisprudence. This court has said that while the rules of common law are the basis of our jurisprudence where our own laws are silent, this means and can only mean that those rules will be recognized and adopted where they meet the conditions existing in the state, and will not be allowed to control where the conditions were those never contemplated by the common law. The same declaration applies to the principles of the civil law. Indeed, upon these general questions, it has been well said by the learned author of "Water and Water Rights":

"Therefore no arbitrary rule can be laid down which will govern all cases, but each case must be dealt with upon its facts, applying the rule which will be reasonable under the circumstances, under the general rule that the water should be allowed, as far as possible, to seek its natural outlet." 3 Farnham, § 889.

And this is precisely what this court declared in Lamb v. Reclamation Dis., 73 Cal. 125, 14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775, when it said:

"The real question in such cases is: Had the party sued the right to do the thing complained of?"

[2] The underlying principle governing the decision of all these cases which deal with extraordinary water conditions, whether created by the ocean or by unexpected and unprecedented floods, is that in such stress the landowner may use every reasonable precaution to avert injury from his land, and whether or not his conduct be reasonable will be determined by existing conditions and not by after consequences; so that if the acts of the landowner be, in the light of the existing circumstances, not unreasonable, he will not be held liable for consequent damage which by these reasonable acts may be inflicted upon another landowner. It follows herefrom that the acts of protection themselves may differ in kind and character, but however they may differ, the test of the doer's legal liability is: Was the particular act which he did reasonable in view of the existing circumstances? Even in the civil law, upon which respondent here places great reliance, such was the principle governing the landowner's responsibility for his conduct, and the Supreme Court of the United States, pointing out that while in the Roman law the free flow of waters was secured from undue interruption and the landowners were protected from undue interference or burden created by obstructions to the flow, or by deflections in its course, etc., says:

"While this was universally true, a limitation to the rule was also universally recognized by which individuals, in case of accidental or extraordinary floods, were entitled to erect such works as would protect them from the consequences of the flood by restraining the same, and that no other riparian owner was entitled to complain of such action upon the ground of injury inflicted thereby, because all, as the result of the accidental and extraordinary condition, were entitled to the enjoyment of the common right to construct works for their own protection." Cubbins, Appellant, v. Mississippi River Commission, 241 U. S. 351, 36 Sup. Ct. 671, 60 L. Ed. 1041.

In our own state the same principle has been invoked and declared whenever the occasion demanded it. Thus in Lamb v. Reclamation District, supra, where the action was to abate and remove as a public nuisance a levee erected by the defendant against the flood waters of the river, the effect of which levee was to force an excess of these waters upon plaintiff's land to his injury, and where the contention was that the defendant had by its levee dammed the natural water course carrying water in times of flood, it was held: "Considering all the facts and circumstances of this case," and conceding that the construction of the levee did impose an additional burden upon and work an injury to the lands of plaintiff, that the defendant, for the protection of its own lands, was, under the circumstances, doing what it had a right to do, and the resultant damage to plaintiff's land was damnum absque injuria. In this case, it is to be noted is quoted with approval Rex v. Commissioners, 8 Barn. and C. 355, and Lord Tenterden's language:

"But the sea is a common enemy to all proprietors on that part of the coast. * * * I am therefore of opinion that the only safe rule to lay down is this: That each landowner for himself, or the commissioners acting for several landowners, may direct such defenses for the land under their care as the necessity of the case requires, leaving the others in like manner to protect themselves against the common enemy."

To the same effect is McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575, where it is declared that the principle governing the decision in Rex v. Commissioners, declared in Lamb v. Reclamation District, "is the true principle to apply to the case" of the "flood waters of our large rivers." The principle is again announced and affirmed in Gray v. McWilliams, 98 Cal. 157, 32 Pac. 976, 21 L. R. A. 593, 35 Am. St. Rep. 163, where it is said:

"In the case of flood waters escaping from natural streams, we view them, it is true, as a common enemy, against which we may protect ourselves without the commission of a wrong; but after all, this declaration is used in view of the means of defense resorted to rather than in the abstract. We build the banks of the river higher for our protection, it is true, but in so doing we aid nature in her effort to carry the water to its ultimate destination, and he who to protect himself from a flood should erect a barrier across the channel of one of our important rivers, would probably be met with the declaration that it was not the proper mode of warfare, even against a "common enemy."

And once more is the same principle declared in Sanguinetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 37 Pac. 375.

[3] In these cases, alike in their vital characteristics, the defendants had protected their lands against flood waters by artificially raising the banks of the stream. The damage to plaintiffs' lands followed in direct consequence. There was no question but that plaintiffs' lands were injured, but the governing principle under the application of which these plaintiffs were denied relief, is that the steps which the defendants took to protect their own lands were reasonable under the circumstances, and the consequent damage to plaintiffs' lands cast upon defendants no legal liability. In each case it was damnum absque injuria. Applying this principle to the case at bar, what defendant did, instead of raising the bank of the stream, was to lower its bed. The effect of this lowering, instead of precipitating more water upon the lands of plaintiff was to cause a too rapid withdrawal of waters standing upon those lands. Under all the circumstances of the case was defendant's conduct reasonable? Unhesitatingly we answer that it was, even in view of the finding of the court that the defendant "was not justified on the ground of public interest or on the ground of public good or greater public right, or on the ground of impending necessity, and no such right or no such necessity existed." The conditions have been outlined with sufficient elaboration. It is to be remembered that so far as these plaintiffs themselves are concerned, their lands had been submerged for more than a year. It cannot be doubted that in common with the owner of every other acre of submerged land they would have welcomed the assurance that the flood waters would be drained from their soil and the land once more made to appear. These lands, if not wholly, were for the most part unimproved. The threatened lands were improved and productive. The apprehension of injury to these lands and to the towns which had grown up in their midst is abundantly shown by the evidence. The controlling consideration is not whether there was an absolute necessity for the doing of the act, but whether the doing of it was reasonable under all the circumstances, and we repeat that we entertain no doubt that it was.

This conclusion renders unnecessary, as has been intimated, the consideration of any of the other propositions advanced in this case. The fact that under the evidence here presented plaintiff has not established against this appealing defendant any legal wrong is determinative of the controversy, and the judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 4537.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 23, 1916.)

1. RAILROADS ⚡9(1)—CONTROL BY RAILROAD COMMISSION.

The function of the Railroad Commission, like that of the Interstate Commerce Commission, is to regulate public utilities and to compel the enforcement of their duty to the public, and not to compel them to carry out their contract obligations to individuals.

2. RAILROADS ⚡214 — OPERATION — DUTY — ABANDONMENT.

Where a railway line had been destroyed and service discontinued for about 20 years, there was no duty to operate the line, such duty being dependent upon the right to maintain the line, which right was lost by abandonment; it being immaterial whether or not it was forfeited under the provision of Civ. Code, § 468, as to forfeiture of right to operate.

3. RAILROADS ⚡83 — CONSTRUCTION — JURISDICTION OF RAILROAD COMMISSION.

Under section 36, Public Utilities Act (St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 36), authorizing the Railroad Commission to order, after hearing, "additions, extensions, repairs or improvements to" the existing plant, equipment, apparatus, facilities, etc., of a public utility, the Railroad Commission has no power to require a railroad company to extend its line of railroad or to build a new line to connect with its existing line points which have not theretofore been connected, and which the company has not undertaken so to connect, since a railroad company, constructing a line between given points, does not undertake to supply the transportation needs of any territory not reached by its lines.

4. RAILROADS ⚡223 — OPERATION — PUBLIC REGULATION.

The supervision of service rendered by a railroad company is a proper matter for public regulation and control.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 725-729, 738; Dec. Dig. ⚡223.]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⚡297—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—DEPRIVATION OF PROPERTY—RAILROADS.

To compel a railroad company to apply its property to the construction and operation of a line of railroad, which it does not desire to construct or operate, is to take its property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 832-834; Dec. Dig. ⚡297.]

In Bank. Proceeding in certiorari by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company against the Railroad Commission of the State of California and others. Order of the Railroad Commission annulled.

E. W. Camp, U. T. Clotfelter (Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of counsel), for petitioner. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, for respondents. Allan Brant and W. C. Wilde, both of San Diego, amici curiæ.

SLOSS, J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to test the validity of an order of the Railroad Commission, requiring the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company to construct and put into operation a line of railroad between Oceanside, in San Diego county, and Temecula, in Riverside county. The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company (which we shall herein term the "Santa Fé Company") operates a transcontinental line of railroad, connecting with a number of lines in this state. It has succeeded to the property and railroad lines of the Southern California Railway Company, which was in turn the successor in interest of the California Southern Railroad Company. The last-named corporation was organized about the year 1880, to build and operate a railroad from the bay of San Diego to a point of connection with the line of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, running easterly from Barstow in San Bernardino county, and now forming a part of the main line of the Santa Fé system. The line of the California Southern Railroad Company was constructed from San Diego to Oceanside, thence northeasterly to Fallbrook Station, thence through the Temecula canyon to Temecula, and thence northeasterly through Riverside and San Bernardino counties to Barstow. The distance from Fallbrook Station to Temecula through the Temecula canyon is about 12 miles. In the year 1891 this portion of the road was washed out by a flood, and it has never been rebuilt. Theretofore, in 1888, another line had been built connecting San Diego and Oceanside with San Bernardino via Santa Ana. This road, while longer than the one through the Temecula canyon, could be operated to better advantage because it avoided unfavorable grades and curves. It has also passed into the ownership and possession of the Santa Fé Company.

The proceeding now under review was instituted before the Railroad Commission by the complaint of various civic and commercial organizations in San Diego, joined by citizens of the vicinity, who sought an order requiring the Santa Fé Company to re-establish railroad operations between Fallbrook and Temecula in order to give direct service over this line to persons residing in the territory beyond Temecula. Prior to the construction of the original line, the California Southern Railroad Company had received donations of money and land, aggregating several millions of dollars in value, as an inducement to the construction of a railroad from the bay of San Diego to a connection with the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad. An agreement to that end had been made between a representative of the intending donors and a group of men who undertook to form a corporation for the proposed construction. Pursuant to this agreement the California Southern Railroad Company was formed, and its line built.

The commission filed an elaborate opinion, in which it recited the foregoing facts and many others. It went carefully into the question of the cost of reconstructing the road through the Temecula canyon, and made estimates of the extent of territory which would furnish traffic in consequence of the proposed connection. Suggestion having been made that an alternative route could be constructed from Oceanside to Temecula without going through the Temecula canyon, the commission also found the cost of constructing this line. The findings of the commission included the following:

"Eighth. That the re-establishment of a direct connection between San Diego and Temecula, either by way of the Temecula canyon or by way of the so-called alternative line, both of which said lines are described in the preceding opinion, is a public necessity and will greatly benefit all of the country affected by this railroad.

"Ninth. That it is reasonable to order the defendant to make such connection, and that the present and prospective traffic justify the expenditure of the sum of money necessary to establish this connection."

On these findings an order was made requiring the Santa Fé Company to present to the commission for its approval plans and estimates for a line connecting Oceanside and Temecula, either through the canyon or by the alternative route, and requiring it within 12 months after the approval by the commission of such plans and estimates to construct, complete, and put into operation such line of railroad and operate thereover regular passenger and freight service. This is the order which is attacked in the present proceeding.

The Railroad Commission seeks to find authority for its order in section 36 of the Public Utilities Act. So much of the section as is material here reads as follows:

"Sec. 36. Whenever the commission, after a hearing had upon its own motion or upon complaint, shall find that additions, extensions, repairs or improvements to, or changes in, the existing plant, equipment, apparatus, facilities or other physical property of any public utility or of any two or more public utilities ought reasonably to be made, or that a new structure or structures should be erected, to promote the security or convenience of its employes or the public, or in any other way to secure adequate service or facilities, the commission shall make and serve an order directing that such additions, extensions, repairs, improvements or changes be made or such structure or structures be erected in the manner and within the time specified in said order." St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 36.

In assailing the validity of the order, the petitioner makes a number of contentions. These, generally speaking, divide themselves into two branches. One challenges the authority of the Railroad Commission to order the construction of a line of railroad, under the circumstances here shown, regardless of the consideration that the operation of the new line might, in a financial view, be beneficial to the company, while the other turns more specifically on the inquiry whether, under the evidence in this particular case, the construction directed to be made would be justified by the showing of probable earnings to accrue to the company. The first of these questions is the more fundamental, and in view of the conclusion we have reached on it we do not find it necessary to go into an analysis of the evidence that would have to be considered in passing on the second.

The issue to be determined is this: Has the Railroad Commission authority to require a railroad company to extend its line of railroad, or to build a new line, so as to connect with its existing line points that have not theretofore been connected and which the company has not undertaken to so connect? In thus stating the question, we eliminate from consideration the contract found to have been made between citizens of San Diego and the incorporators of the California Southern Railroad Company, as well as the fact that a line had once been run from Fallbrook to Temecula.

While the commission, in its opinion, dwelt at some length upon the moral obligations arising from this contract, its conclusion was not, perhaps, in a legal sense, based upon it. The first finding of the learned commissioner who heard the testimony, after referring to the grants made under the contract, concludes as follows:

"I do not, however, find that the moral or legal obligations resulting from this contract are of necessity a deciding factor in this case."

[1] But whether or not the existence of the contract may, in some degree, have influenced the commission in reaching its conclusion, it is clear that grounds must be sought elsewhere for supporting the order here under review. We may pass, without expressing an opinion of its validity, the petitioner's suggestion that the Santa Fé Company was not a party to the contract, but was a purchaser under foreclosure of the properties of the corporation in whose behalf the agreement had been made, and therefore not bound by the contractual duties of its predecessor. See Hoard v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 123 U. S. 222, 8 Sup. Ct. 74, 31 L. Ed. 130. For, even if it be granted that the burdens of the agreement rest on the petitioner, the railroad commission is not a body charged with the enforcement of private contracts. See Hanlon v. Eshleman, 169 Cal. 200, 146 Pac. 656. Its function, like that of the Interstate Commerce Commission, is to regulate public utilities, and to compel the enforcement of their duties to the public (Southern Pacific Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 219 U. S. 433, 31 Sup. Ct. 288, 55 L. Ed. 283); not to compel them to carry out their contract obligations to individuals. This is conceded by the respondents themselves, and we need not, therefore, go into a review of the various provisions of the act (among others, section 36 itself), which demonstrate the soundness of the conclusion just stated.

[2] Nor is the fact that a railroad line had once existed between Fallbrook and Temecula a factor of any moment in the present inquiry. No question is made of the authority of the Railroad Commission to compel a railroad company or other public utility to restore a service which it has been furnishing. Here, however, the line between Fallbrook and Temecula had been destroyed for about 20 years before the action of the commission was invoked, and, indeed, before the enactment of the law upon which the commission relies for its authority to act. It is expressly found that "that portion of the line was left abandoned and service discontinued. It has remained abandoned ever since." In view of this fact, it cannot be doubted that any obligation of the predecessor of the Santa Fé Company to maintain and operate the line from Fallbrook to Temecula had long since ceased (Pub. Ser. Com. v. P. B. & W. R. R. Co., 122 Md. 433, 89 Atl. 726), and that no such obligation ever rested upon the Santa Fé Company itself. The duty to maintain the line was dependent upon the right to maintain it, and this right was lost by abandonment (Home R. E. Co. v. L. A. Pac. Co., 163 Cal. 710, 126 Pac. 972), without regard to the question whether it had been forfeited under the provisions of section 468 of the Civil Code. The case must, therefore, stand precisely as it would if there had never been any connection between these two points.

The solution of the problem thus presented must be found in a definition of the character of the order complained of. Is the Railroad Commission, in ordering the construction of a railroad line, regulating the service which the petitioner has undertaken to give to the public, or is it compelling the railroad company to dedicate its property to a new service? If the former, the commission is acting within its jurisdiction; if the latter, it is attempting to exercise an authority which the statute either has not attempted or is unable to confer upon it. Section 36 of the Public Utilities Act authorizes the commission to make an order directing that "additions, extensions," etc., be made in the plant or facilities of any public utility. It might be argued that this language is broad enough to include additions to the plant, even though such additions may involve a service never contemplated nor undertaken by the owner of the utility. But if this be taken to be the true meaning, the section expresses an intent which cannot, under the restrictions of the federal Constitution, be given effect. As was said by Henshaw, J., in Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 665, 137 Pac. 1119, 1128 (50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 882):

"It may not be amiss to point out that the devotion to a public use by a person or corporation of property held by them in ownership does not destroy their ownership and does not vest title to the property in the public so as to justify, under the exercise of police power, the taking away of the management and control of the property from its owners without compensation, upon the ground that public convenience would better be served thereby, or that the owners themselves have proven false or derelict in the performance of their public duty."

And the following quotation from my opinion in the same case is also in point:

"I think it cannot be doubted that an order, compelling the owner of private property, against his will, to subject that property to the use of the public or of an individual, amounts to a taking of property. * * * Where the particular property has been dedicated to a public use; where the property, in other words, is employed in a public service, the owner has consented that the public may use his property within the limits to which the dedication extends. Within those limits, the use by the public does not constitute a taking, or, if it be a taking, it is one which has been invited by the owner. But the fact that the property has been offered for one public use does not authorize the public to use it for other and different purposes."

Again, in Del Mar Water, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 680, 140 Pac. 591, 596, Mr. Justice Shaw, in referring to section 36 and other provisions of the Public Utilities Act, said:

"These sections, taken literally, seem to empower the commission to direct any public utility to extend its plant and enlarge the territory supplied by it in such manner as the commission shall judge advisable. But a proper interpretation of these provisions must be that they are limited in their application to such public service corporations as may have devoted their entire property to the use of the entire public, or to those which may have undertaken to supply a certain district, such as a city, and dedicated their property to that service and which afterward may have failed or refused to give to such district an adequate service, or failed or refused to extend the system and supply to parts of the district, when it was within its means to have done so and such extension would not be unreasonable. In such cases it would be entirely proper to give such a commission power to compel adequate service within the territory which the corporation has undertaken to serve and to compel any reasonable extension of the service to other parts of such territory. But even a constitutional declaration cannot transform a private enterprise, or a part thereof, into a public utility and thus take property for public use without condemnation and payment. The provisions of this act could not authorize the commission to compel such corporation to dedicate additional property to public use without additional compensation. When a corporation voluntarily devotes a part of its property to public use, it is to be presumed that it makes the dedication because it is satisfied with the return which it expects to receive, and in that way it is deemed to have been compensated for such dedication. But when it is forced to devote to public use additional property which it has not dedicated to public use, or is compelled to extend its service to supply uses or territory not embraced in the original dedication, it must, under our constitutional provisions, as a condition precedent, be compensated for the value of the new property taken or new use exacted. This may be done under the power of eminent domain."

[3] The views thus announced, when applied to the facts of the case before us, lead inevitably to the conclusion that the commission exceeded its power in ordering the construction of a new line of road to connect Oceanside and Temecula. A public utility, undertaking to supply a given public need, submits itself to the regulation and control of public authority with respect to the service which it has thus undertaken. Thus, a water company having a franchise to supply water to the inhabitants of a given city assumes the public duty of supplying that community with water. It may be compelled to extend its mains in order to furnish the service to such inhabitants. Lukrawka v. Spring Valley Water Co., 169 Cal. 318, 146 Pac. 640. So of companies furnishing gas, electric current, or telephone service. 1 Wyman on Pub. Ser. Corp. § 797. But to require a public utility to devote its property to a service which it has never professed to render is to take that property, pro tanto, and such taking cannot be justified except under the power of eminent domain—i. e., upon just compensation. A railroad company, in constructing a line between given points, does not undertake to supply the transportation needs of any territory not reached by its lines. 1 Wyman, Pub. Ser. Corp. § 272. As is pointed out by petitioner, there is a very real difference between the nature of the service rendered by a railroad and that furnished by a water or gas company or a telephone system. Gas, water, electric light, or (as a rule) telephone service must, in the nature of things, be brought to the consumer. The obligation to supply a given district carries with it the duty, under reasonable limitations, to extend the mains or lines of the public utility to a point on the consumer's premises where use can be made of the service. Not so with a railroad company. Before freight or passengers can be transported they must be brought or must come to some point on the line of the railroad. True, the railroad company is bound to provide adequate facilities for the service of the public on its lines. It may be compelled to furnish proper stations for the reception and discharge of passengers and freight, to supply adequate motive power and cars, to install safety devices, to make needed repairs and additions to its roadbed and track, and other like improvements. All of these matters fall within the scope of the regulation of the service which the company has undertaken to give. But there is a vital distinction between regulation of this character and a requirement that the railroad company shall extend its operations by building a new line of road to tap or supply a territory which has not theretofore had the benefit of direct railroad service. Such a requirement cannot be justified by saying that the points to be thus reached are within the area already served by the railroad. The area served by any railroad may, in a certain sense, be said to include all of the territory, in any direction, from which freight or passengers may be brought to the railroad by any other mode of conveyance. Such area may extend to a distance of many miles from the line of the road. Certainly the public duty of the company does not include the obligation of building lines to any or every portion of this indefinite expanse of territory.

Various decisions upholding orders of regulating bodies with respect to railroads are cited, but we think they do not, in any instance, meet the necessities of the case at bar. Much stress is laid upon Wisconsin, etc., Co. v. Jacobson, 179 U. S. 287, 21 Sup. Ct. 115, 45 L. Ed. 194. There the Supreme Court of the United States had under consideration an order of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of the state of Minnesota requiring two railroad companies whose tracks intersected at a certain point to provide connecting tracks so that the cars of each company could be run onto the tracks of the other. The ground of the decision sustaining the order was, in effect, that the requirement was simply a regulation of the operations of the two companies in furtherance of their obligation to properly serve the public needs and convenience. There was no attempt to compel a road to extend its service beyond the lines which it was already operating. The companies were merely required to furnish facilities for the more adequate performance of a service already supplied. The same is true of the other cases upon which reliance is placed. Thus, in Atlantic Coast Line v. N. C. Corp. Com., 206 U. S. 1, 27 Sup. Ct. 585, 51 L. Ed. 933, 11 Ann. Cas. 398, the order in controversy directed a railroad to rearrange its schedules so as to make a convenient connection between its trains and those of another road passing a junction point. The order under review in Missouri Pacific R. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 30 Sup. Ct. 330, 54 L. Ed. 472, required the railroad company to put into operation on one of its branches a passenger train in place of a mixed passenger and freight train. This order, said the court, did nothing more "than command the railroad company to perform a service which it was incumbent upon it to perform as the necessary result of the possession and enjoyment of its charter powers." So in Minneapolis, etc., R. R. v. Minnesota, 193 U. S. 53, 24 Sup. Ct. 396, 48 L. Ed. 614, the court sustained the validity of an order of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of Minnesota directing the railroad company to build and maintain a station house at a certain point on its line. This ruling, like the others mentioned, was based upon the duty of the company to provide proper service upon its lines, the court saying that "to establish stations at proper places is the first duty of a railroad company. The state can certainly provide for the enforcement of that duty." The same grounds led to the decision in Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Iowa, 233 U. S. 334, 34 Sup. Ct. 592, 58 L. Ed. 988. The order there in question was one requiring the railroad company to accept shipments of coal in carload lots when tendered in cars of other railroad companies. The requirement was justified "in order that reasonably adequate facilities for traffic may be provided." And similar considerations were made the ground of rulings upholding orders requiring various railroads to use their tracks within the city of Detroit for interchange of traffic (Grand Trunk Ry. Co. v. Michigan, 231 U. S. 457, 34 Sup. Ct. 152, 58 L. Ed. 310), and directing a street railroad company to double track its line for a distance of ten blocks (Phoenix Railway Co. v. Geary, 239 U. S. 277, 36 Sup. Ct. 45, 60 L. Ed. 287). In the case last cited the court, in its opinion, used this expression:

"Complainant is not required to open up new territory, but only to give better service upon a street already occupied by it under a public franchise."

These cases, one and all, have to do with regulations designed to improve the facilities for transacting the business already conducted upon the lines built by the company and devoted to the transaction of that business. They furnish no support for the claim that a railroad company may be compelled to build new lines in order to render a new service, however necessary or convenient such new service may be to the public.

[4, 5] "It must be remembered," said Mr. Justice Brewer in Interstate Com. Com. v. Chicago G. W. Ry. Co., 209 U. S. 108, 118, 28 Sup. Ct. 493, 496 (52 L. Ed. 705), "that railroads are the private property of their owners; that while from the public character of the work in which they are engaged the public has the power to prescribe rules for securing faithful and efficient service and equality between shippers and communities, yet in no proper sense is the public a general manager." To the like effect are the following expressions from recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States:

"A railroad's possessions are subject to its public duty, but beyond this and within charter limits, like other owners of private property, it may control its own affairs." Great Northern Ry. v. Minnesota, 238 U. S. 340, 35 Sup. Ct. 753, 59 L. Ed. 1337.

"The company is entitled to the privilege of managing its business in its own way so long as it does not injuriously affect the health, comfort, safety and convenience of the public." C. M. & St. P. R. R. Co. v. Wisconsin, 238 U. S. 491, 35 Sup. Ct. 869, 59 L. Ed. 1423, L. R. A. 1916A, 1133.

See, also, People v. Wilber, 198 N. Y. 1, 90 N. E. 1140, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 357, 19 Ann. Cas. 626; People v. Stevens, 203 N. Y. 7, 96 N. E. 114; Bacon v. Boston & Maine R. R., 83 Vt. 421, 76 Atl. 128.

These quotations point to the essential ground of the invalidity of the order here in question. The supervision of service rendered by a railroad company is a proper matter for public regulation and control. The question whether a railroad company shall extend its lines to points not theretofore reached by it, whether, in other words, it shall engage in a new and additional enterprise, is one of policy to be determined by its directors. To compel a railroad company to apply its property to the construction and operation of a line of railroad which it does not desire to construct or operate is to take its property.

As we have already indicated, we are cited to no authority which supports the power of the state, acting through its railroad commission, or otherwise, to compel the extension of a railroad line in the manner here attempted. On the contrary, such decisions as have come to our attention tend, rather, to deny the existence of any such power. In Public Service Commission v. P. B. & W. Ry. Co., 122 Md. 438, 89 Atl. 726, the court declared the invalidity of an order of the Maryland Public Service Commission requiring the railroad company to rebuild and operate a branch which had been abandoned (as had the line here in question) years before the making of the order and the acquisition of the line by its then owner. The Maryland statute authorized the commission to require a railroad company to make "repairs, improvements, changes * * * or additions" if in its judgment they "should reasonably be made"—a provision not unlike that found in section 36 of our Public Utilities Act. See, also, Towers v. U. R. R., 126 Md. 478, 95 Atl. 170; N. P. Ry. Co. v. Railroad Com., 58 Wash. 360, 108 Pac. 938, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1021.

The order is annulled.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 20, 1916.)

1. BOUNDARIES ⇨35(4)—EVIDENCE—ACQUIESCENCE IN LOCATION.

In a boundary suit, testimony of common grantor as to marking by row of trees, the supposed dividing line, and that before sale he showed the grantee of the south tract the row as marking the boundary, and corroborating testimony of the grantee of the south tract, was admissible as part of the history of the agreement to treat this line as the true one.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by W. E. Cummings and another against Homer Laughlin and others. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lynn Helm, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Trask, Norton & Brown, Trask & Brown, and Edgar K. Brown, all of Los Angeles (Everett L. Ball, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The question here presented is over the title to a disputed strip of land lying between the holdings of plaintiffs and defendants. Plaintiffs asserted title by prescription and by agreement settling a disputed boundary. The court's findings were in favor of the plaintiffs upon both propositions, against the answer and cross-complaint of defendants. Defendants appeal.

The following facts sufficiently present the controversy: In 1888 one Rogers was the owner of a tract of land containing, he thought, 21 acres (herein disregarding fractional acreage). It was known as lot 13 of the Lick tract. He caused a survey to be made, dividing this lot into a southerly 10 acres and a northerly 11 acres. Surveyor's stakes indicated the boundary line, and Rogers planted a row of fig trees along this line. In 1889 one O'Dea became the purchaser of the southerly 10 acres by a deed calling for the southerly 10 acres of lot 13, "said 10 acres to extend back making the easterly and westerly lines equal distances from the center of Franklin avenue, and making it a rectangular piece." No controversy arises over the location of the center line of Franklin avenue, nor of the easterly or westerly line of lot 13. This southerly 10 acres, therefore, can be and has been accurately delimited upon the ground. So delimited upon the ground, the easterly and westerly lines extend 657.38 feet north of the center line of Franklin avenue. But the line of the survey caused to be made by Rogers, which line, as has been said, was marked upon the ground by stakes and by a row of fig trees, was 19.41 feet south of the true line, and only 637.97 feet northerly from the center line of Franklin avenue. Thereafter Rogers sold all of the rest of this lot 13, that is to say, all of the northerly portion of it, to one Stephens, by a deed of date October 4, 1892, which deed conveyed "the north 11 acres of lot 13, the south line thereof being parallel with the south line of lot 13 of the western subdivision of the Lick tract." The difficulty seemingly arises over a shortage in the acreage of lot 13. If the southerly proprietor is given 10 acres, the northerly proprietor does not get his 11 acres, and, conversely, if the northerly proprietor is given his 11 acres, the southerly proprietor does not get his 10 acres, and hence this controversy over the strip 19 feet wide and 662.64 feet long.

Subsequently, touching title to the northern piece, Stephens, the husband, held title until January, 1898, when he conveyed to his wife the land as "the north 11 acres of lot 13," etc. Mrs. Stephens held title until 1902, when she conveyed the land to these plaintiffs by deed containing the same description. Touching title to the southerly 10 acres, O'Dea and his successors in interest owned the land from 1889 until 1900, when the land was conveyed to Homer Laughlin, against whom this action was brought, and the representatives of whom are the appellants herein. The transfers of title were by descriptions identical with that contained in O'Dea's deed. In 1902 Homer Laughlin caused a survey of his 10 acres to be made, which survey showed his northerly line to be 657.38 feet north of the center line of Franklin avenue. He asserted ownership to that line, and this action followed.

[1] The court admitted the evidence of Rogers, the common source of title, and of O'Dea, his grantee to the southerly 10 acres. Rogers testified to the survey which he had caused to be made, to the marking of the northerly boundary line of what he conceived to be the southerly 10 acres by stakes, his planting a row of fig trees along this line, and, further, that when he came to sell this southerly 10 acres, before the execution of his deed he took O'Dea upon the land and showed him these stakes and the line of fig trees as marking the northern boundary of the tract which O'Dea proposed to purchase. O'Dea's testimony corroborates this. He says that he paid no particular attention to the boundary line shown him, being more interested in other matters pertaining to the land, but that after he purchased it he did recognize the line as being his northern boundary line, and in turn pointed it out to his grantees as the northern boundary line. Objection is made to the introduction of this evidence, as being an effort to vary by parol the terms of the deed of grant. For such a purpose, of course, the evidence was inadmissible; there being no effort here made to reform the deed for fraud or mistake. But the evidence was admissible and was properly admitted as a part of the history of the agreement to treat this line as the true line of an uncertain boundary, and as well to show the initial claim of right from which originated plaintiff's asserted prescriptive title. The evidence further shows that continuously and uninterruptedly the Stephens and their successors—the Cummings—exercised all the necessary acts of dominion, ownership, and control over the land under open and notorious claim of right, and maintained an adverse possession to this strip of land against O'Dea and his successors. This, from the nature of the case, was to be expected, since O'Dea and his successors unquestionably accepted this line as being their true northern boundary, and consequently made no opposition nor protest to the continuous acts of dominion which plaintiffs and their predecessors exercised over the now disputed strip.

[2, 3] Much of the briefs is devoted to an attack and defense of the finding of the court to the effect that the boundary line was uncertain and had been fixed by agreement, evidenced by long acquiescence. Into the consideration of this question we need not enter, because apart from it the judgment of the court is fully sustained upon its further finding of title by prescription. We have said that the occupancy and dominion of plaintiffs and their predecessors, as found by the court and as sustained by the evidence, were quite sufficient to fulfill the requirements of the law. There is left for consideration the one question peculiar to our law—the payment of taxes by the adverse claimant for the period required to perfect a prescriptive title. The difficulty as has been intimated arose over the fact, as found by the court, that lot 13 did not contain the requisite and supposed quantity of land to give to the holder of the southern 10 acres and of the northerly 11 acres each his full quantity. Giving to the deeds, therefore, the land that each called for resulted in an overlap. The taxes imposed upon the owners of the northern piece were taxes upon 11 acres. In like manner the taxes imposed upon the owners of the southern piece were taxes upon 10 acres. These taxes were duly and regularly paid by the owners. The result was a double taxation and a double payment of taxes upon the disputed strip. Under such circumstances the claimant to title by adverse possession has fully complied with the law when he has paid the taxes upon the land, even though they have also been paid by the holder of the record title thereto. Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 99 Cal. 672, 34 Pac. 509; Owsley v. Matson, 156 Cal. 401, 104 Pac. 983.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

GARDNER v. STEADMAN. (Civ. 1841.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, Sept. 15, 1916.)

1. VENUE —APPLICATION FOR CHANGE—AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS—SUFFICIENCY.

An affidavit of merits and residence, made by defendant's wife, who was familiar with the facts of the case, during his temporary absence from the state, was a sufficient compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 396, providing that the affidavit of merits upon motion for change of place of trial must be filed by the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 110-113; Dec. Dig. ¶66.]

2. VENUE ¶67—CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVIT—AMENDMENT.

An affidavit of merits and residence, made by another than defendant himself, which is defective because merely stating a conclusion of affiant as to defendant's residence, may be amended in the discretion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 114-120; Dec. Dig. ¶67.]

3. VENUE ¶67—CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVIT—AMENDMENT.

Where an affidavit of merits and residence, upon motion for a change of venue made by defendant's wife, was defective in that it did not contain facts showing defendant's residence, but was a statement of a conclusion of affiant, a new affidavit, filed by defendant's attorney, was a sufficient compliance with an order of the court, permitting an amended affidavit to be filed.

Action by N. L. Gardner against Willis E. Steadman. From an order granting defendant's motion for a change of place of trial of the action, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

R. W. Gillogley and Algernon Crofton, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Newton J. Skinner, of Los Angeles, and R. P. Henshall, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order changing the place of trial of the action from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of Los Angeles upon defendant's motion.

The said defendant was sued in the city and county of San Francisco upon a personal obligation and was duly served with process. Within the time required by law he appeared by his attorney of record and demurred, and at the same time filed a demand for a change of the place of trial of the action to Los Angeles county. There was also filed at the same time an affidavit of residence and merits, which affidavit, however, was not sworn to by the defendant, but by his wife, who deposed therein that the defendant was temporarily absent from the state of California, and therefore for that reason the affidavit was made by her; that the residence of the defendant was some time prior to and at the time of the commencement of the action and thereafter in the county of Los Angeles; that the affiant was familiar with the facts of the case, and had fully and fairly stated the same to Newton J. Skinner, the defendant's attorney, and upon such statement had been advised by him, and verily believed that the defendant had a good and substantial defense to the action on the merits. Upon the hearing of the motion plaintiff objected to this affidavit, but upon what grounds does not appear in the record. However, the defendant thereupon asked and obtained leave to file an amended affidavit of residence and merits, and thereafter presented and filed an affidavit of merits and of residence sworn to by Newton J. Skinner, his attorney of record. The plaintiff, in opposition to the motion, presented a counter affidavit as to the defendant's residence, and upon the hearing the court granted the defendant's motion for a change of the place of trial, whereupon plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that the affidavit of merits made by the defendant's wife and presented on his behalf on said motion was fatally defective and void for the reason that it was not made by the defendant himself. Section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the affidavit of merits upon motion for change of place of trial must be filed by the defendant. The Supreme Court, construing this section of the Code in an early case, decided that this did not mean that the affidavit of merits must be made by the defendant, but upheld the sufficiency of an affidavit of merits made by the attorney. Nicholl v. Nicholl, 66 Cal. 36, 4 Pac. 882. This being so, we see no reason for holding that an affidavit of merits may not be made by any person on behalf of the defendant who is sufficiently familiar with the facts of the case to make the same; and hence that the affidavit of merits on this case made by the defendant's wife was a sufficient compliance with the statute.

[2, 3] The appellant further contends, however, that the affidavit of the defendant's wife, in so far as it purported to be an affidavit of residence of the defendant, was insufficient in point of form, for the reason that it did not contain facts showing that the defendant's residence was in Los Angeles at the time of the commencement of the action, but only contained a mere statement of the affiant's conclusion in that regard, which the appellant insists is insufficient for any purpose, citing the cases of Bernou v. Bernou, 15 Cal. App. 341, 114 Pac. 1000, and O'Brien v. O'Brien, 16 Cal. App. 103, 116 Pac. 692. While it is true that these cases hold that an affidavit of residence, when made by another than the defendant himself, should contain more than the mere conclusion of the affiant, still we are of the opinion that an affidavit which merely states such conclusion may be made the subject of amendment in the discretion of the court; and in the case at bar the court, upon the application of the defendant, permitted the defendant to file an amended affidavit of residence and merits, whereupon he filed the affidavit of his attorney of record which it is not contended by the appellant is insufficient in subject-matter. But the appellant urges that this affidavit cannot be considered as an amendment to the prior affidavit, and hence should not be received as such. It has been held, however, that the filing of a new affidavit of merits by another affiant is a sufficient compliance with an order of the court, permitting an amended affidavit to be filed upon motion for a change of the place of trial. Palmer & Rey v. Barclay, 92 Cal. 199, 28 Pac. 226. This being so, and the affidavit of the defendant's attorney being admittedly sufficient in form and substance to comply with the requirements of section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we think the court committed no error in granting the motion for a change of the place of trial of the action.

The order is affirmed.

HAUB v. COUSTETTE et al. (Civ. 1860.)

WORK AND LABOR  14(2)—EXPRESS CONTRACT—PERFORMANCE PREVENTED.

Where plaintiff plumbing contractor was prevented from completing his contract by defendant's abandonment of the construction of the buildings, plaintiff is entitled to recover the reasonable value of the work performed and materials furnished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 29, 32; Dec. Dig.  14(2).]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by George Haub against H. P. Coustette and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James F. Brennan, of San Francisco, for appellants. Fabius T. Finch, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to recover for certain plumbing materials and for work and labor done and performed by the plaintiff.

Just prior to the opening of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition the defendants, owners of a lot of land near one of its principal entrances, let contracts for the erection of three small stores on their lot. One of those contracts was with the plaintiff, under the terms of which he was to furnish and install the plumbing in said building for a specified sum. Shortly after the opening of the Exposition the defendants, having probably discovered that the improvement of their property no longer promised the profitable investment they had anticipated, discontinued the construction of the stores. The plaintiff had proceeded with the performance of his contract, but certain parts of his work could not be performed until the building had progressed to a certain stage; for example, the toilets could not be installed until the floor had been laid on which they were to rest, and the sinks could not be placed in position until the wainscoting on which they were to hang was ready to receive them. The plaintiff on several occasions indicated to the defendants that he was ready and willing to proceed with and finish his work, and the latter on at least one occasion informed him that they were going to do nothing further with the building. It is plain, according to the testimony accepted by the court, that the defendants had abandoned the construction of the stores. Under these circumstances the court was warranted in finding and deciding, as it did, that plaintiff was entitled to recover the reasonable value of the materials furnished and the work performed. The court found that the reasonable value of the work unperformed called for by the contract was $55, and directed that this amount be deducted from the contract price, and judgment for the balance was accordingly entered in plaintiff's favor.

Such judgment appears to us to be just and legal. The defendants having delayed and prevented the plaintiff from completing his contract, the latter was entitled to recover the reasonable value of the work done. McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., 149 Cal. 60, 85 Pac. 929, L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171. In Carlson v. Sheehan, 157 Cal. 692, 696, 109 Pac. 29, 30, the court said:

"Where a person agrees to do a thing for another for a specified sum of money to be paid on full performance, he is not entitled to any part of the sum until he has himself done the thing he agreed to do, unless full performance has been delayed, prevented or excused by the act of the other party, or by operation of law, or by the act of God or the public enemy, as specified in section 1511 of the Civil Code. If performance is prevented by the party who is to make such payment, the person doing the things is entitled to payment as for full performance. Civ. Code, § 1512. And if one party breaks an intermediate covenant of an executory agreement, the other party may treat the entire contract as rescinded and recover in quantum meruit for the value of the work he has done under it. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60 [18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164]."

The defendants contend that there is a variance in the findings on the second and third counts, but no pains have been taken to point out the asserted inconsistency, and an examination of the record fails to reveal any merit in such contention.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by E. O. Reese against the G. B. Amigo Company. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying defendant's motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. A. Lee, of San Francisco, and Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for appellant. Short & Sutherland, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment and an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. The plaintiff, acting for himself and also for two other persons of whom he was the assignee, brought this action against the defendant to recover the contract price of certain Zinfandel grapes, alleged to have been sold and delivered to the defendant in September, 1913, pursuant to the terms of three contracts for the purchase of said grapes for that year, entered into between the plaintiff and his assignors, respectively, and the defendant herein, by the terms of which the plaintiff and his assignors agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant first crop Zinfandel grapes, which were to be raised in the county of Fresno and shipped from Kerman in said county to said defendant in the city and county of San Francisco, which was designated as the place of delivery and acceptance of said produce. These contracts were made with the plaintiff and his assignors on behalf of the defendant by one Carl A. Heijne, who was the duly authorized agent of the defendant for the purpose of making said contracts. When the first carloads of said grapes arrived in San Francisco they were rejected by the defendant, which refused to receive them as first crop grapes, or to take any pay for them under said contracts, and refused to receive any more grapes of a like quality, whereupon the plaintiff and his assignors sold the remainder of their crop of grapes to other persons, and then brought this action for the price of the grapes shipped to the defendant as aforesaid. Upon the trial of the cause the court found that the carloads of grapes so shipped were first crop Zinfandel grapes of the quality required by the terms of said contracts, and also found that the defendant had accepted said grapes as such at Kerman at the time of their shipment from that point, and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. From an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial it has prosecuted this appeal.

[1, 2] The first contention of the appellant is that the court erred in the admission of evidence tending to show that Carl A. Heijne continued to act as the authorized agent of the defendant up to and including the time of the shipment of said grapes, and tending to show that prior to and at the time of said shipment said Heijne, purporting to act as the duly authorized agent of the defendant, had approved the quality of said grapes and accepted them as sufficient under the contract at the point of their shipment. It is the appellant's contention that this proof tended to vary the terms of the written contracts between the parties, which provided that the place of delivery and acceptance of said grapes should be the city and county of San Francisco. We are of the opinion, however, that such would not be the effect of the introduction of such evidence, but that the proofs thus adduced would simply amount to evidence of a waiver on the part of the defendant of the provisions of its contracts with regard to the place of delivery and acceptance of the grapes. We are of the opinion that the defendant might, through its duly authorized officers or agents, have accepted and received said produce at Kerman, instead of requiring that they be delivered at San Francisco, and that the place of acceptance should be there. The only question, therefore, presented on the record is as to whether said Carl A. Heijne was the duly authorized agent of the defendant for the purpose of acceptance of said produce at Kerman. Upon this subject the evidence is clearly conflicting, with the preponderance rather in favor of the view that Heijne acted as the agent of the defendant throughout the cropping season, and that his ostensible authority was such as would have entitled him to have bound the defendant by his approval and acceptance of the grapes at the place of their shipment. This being so, the finding of the court to the effect that the goods were delivered and accepted at Kerman will not be disturbed.

The appellant further contends that the evidence in the case is insufficient to show that the grapes were first crop and of the quality required by the contracts in question; but as to that matter also the evidence is in conflict, and for that reason this further finding of the court will not be disturbed.

The final contention of the defendant is that there was a conspiracy between Heijne and the plaintiff and his associates, by which unmarketable grapes were to be shipped to the defendant and the contract thus violated, so as to enable the plaintiff and his associates to evade it and sell the remainder of their crop at a higher price upon a rising market. This defense does not appear to have been pleaded nor in fact presented upon the trial of the cause in the lower court; but, aside from this, we do not think the evidence is sufficient to sustain the appellant's contention.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Edna R. Bellinger against James

B. Hughes and others. Judgment for plaintiff and order denying motion for new trial, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

C. J. Willett, of Pasadena, for appellants. G. A. Gibbs and Elliot Gibbs, both of Pasadena, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for personal injuries. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

The injury, damages for which are sought, was the result of a collision between an automobile operated by defendant Hughes and plaintiff while she was crossing from the north side of Colorado street, in Pasadena, to the south side thereof, at a point along the east line of Los Robles avenue which at right angles intersects Colorado street. The record here presented is not only meager, but to a large extent unintelligible by reason of the fact that a map or plat, not brought up in the record, was used by witnesses who pointed out thereon positions and places of knowledge of which is necessary to a proper understanding of the relation of the parties to the location where the injury occurred. But to the court this evidence, without the map, is meaningless.

Numerous errors are assigned, only one of which, however, we deem necessary to consider, as upon this we are of the opinion that the judgment and order must be reversed. This error consists in giving to the jury, without qualification thereof, an instruction numbered 17, as follows:

"If an automobile driver not being able to see a street crossing which he is approaching because of a passing street car, instead of stopping his machine, merely changes its direction so as to go around the car, and in doing so comes suddenly upon and runs into and injures a person, he is guilty of gross negligence, and is liable for all damage proximately caused thereby."

It appears that a street car track was maintained along Colorado street west of Los Robles avenue, which at the intersection was extended in a southerly direction along the latter street. Immediately before the time of the injury a street car operated upon said line was on the track at a point just west of the line of Los Robles avenue and about to turn southerly into said avenue, when plaintiff, who was crossing Colorado street and had reached a point therein about half or two-thirds of the way between the street car tracks and the curb, saw the automobile on the south side of Colorado street and near the west line of Los Robles avenue. She testifies that this automobile appeared to be held up by the street car, which was about to turn in front of it into Los Robles avenue, or for other reasons had slowed down. At all events, she says she was sure, since the street in front of her over which she was crossing was clear, that she had time to reach the south curb line thereof before the automobile would reach the line of her travel in effecting the crossing. When eight or ten feet from the south curb line of Colorado street she was struck by the motor car and knocked down. There is evidence, though contradicted, tending to show that plaintiff at the time she was struck by the automobile was facing east—that is, in the direction in which the automobile was going—and when “she got just beyond the tracks that are in the center of the street she got out of the way of a passing motorcycle.” Plaintiff testified that she “saw the automobile plain enough” when it was approaching just back of the street car. As to whether any signal was given by the operator of the automobile by horn or bell, and as to the speed at which it was operated—whether rather fast, as testified to by one witness, moderate speed, or slowly, as testified by others—the evidence is likewise conflicting.

[1] The answer alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and since there was evidence which, if believed by the jury, would establish such fact, the question as to whether or not plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, which constituted the proximate cause of her injury, should have been submitted to the jury for determination; and had it so found, this court could not have disturbed such verdict. The claim, as to which there was a conflict of evidence, that plaintiff had her eyes turned away from the automobile, the approach of which she had noticed, and that she stepped back to escape a collision with a passing motorcycle, if believed, might justify a conclusion of negligence on the part of plaintiff. And her own testimony to the effect that the distance between the line upon which she was crossing the street and the approaching automobile was little more than the intervening space of Los Robles avenue (width, however, not shown) might be deemed well calculated, if believed by the jury, to constitute a sufficient warning to her of danger from which by the exercise of ordinary care she could escape. Reasonable minds might have differed as to whether or not, under the circumstances, she was justified in concluding that the motor would not continue its progress, and as to whether she should not at least have looked in the direction of the approaching automobile, and this even though no sound of the horn or other signal was given. “The fact of negligence is generally an inference from many facts and circumstances, all of which it is the province of the jury to find.” Schierhold v. North Beach & M. R. R. Co., 40 Cal. 453. In Davis v. Pacific Power Co., 107 Cal. 575, 40 Pac. 952, 48 Am. St. Rep. 156, it is said:

“It is only where the undisputed facts are such as to leave but one reasonable inference, and that of negligence, that the court is justified in taking the question from the jury.”

Where either negligence is set up as a cause of action or contributory negligence pleaded as a defense, it seldom happens that the question is so clear from doubt that the court can undertake to say as a matter of law how the jury should find upon such issues. It is apparent, we think, that plaintiff relied upon the course of the automobile being obstructed by the street car which she had reason to think was about to turn into Los Robles avenue ahead of the automobile. Whether an inference of negligence on the part of the plaintiff in not further watching the approach of the automobile was justified depended upon whether she was justified in this reasoning. As said in Johnson v. Thomas (Cal.) 43 Pac. 578:

[2, 3] The evidence shows that the position of the street car was such as to partially at least obstruct the automobile driver's view of the street crossing, and that he did not see the plaintiff until after his automobile had passed the street car, when he came suddenly upon plaintiff, which facts bring the case directly within the instruction given. Nevertheless, if the jury were satisfied that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, which was the proximate cause of her injury, she was not entitled to recover. In effect, the jury was told to disregard all evidence tending to prove contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, and in effect took from it the consideration of all evidence tending to show negligence and carelessness on her part. Such we do not conceive to be the law. Whether such act on the part of the automobile driver would constitute negligence and render him liable for damages caused by a collision would depend upon the decree of care required in the operation of his machine, and this in turn would depend upon the dangerous character of the machine, its size, weight, the speed at which it was operated, the noise it made, condition of the streets, and other conditions which might be mentioned. Simeone v. Lindsay, 6 Pennewill, 224, 65 Atl. 778. Whether plaintiff was warranted, after she saw the approaching automobile a short distance away, knowing that it would cross the line of her travel, in not further watching the approach thereof, was a question upon which minds might well differ, and hence it should have been submitted to the jury. Respondent attempts to justify the giving of this instruction upon the authority of Gregory v. Slaughter, 124 Ky. 345, 99 S. W. 247, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1228, 124 Am. St. Rep. 402, the syllabus of which reads as follows:

There is no evidence here, however, that the intersection of Colorado street and Los Robles avenue was a much-used street. On the contrary, it might be that it was seldom traveled or crossed. Nor does the evidence show that the defendant ran his automobile around the end of the street car, and the evidence cannot as a matter of law be said to justify the conclusion that the car was being driven at a high rate of speed, or at other than a moderate rate of speed.

[4] It is true that the court elsewhere in the instructions told the jury that even though it found defendant guilty of negligence in managing the automobile, its verdict must be in his favor if they found that plaintiff was guilty of negligence constituting the proximate cause of the injuries received; and also told them that if plaintiff in the exercise of ordinary care, by looking or listening, might have observed the automobile approaching, and did not exercise such care, she was guilty of negligence which would prevent her recovery. Instruction No. 17, however, was given without any qualifications whatever, and it is impossible to reconcile it with other instructions. The evidence tended clearly to show the facts upon which the jury were therein told that defendant was guilty of gross negligence and liable for damages, and was well calculated to mislead the jury in arriving at its verdict. Under these circumstances, our conclusion is that it constitutes prejudicial error.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

An indictment under Pen. Code, § 182, subd. 5, declaring a conspiracy to commit any act for the obstruction of justice or the due administration of the law to be a criminal conspiracy, alleging that defendant unlawfully, willfully, and fraudulently conspired and agreed to obtain the release from custody of a party confined to the county jail awaiting trial upon an indictment for a felony by presenting to the superior court a fraudulent, worthless, and void bail bond, stated facts sufficient to constitute the offense charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Frank Ambrose was convicted of criminal conspiracy, and from the conviction and the denial of his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

John D. Harloe, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. In an indictment returned to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco the defendant herein, jointly with three other persons, was charged with the crime of criminal conspiracy. The appeal is from the judgment of final conviction, and from an order denying a new trial.

Subdivision 5 of section 182 of the Penal Code, under which the indictment evidently was drawn, denounces as a criminal conspiracy the conduct of two or more persons who conspire "to commit any act * * * for the perversion or obstruction of justice or due administration of the laws." The charging part of the indictment alleges that the defendant, acting in concert with the three codefendants, "did unlawfully, willfully, and fraudulently conspire, combine, confederate, and agree to obtain the release and discharge from custody" of one Joseph Monahan (who was confined in the county jail pending trial upon an indictment which charged him with the commission of a felony), "by presenting to the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco a fraudulent, worthless, and void bail bond." The indictment further alleged that two of the codefendants had agreed to falsely swear and did so swear, when qualifying as sureties upon the bail bond of Monahan, that they were each worth the sum of $2,500, the amount fixed as bail, over and above their just debts and liabilities, and that they were respectively the owners of certain real estate situated in the county of Yolo and the city and county of San Francisco.

[1] Apparently the only connection which the defendant Ambrose had with the conspiracy charged, in so far as the allegations of the indictment are concerned, is to be found in the concluding paragraph of the indictment, which alleged that he advised and counseled Shaney, one of the codefendants who became a surety on the bond, "to execute said bond and to swear that he was the owner of said property." It will be noted that the indictment does not charge that it was the intent and purpose of the defendant and his alleged co-conspirators to do anything more by the preparation and presentation of the bail bond in question than to procure the release of Monahan upon bail pending his trial upon the felony charged against him. Neither expressly nor by necessary implication does the indictment allege that the release of Monahan upon worthless bail was procured primarily for the purpose of permitting him to abscond and thereby evade the possible penalties of a trial and conviction. Nevertheless we are of the opinion that the indictment states facts sufficient to constitute the offense charged against the defendant, and that therefore his demurrer was properly overruled by the trial court. True it is that release from custody upon bail pending trial is ordinarily the constitutional and statutory right of every person charged with crime; but it is equally true that it is neither the constitutional nor statutory right of a person to be so released by means of a false and worthless bail bond; and it seems certain to us that the procurement of the release in that manner is a perversion of the due administration of the law, and therefore comes within the denunciation of subdivision 5 of section 182 of the Penal Code.

[2] We are not satisfied, however, upon a review of the evidence adduced upon the entire case that the judgment against this defendant cannot be sustained. The only evidence adduced upon behalf of the people tending in any way to connect the defendant with the alleged conspiracy may be stated in substance to be that the codefendant Shaughnessy qualified as a surety upon the bail bond in question under the name of Shaney; that the property, which at the time of qualifying he swore he owned, stood of record in the name of Shaney; that the property originally belonged to Ambrose; that the latter had placed it of record in the name of Shaney at a time when he was having trouble with his wife; that Shaughnessy, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant Ambrose, pretended to be the owner of the property, and on one or two occasions exercised acts of ownership over the property by borrowing money secured by mortgages upon it executed and acknowledged in the name of Shaney; that one Barkley, attorney for Monahan, called upon Ambrose for the purpose of having him procure Shaughnessy as a bondsman, giving as security the property in question; that the defendant Ambrose stated to Barkley that he had no objection to Shaughnessy going upon the bond; and that when Shaughnessy mentioned the subject of going upon the bond Ambrose replied: "If you desire it, go on the bond; it is all right; I think Monahan is all right." Incidentally it was shown in evidence that Shaughnessy was sometimes known as Shaney.

In the face of this evidence we do not think it can be said that the bond, as regards Shaughnessy's qualifications to serve thereon, was valueless. Even though the defendant Ambrose claimed to have been the real owner of the property, nevertheless inasmuch as the record title was in the name of Shaney, and that Shaughnessy under the name of Shaney (by which he was sometimes known) duly executed and acknowledged the bond, there can be no doubt that the property standing in the name of Shaney could have been resorted to in satisfaction of a breach of the bond had one occurred. This being so, it cannot be held that the evidence sustains the allegation of the indictment to the effect that Ambrose counseled and advised his codefendant Shaughnessy to execute and qualify upon a false and worthless bond. It may be conceded that the evidence shows that the codefendant Gilfeather, who qualified as surety upon the bond, perjured himself when he swore upon qualifying that he was the owner of certain property situate in the city and county of San Francisco, and that therefore, in so far as Gilfeather was concerned, the bond was false and valueless; but aside from the fact that the indictment does not charge Ambrose with having counseled and advised Gilfeather to execute the bond and qualify as a surety thereon, we have been unable to find in the record any evidence showing or tending to show any connection of the defendant Ambrose with his codefendant Gilfeather in the preparation and presentation of the bond. In short, in so far as the evidence shows, whatever Ambrose may have done in the transaction was independent of anything done by Gilfeather. This being so, it cannot be said that the conspiracy charged in the indictment was sustained by the evidence adduced at the trial.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to refer to and decide the other points presented upon the appeal.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION §112—BURDEN OF PROOF—CHARACTER OF POSSESSION—STATUTE.

In an action to quiet title to uncultivated land, a defendant, without color of title, in order to establish his claim of adverse possession, was required to show that the land had been protected by a substantial inclosure and had been cultivated and improved during his use and possession, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 325.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by Albert J. Cory against W. J. Hotchkiss and D. J. Canty, with counterclaim by defendants. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendants appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

E. A. Williams, of Fresno, for appellants. Drew & Drew and Frank Kauke, all of Fresno, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The plaintiff in this action sought and recovered judgment against the defendants, quieting his title to 160 acres of land situate in the county of Fresno. The defendants' answer denied all of the material allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and, cross-complaining, claimed title to the lands in dispute by adverse possession, and also under a purported tax sale and deed from the county tax collector to one R. M. Barthold, which was followed by a deed from the latter to the defendant Hotchkiss, alleged to have been made and executed for the benefit of Hotchkiss and the defendant Canty. The trial court found that the tax sale which was the basis of the tax collector's deed to Barthold was invalid for the reason that it was made for an amount in excess of that permitted by law. It is conceded that the evidence sustains this finding, and that as a consequence the tax deed did not, as further found by the trial court, convey any title to the land in dispute to Barthold or his purported successor in interest. It is claimed, however, that by reason of the purported deed from the tax collector to Barthold and the deed from him to the defendant Hotchkiss, the defendants had color of title sufficient to support their claim of title to the land by adverse possession under the provisions of section 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The record title to the land having been shown to be in the plaintiff, presumptively he was seised of the possession within the time required by law, and therefore the burden was upon the defendants to show that they, or either of them, having color of title to the land, had held and possessed the same as against the plaintiff for the full statutory period of five years preceding the commencement of the present action. Code Civ. Proc. § 321.

[2] In support of the burden thus placed upon the defendants they showed that yearly for seven or eight years prior to the commencement of the action the defendant Canty had, in writing, leased the land in suit to one Pucheu for the purpose of pasturing sheep thereon, and that during a portion of each of those several years Pucheu did run and pasture as many as three separate herds of sheep upon the land for a period of from two to six months in each year. Each band of sheep had a herder, and these herders, during the time that the sheep were pasturing, were in the habit of traveling back and forth over the land. Bands of sheep belonging to other persons at times traveled across the land to water at a well situated on the southeast corner of the land. Pucheu's sheep were upon the land only during the pasture season, and although during that season he was upon the land once a week, he did not know of his own knowledge whether his herders prevented the sheep of other persons pasturing upon the land leased by him; and, because of his lack of knowledge as to where the lines of the land actually ran, he was unable to say whether or not the sheep of other persons had roamed and pastured upon the land at the times his sheep were there. Supplementing the evidence of Pucheu, there was testimony of another witness for the defense, to the effect that he knew that Pucheu had pastured sheep upon the land in suit, and that, in so far as he knew, no other sheep were permitted to pasture there.

This is substantially a statement of the evidence introduced at the trial and relied upon by the defendants with reference to the actual use and occupation of the land. It was an admitted fact in the case—and the trial court found—that all taxes levied upon the land in suit subsequent to the date of the tax deed to Barthold were paid by the defendant Hotchkiss, and that the defendant Canty paid nothing for or on account of such taxes. While the evidence shows that the land was neither cultivated, improved, nor inclosed, it is conceded that inasmuch as Hotchkiss had color of title to the land, he might have supported his claim of adverse possession by proof of his possession and occupancy of the land for the purpose of pasturage, coupled with proof that he had employed herders to keep his own stock on the land and other stock off. Subdivision 3, § 323, Code Civ. Proc.; Bullock v. Rouse, 81 Cal. 590, 22 Pac. 919. However, it does not appear from the record before us that the defendant Hotchkiss at any time, personally or otherwise, occupied and so used the land, or that he did anything with reference to the same after receiving the deed from Barthold save to pay the taxes thereon. Therefore it cannot be said that he had continuously or at all occupied the land for the purpose of pasturage for the statutory period of five years; and consequently it must be held that his claim of adverse possession was not made out. True, the defendants in their cross-complaint alleged that Barthold conveyed the land to the defendant Hotchkiss for the use and benefit of Hotchkiss and Canty. This allegation, however, was duly denied by the plaintiff's answer to the cross-complaint; and the record is absolutely barren of any evidence showing, or tending to show, any interest in common between them under the deed or otherwise, or that the defendant Canty was in privity or ever claimed any right, title, or interest in the land under or through the defendant Hotchkiss. In so far as the record shows, the source of Canty's right to lease the land to Pucheu does not appear and certainly there was no showing that in so leasing the lands he was acting for Hotchkiss, or jointly for himself and Hotchkiss.

[3] The defendant Canty, not having connected himself with the purported title of Hotchkiss, cannot be said to have had possession of the land in dispute under color of title, and therefore, in order to establish his claim of adverse possession, it was incumbent upon him to show compliance with the provisions of section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, viz.: (1) That the land had been protected by a substantial inclosure; or (2) that it had been cultivated and improved during his alleged use and occupation of the same. This the defendant Canty did not do, and therefore his defense of adverse possession necessarily failed when measured by the provisions of the Code section last cited.

[4] But, aside from this, we are of the opinion that the evidence adduced relative to the use and occupation of the land by Canty's lessee would not have sufficed to support a finding that the defendants, or either of them, had exclusive use and occupation of the land for the statutory period within the intent and meaning of the provisions of section 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The mere fact that Canty assumed the ownership of the land and leased the same to Pucheu may have been some evidence that it was the intent of Canty to claim the land; but if, as the evidence shows, he did no more, and that the land was not occupied by Pucheu under the lease in the manner and for the period prescribed by the statute, then of course the mere intent of Canty would not afford any substantial support to the claim of adverse possession; and certain it is that the defendants did not affirmatively show, as they were required to do, that during the time that the land was not used for grazing purposes it was not otherwise used and occupied by the plaintiff, or other persons claiming under him or independent of him. The testimony that "this quarter section is used for nothing after the end of the pasture season" is the only evidence to be found in the record upon this phase of the case; and obviously the scope of that testimony must be confined to the use to which the land was usually put, and clearly cannot be construed as establishing the fact that the land was not occupied during and after the close of the pasturing season. In brief, the proof proffered in the present case, in support of the claim of adverse possession, as in the case of Strauss v. Canty, 169 Cal. 101, 145 Pac. 1012, "was entirely consistent with the view that the possession of those holding under Canty was casual and intermittent," and therefore, as was said in that case:

"The court was entirely justified in concluding that the defendant had not proven an exclusive and continuous possession sufficient to satisfy the statute."

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Suit by H. C. Colton against Evan E. Anderson, J. H. Ryckman, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying motion for new trial, Ryckman appeals; the other defendants having been defaulted. Affirmed.

Harriman, Ryckman & Tuttle, of Los Angeles, for appellant. H. S. Rollins, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. The mortgage was given to secure the payment of two notes which were dated February 13, 1912. The first note was for $17,000, payable on or before three years after date—

"with interest from November 1, 1911, until paid, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually; should the interest not be so paid, it shall become a part of the principal and thereafter bear like interest as the principal. Should default be made in the payment of any installment of interest when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note."

The other note was for $500, due in six months from date, with interest from November 1, 1911, payable at maturity. No interest having been paid, the plaintiff on June 24, 1912, declared the whole sum of principal and interest of the first note to be then due and payable, and filed this action for foreclosure of the mortgage. By supplemental complaint filed August 21, 1912, the action was made to include the second note. Judgment by default was entered against the defendants Anderson, makers of the notes and mortgage, and the only defense presented is that of defendant Ryckman, who purchased a part of the property subject to the lien of this mortgage. Defendant Ryckman presents this appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] As stated in the brief of appellant, the only point involved in this case relates to his contention that the suit was prematurely brought. As to this we are of the opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain his action by reason of nonpayment of the interest on the larger note on May 1, 1912. The statement in the note that interest was to be paid from November 1, 1911, at the specified rate, "payable semiannually," clearly made the first installment of interest due May 1, 1912. In view of defendant's claim that the note was uncertain in this respect, the plaintiff introduced evidence which shows beyond any doubt that the intention of the parties was in accord with this interpretation of their note. But we base our decision upon the note itself without reference to such extraneous evidence.

[2] Appellant set up in his answer the further defense that before purchasing the lots which were acquired by him early in May, 1912, he caused inquiry to be made of the plaintiff as to the time when the interest on the $17,000 note would fall due, and was assured by the plaintiff that it would not be due until August 13th. In support of this defense we have the testimony of two witnesses. But they are contradicted as to the material parts thereof by the testimony of the plaintiff. Upon this evidence the court found that appellant in buying the lots did not rely upon any statements of the plaintiff regarding said mortgage. At all events, under our construction of the note itself, the defense was not available to appellant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

STIPULATIONS $\Leftarrow$ 14(6) — INVOLUNTARY DISMISSAL.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 583, providing that actions shall be dismissed on defendant's motion or by the court of its own motion unless brought to trial within five years after defendant has filed answer, except when the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended, and making dismissal after five years mandatory, where an action was commenced in 1896, and defendant answered in 1897, and the parties stipulated in 1898 that the trial of the action should be "continued, to be dropped from the calendar, to be reset on notice, subject to the discretion of the court," the action was subject to dismissal on defendant's motion; there being nothing in the stipulation which, fairly construed, took the case out of the operation of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. $\Leftarrow$ 14(6).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Central Pacific Railroad Company against Eugene Riley. Defendant having died, Daniel E. Riley was substituted. From an order dismissing for lack of prosecution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, of San Francisco, and Tom M. Bradley and Harry E. Leach, both of Oakland, for appellant. Powell & Dow, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order dismissing an action for lack of prosecution.

The action was commenced in January, 1896, and in March, 1897, the answer of the defendant was filed. After the cause had thus been at issue for over 17 years, and not having been in the meantime brought to trial, the same on motion of the defendant was dismissed for failure to prosecute the same with due diligence. Section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"Any action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed * * * on motion of the defendant, after due notice to plaintiff, or by the court on its own motion, unless such action is brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended" —and the making of an order of dismissal, after the expiration of the 5-year period, is mandatory upon the court. Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, 138 Pac. 1002.

The defendant asserts that a stipulation entered into by the parties 16 years before the notice of motion to dismiss was served relieved it of the necessity of bringing the action to trial within the 5 years. The stipulation is as follows:

"It is hereby stipulated that the trial of the above-entitled action be, and the same is hereby continued, to be dropped from the calendar, to be reset on notice, subject to the discretion of the court, and a trial by jury is hereby waived." Dated April 13, A. D. 1898.

Under the terms of the stipulation the case was dropped from the calendar, to be reset upon notice, and it was in exactly the same position it occupied prior to the time when it was set, and subject, therefore, to the provisions of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, above set out. There is nothing in the stipulation which can fairly be construed as taking the case out of the operation of the terms of that section. After the case was dropped from the calendar according to the stipulation, it was still the duty of the plaintiff to see that the case was brought to trial. Kubli v. Hawckett, 89 Cal. 638, 27 Pac. 57; Mowry v. Weisenborn, 137 Cal. 110, 69 Pac. 971.

The order is affirmed.

COSTS ⇐32(3)—PREVAILING PARTY—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subsec. 5, declaring that costs are allowed as of course to the plaintiff upon a judgment in his favor in an action involving the title or possession of real estate, the plaintiff, in an action involving water rights, conceded to be an action in the nature of a suit to quiet title to real property, which recovered a judgment for only part of its demand, and though the defendant recovered for part of its demand, was entitled to costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by the Stimson Canal & Irrigation Company against the Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Company and others, and action by the same plaintiff and the Crescent Canal Company against the People's Ditch Company and the Last Chance Water Ditch Company, and action by Cuthbert Burrell Company and others against the People's Ditch Company and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the named defendants appeal, and from orders in each case, denying their motions to strike out plaintiffs' cost bill, the appellants appeal. Orders affirmed.

E. C. Farnsworth, of Visalia, L. L. Cory, of Fresno, and H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, for appellants. Frank H. Short, W. A. Sutherland, and M. K. Harris, all of Fresno, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The point involved in the three cases above entitled is identical, and they may be considered together.

The judgment in each case quieted the plaintiff's title to certain water rights subject to the title of the appellant, and the court awarded plaintiff its costs. The appellant moved to strike out the plaintiff's cost bill. From the order in each case denying the motion the appeal is prosecuted.

It is conceded that the action, concerning as it does the water rights of the parties in a certain river in Fresno county, is an action in the nature of a suit to quiet title to real property. It falls, therefore, so far as regards costs, within the provisions of section 1022, Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that:

"Costs are allowed, of course, to the plaintiff upon a judgment in his favor in the following cases: * * * 5. In an action which involves the title or possession of real estate. * * *"

While it is true that the plaintiff did not receive all that it asked for in its complaint, nevertheless it recovered a judgment for part of its demand, and is therefore entitled to costs. Hoyt v. Hart, 149 Cal. 722, 731, 87 Pac. 569; F. A. Hihn Co. v. City of Santa Cruz, 24 Cal. App. 365, 141 Pac. 391. In each case the appellant in its answer also claimed the right to divert certain quantities of water from said river, and also alleged that its rights in that regard were prior to those of the plaintiff. It also recovered judgment for part of what it claimed, and perhaps it was entitled to its costs; but as to this it is sufficient to say that that question is not before us.

The order in each of the cases above entitled, denying appellant's motion to strike out plaintiff's cost bill, is therefore affirmed.

2. ASSAULT AND BATTERY ⇐42—RIGHTS OF OWNER—FORCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐932(1) — EXCESSIVE DAMAGES—DISCRETION OF JURY—PRESUMPTIONS.

The amount of damages for assault and unlawful imprisonment rests so largely in the discretion of the jury that, in considering an attack on a verdict as excessive, the appellate court must treat every conflict in testimony as resolved in plaintiff's favor and give him the benefit of every reasonable inference.

5. FALSE IMPRISONMENT ⇐36 — EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Verdict of $2,500 to a woman in good health, who was assaulted and placed in a wagon, with cage inclosure, to force payment for C. O. D. package, and thereby humiliated, excited, and nervously shocked and seriously affected as to health for a long period, was not excessive.

6. TRIAL ⇐232(5) — INSTRUCTIONS—DEFINITION OF TERMS.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Anna W. Riffel against Arthur Letts and others. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. F. Macfarlane and Clair S. Tappan, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. T. C. Gould and Shaw & Stewart, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant Arthur Letts owns and operates a department store in the city of Los Angeles. The plaintiff purchased certain merchandise in his store and requested that it be delivered to her at her residence, the price to be paid on delivery. The goods were delivered by the defendant Withrow, an employé of Letts, to whom the plaintiff tendered a $10 bill and received the change amounting to $8.65. While this exchange of money was going on the plaintiff suddenly remembered that she had had in her possession two $10 bills, and, acting under the belief that she had delivered one of them to Withrow, she attempted to withdraw the bill which she had tendered, but which still remained in her hand. According to Withrow's testimony this bill was in his possession, and she seized and took it out of his hand. But this is disputed by her; and, as the fact is material, it must be deemed that the jury believed her testimony. Thereupon Withrow seized the plaintiff, violently pulled her from place to place in the yard near the door of her house, and finally lifted her up and carried her to the street and placed her in the wagon in a caged inclosure, the door of which he closed and fastened. After some delay and discussion, lasting for about an hour, Withrow and his assistant released the plaintiff from the wagon, and went with her into her house, where the missing bill was discovered lying between the pages of a notebook on a table. As a result of the acts of the defendant Withrow, plaintiff received certain bruises upon her shoulder and left leg and suffered serious nervous shock and injury, so that she was confined to her bed for about three weeks. The imprisonment of plaintiff in the wagon took place in the presence of a number of neighbors of Mrs. Riffel, the attention of these persons having been attracted by the noise and violence there occurring. The complaint in this action is in two counts, whereby she seeks to recover damages on account of the injuries received by her, seeking damages, first, for the assault and battery, and, second, as for a false and unlawful imprisonment. The case was tried to a jury, which returned a general verdict on which judgment has been entered in the sum of $2,500 and costs. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Appellants insist that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury for the reasons: (1) That it was not shown that Withrow acted in an unjustifiable manner in restraining the plaintiff; (2) that in view of the evidence the amount of damages allowed was excessive.

[1-3] Force may be used by the owner to retake property from a person who has obtained possession of it by force or fraud and is overtaken while carrying it away. As much force as is necessary may be used to retain one's property which a trespasser has taken into possession and is trying to carry away. Hodden v. Hubbard, 18 Vt. 506, 46 Am. Dec. 167; Gyre v. Culver, 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 592; Johnson v. Perry, 56 Vt. 703, 48 Am. Rep. 826; Hopkins v. Dickson, 59 N. H. 235. The court gave to the jury instructions, correctly stating the law as to these matters. It was for the jury to determine from the evidence whether or not the bill was taken by the plaintiff by force, or taken or withheld with fraudulent intent, and whether or not excessive and unnecessary force was used by Withrow upon the person of plaintiff. As there is evidence favorable to the plaintiff upon these issues, the verdict thereon is conclusive in this court. Therefore it must be taken as true that the plaintiff had not parted with possession of the bill, that she was acting in good faith, and that the force used by Withrow was excessive even if it had been lawful.

[4] Next it is claimed that the verdict was excessive in amount. As a general rule, what will be a proper and reasonable compensation for the damages occasioned by injuries to the person is a question committed to the sound discretion of the jury. In considering an attack upon a verdict as excessive, the appellate court must treat every conflict of the evidence as resolved in favor of the respondent, and must give him the benefit of every inference that can reasonably be drawn in support of his claim. Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 273, 277, 104 Pac. 312.

[5] It is admitted by counsel for respondent that under the first cause of action as stated in the complaint the damages for injuries from the assault and battery were limited at the time of the trial to a period of three months following the date of the transaction. This being so, it may be that the amount of the verdict under the evidence in this case would be excessive if applied to the first cause of action alone. But the plaintiff's recovery also includes the second cause of action, namely, for an unlawful imprisonment. The jury was instructed that it must not allow damages by way of example or penalty, and that as to the first cause of action the recovery must be limited to facts or circumstances arising within three months from the date of the assault. The second cause of action was submitted under the general instruction, authorizing an assessment for actual damages only. There was evidence showing that the plaintiff was an unmarried woman about 45 years of age, and at that time in good health. She suffered much humiliation and distress of mind at the time and afterwards, caused by being arrested and imprisoned in a caged wagon in the public street and in the presence of her neighbors. That this caused great nervous excitement and shock, which seriously affected her health for a considerable time thereafter, is indicated by evidence sufficient legally to warrant the verdict, and we are not justified in setting it aside as excessive, or as having been rendered as the result of passion or prejudice, or anything other than a fair consideration of the evidence.

[6] Objection is made to the eighth instruction given to the jury. That instruction defines an arrest, and states that:

"For a private person to take another into custody, without legal justification, and restrain him of his liberty for a time and then turn him loose without taking him before a magistrate, or to a peace officer, is unlawful, and constitutes a trespass upon the liberty of the one so restrained for which he may be compensated in damages."

Appellants' criticism of this instruction is that the court failed to adequately explain the words "without legal justification," and it is contended that this omission was exremely prejudicial to the defendants, as implying that under the circumstances of the case the plaintiff was entitled to damages. A sufficient answer is that in other instructions, to which no objection is made, the court gave instructions showing the circumstances under which an arrest or imprisonment is legal or justifiable, and also the circumstances under which an arrest or imprisonment is not legal or justifiable.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by William Grant against Charles A. Warren. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas B. Dozier and Reid & Dozier, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Harding & Monroe and Grant & Zimdars, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from the judgment and also the order denying a motion for a new trial. It is virtually conceded, however, by appellant that by reason of irregularities as to the statement on motion for a new trial we are, in effect, limited to the consideration of the appeal from the judgment and to the determination of whether the findings support said judgment. The findings necessary for an understanding of the situation are as follows:

"That heretofore and on the 26th day of March, 1912, the plaintiff was the owner of 595 per cent. first mortgage bonds of the par value of $500 each, issued by the Columbia Marble Quarries, Inc., a corporation. That the payment of said bonds was secured by a first lien, mortgage, or deed of trust made by said Columbia Marble Quarries, Inc., on that certain property situated in the county of Tuolumne, state of California, which property is more particularly described in the complaint on file herein. That said property included a certain marble quarry hereinafter referred to as the Marble Quarry property. That at the time of the issuance of said bonds and continuously up to and until the time of the sale thereof, as hereinafter found, the said Columbia Marble Quarries, Inc., was the owner of said marble quarry property subject to said bonded indebtedness.

"That on or about the 26th day of March, 1912, this plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant, Charles A. Warren, the said 590 bonds upon the following express terms and conditions, that is to say: First. That the said defendant should immediately pay to plaintiff the sum of $15,000 as a part of the purchase price of said bonds. Second. That said defendant, upon receiving delivery and possession of said bonds, should immediately proceed to sell, or cause to be sold, the property described in the deed of trust made to secure the payment of said bonds, in accordance with the powers conferred upon the holder or holders of said bonds by such deed of trust, and at the sale thereof should purchase said property and hold the same upon certain trusts for the use and benefit of this plaintiff; that is to say: The said defendant agreed to cause a corporation to be organized for the acquiring, owning, and operating of said marble quarry property, and that he would cause and procure said corporation to enter into a proper written agreement with this plaintiff, whereby it should pay plaintiff beginning 18 months from the 26th day of March, 1912, the sum of 50 cents for each and every ton of marble taken out and shipped from said quarries until there should be paid to plaintiff the further sum of $28,000 as the balance of the purchase price of said 590 bonds.

"That it was further agreed that such royalties should be paid on the 15th day of each and every month for all marble shipped during the previous month, and that all such royalty or royalties should be a first lien charge against said marble quarry property."

Then follows a finding to the effect: That Warren, on the delivery to him of said bonds, paid therefor the said sum of $15,000, and proceeded to sell said property under the terms of said trust, and thereupon purchased the same; that he organized a corporation known as the Warren Marble Company. That he acquired control of its corporate stock and of said corporation and dominated its policy and business affairs; that said corporation "at the behest and instigation of said Charles A. Warren, and with full knowledge of the claims of this plaintiff against said property, and in violation of such claims, and without the knowledge or consent of this plaintiff, the said Warren Marble Company on or about the 1st day of July, 1912, made a certain mortgage or deed of trust, mortgaging and conveying said marble quarry property to the defendant, the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, for the purpose of securing the payment of 100 bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each." That said mortgage was duly acknowledged, and was recorded on July 29, 1912. That after said mortgage was recorded, the said corporation made and delivered to plaintiff the agreement attached to the complaint and marked "Exhibit B," providing "that this contract and all moneys payable thereunder shall be a first lien and charge against the said marble quarry property and against the real property herein described." That at the time of the delivery of said "Exhibit B" plaintiff believed it constituted a first lien and charge against said property. That he had no knowledge nor notice of the creation of said bonded indebtedness of $100,000, nor of the making or recording of said deed of trust, and that defendants Warren and the Warren Marble Company repeated to him that said agreement constituted a first lien and charge upon said property.

It is also found that plaintiff performed all the conditions of his agreement; that immediately after he discovered that "said bonded indebtedness had been created and had been made a lien and charge upon said marble quarry property prior to the lien or charge of said agreement 'Exhibit B,' this plaintiff demanded of said defendants Charles A. Warren and the Warren Marble Company that they cancel and annul said bonded indebtedness and said mortgage or deed of trust and make said agreement 'Exhibit B' a first lien or charge against said property, but that said defendants, and each of them, refused and have failed so to do," and that said defendants notified plaintiff that they did not intend engaging in the business of operating and carrying on said marble quarry enterprise and of quarrying and shipping marble from said quarry; and that they did not intend to perform the terms and provisions of said agreement "Exhibit B."

The findings disclose, as stated by respondent, that Warren broke his contract:

"First, by conveying the property to the corporation without reserving a first lien to plaintiff; and without which lien no one would have a right to extract marble from the quarry; second, by impressing the property so conveyed, with the first lien of $100,000 in priority to plaintiff's security, thus putting it out of his power to perform his contract with plaintiff; third, by repudiation of plaintiff's right to have the first lien; fourth, by notice to plaintiff that neither Warren nor the company intended to operate the quarry or pay the royalty."

The groundwork is thus laid for a judgment in favor of plaintiff, unless there be merit in the contention of appellant that, the action being for damages, there should be a specific finding as to the actual pecuniary detriment suffered by plaintiff in consequence of the violation of the contract on the part of appellant. It is argued that for aught that appears to the contrary, there may have been no actual loss to plaintiff as a result of said dereliction. For instance, among other considerations, it is suggested that the quarry, if worked, might not have yielded sufficient to pay any portion of said royalty and reference is made to section 3358 of the Civil Code, providing that:

"Notwithstanding the provisions of this chapter, no person can recover a greater amount in damages for the breach of an obligation than he could have gained by the full performance thereof on both sides, except in the cases specified in the articles on exemplary damages and penal damages, and in sections 3319, 3339 and 3340,"

—it being claimed that the present case does not fall within any of said exceptions.

But we do not regard this action as technically one for damages. It is rather a suit to recover the balance due on the purchase price of property that has been completely transferred to the vendee. There would, of course, be no question if the promise to pay the said $28,000 had been absolute. In other words, if Warren had promised to pay the said amount on delivery of said property by the vendor and had failed or refused to do so, plaintiff could maintain his action immediately. Here the promise was to pay the balance out of the proceeds of the mine, it is true, and therefore was conditional, but in consequence of Warren's failure to give the promised security and his repudiation of his agreement to work the mine, the law treats his promise as an absolute and unconditional one and holds him to an obligation to pay said balance in cash. The authorities seem to take this view of the situation, and we may follow respondent in his quotations from some of the cases. In Wolf v. Marsh, 54 Cal. 228, the action was upon a note for a certain amount containing this provision:

"This note is made with the express understanding that if the coal mines in the Marsh ranch yield no profits to me, then this note is not to be paid, and the obligation herein expressed shall be null and void."

Defendant thereupon conveyed the property, making it impossible for him to operate the mine or derive any profit. In holding him liable on the note, the Supreme Court said:

"When he did that, he violated his contract, and the note at once became due and payable."

In Love v. Mabury, 59 Cal. 484, the contract for the payment for work done on a mine contained this clause:

"And the balance of $900 to be paid out of the first proceeds of the mine, after deducting expenses."

The court declared:

"That the contract contemplated that the defendants were to work the mine 'out of the first proceeds of which, after deducting expenses,' the balance was to be paid, does not admit of doubt. And we are of opinion that their failure and refusal to commence to work it within a reasonable time after the completion and acceptance of the labor and materials bestowed on the property rendered them liable for the balance due therefor."

In Poirier v. Gravel, 88 Cal. 79, 25 Pac. 962, the suit was upon a written promise to pay a stated sum containing this provision:

"The said sum to be so paid in installments in such amounts and at such times as I shall realize each month from such products after payment of all costs and expenses of the gathering or obtaining and selling such products. The said sum of money to be paid only and exclusively from such products of said land as I may be entitled to, and no other property of mine shall be subject to said debt or obligation."

The defendant conveyed the property and thereafter derived no profit. It was said by the court:

"This being so, the balance unpaid became immediately due and payable, and the plaintiff could maintain an action for the recovery thereof."

In Bagley v. Cohen, 121 Cal. 604, 53 Pac. 1117, the balance due was to be paid "out of the profits realized by me from my business of packing raisins at Malaga, during the present season." Defendant conveyed the property, and it was held that "his liability became thereupon fixed and absolute." In Carter v. Rhodes, 135 Cal. 46, 66 Pac. 985, the agreement provided:

"And $1,000 balance to be paid only out of the net proceeds of the working of the one-half interest in said mineral claim conveyed; and that in no event shall the $1,000 or any part thereof become a personal claim against the party of the second part—that is, the appellant."

The court said:

"By the sale of his interest in the mine, the appellant put it out of the power of the respondent to receive the thousand dollars from the net proceeds of that interest, and appellant at once became personally responsible to pay the thousand dollars."

The cases where the defaulting party failed to give security as promised for the balance of the consideration are of the same tenor. Among the citations, we may refer to Carnahan v. Hughes, 108 Ind. 227, 9 N. E. 80, Wheeler v. Harrah, 14 Or. 325, 12 Pac. 500, and Cook v. Stevenson, 30 Mich. 243. In the first of these, it is said:

"It is abundantly settled that where goods are sold upon credit, the purchaser agreeing as part of the contract to execute notes payable at a future day for the purchase price, the refusal of the purchaser to execute the notes according to the contract entitles the seller to maintain an action for such refusal, and the measure of damages is the full price of the goods sold."

In the Wheeler Case, supra, the court says:

"The naked obligation of the defendant was not sufficient to obtain the credit; nor would it have been received and the property delivered, without the promise of security, as agreed. When credit is given for the price of goods sold, on the condition that the purchaser's note, with surety, be given therefor, and this condition is not complied with, but the property is taken by the purchaser, he is liable for the price at once, and before the expiration of the proposed term of credit."

In the Michigan case, supra, it was declared as to the defendant:

"By refusing or failing to keep that term in the agreement which was introduced to assure him delay, he entitled the other party to insist upon the resulting alternative of immediate payment."

Some of the cases refer to the amount recovered as "damages," and declare that the vendor will be entitled to recover as damages the whole value of the goods, it being suggested, though, that there may be "a rebate of interest during the stipulated credit." Such rebate—it may be stated—was allowed in the case at bar.

If we regard the amount recovered as damages, it is apparent that no other just rule could be applied in determining the amount. It is impossible, in other words, to say just how much would have been taken from the quarry and what the payments to plaintiff would therefore have been, but this difficulty was created by the refusal of appellant to perform his contract. He, therefore, is in no position to say that respondent must prove his actual damages, but the law holds him to the measure that he himself prescribed.

We think the foregoing consideration is decisive of the case, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. FINALI. (Cr. 347.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 19, 1916.)

1. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 112(2)—SELF-DEFENSE.

Where accused, while trying, with revolver in hand, to force his way into a warehouse through a door, which was being held by deceased to prevent his entrance, shot deceased, he was clearly the aggressor, and not justified by self-defense, although deceased was trying to strike through the door as it opened with a beer bottle, and although after he and deceased had been separated from a prior encounter deceased had thrown a rock at him and hit him.

2. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 112(1)—SELF-DEFENSE—IN-VITING ALTERCATION.

One may not by his own willful act create a situation giving rise to appearances which he may interpret as endangering his life, and thereupon kill the person he is in fact assailing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 145; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 112(1).]

3. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 300(3)—SELF-DEFENSE—IN-STRUCTION.

An instruction in murder trial, standing alone, that "there must have been a present ability on the part of the assailant to accomplish his criminal design in order to justify the person assailed in taking his life," was erroneous, as inconsistent with the doctrine of apparent danger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 617; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 300(3).]

4. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1186(4)—APPEAL—RE-VERSAL.

Such instruction was not so misleading as to cause a miscarriage of justice and to call for reversal of judgment of conviction, where in no view of the evidence could it reasonably be said that deceased was the assailant, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, forbidding setting aside of a judgment or granting new trial for misdirection of the jury not apparently resulting in miscarriage of justice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1186(4).]

5. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 300(7)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE.

An instruction that "self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with a design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through his fraud, connivance, or fault, create a real or apparent necessity for the killing," held proper and applicable to the facts, where the evidence showed that whatever real or apparent necessity defendant believed to exist for the killing was created by his fault.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 622; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 300(7).]

6. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 863(2)—TRIAL—FUR-THER INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY.

In a murder trial, where the jury after retiring returned to court and asked for further instructions on certain points, defendant was not entitled as matter of right to have instructions read which the jury had not called for, or to have all the instructions on a given subject read, when such as were read were satisfactory to the jury.

7. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1173(1)—APPEAL—
HARMLESS ERROR.

Refusal of instructions as having been presented too late for consideration by the court was not prejudicial to accused, where they were not applicable to the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3164, 3168; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1173(1).]

8. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1186(4)—APPEAL—RE-VERSAL—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

Although reference by a district attorney to accused's failure to deny his extrajudicial statement was violative of accused's right to remain silent without prejudice for so doing, this and other alleged prejudicial misconduct, which the court instructed the jury to disregard, held not such as to call for reversal in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, forbidding setting aside of a judgment or granting new trial for any error not apparently resulting in miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Amedeo Finali was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

Braynard & Kimball, of Redding, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was informed against by the district attorney of Shasta county for the crime of murder, and at his trial was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to imprisonment for the term of seven years in the state prison. He appeals from the judgment of conviction, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant shot and killed Vincenzo Coudera on Sunday at about half past 4 o'clock in the afternoon of November 28, 1915, at the warehouse (sometimes called stable by witnesses) of Giacossa & Bellone, near the Mammoth mine in Shasta county. Defendant justifies the killing on the plea of self-defense. Defendant and deceased met near this warehouse shortly before the homicide; they were but casually acquainted with each other; defendant had been told that deceased had said that defendant was watching for one Tony Claro every evening with intent to assault him; at the meeting of defendant and deceased above referred to, deceased was pointed out by one Peselli as the person who had made the statement, whereupon defendant asked deceased why he had made such statement to Claro; deceased denied that he had made it and defendant replied that he (deceased) did make the statement because Tony so told defendant. Thereupon defendant extended his hand towards deceased, whether in a threatening manner or by way of assault or as an invitation for an encounter, does not clearly appear. However, the two men grappled, and a scuffle ensued, in the course of which they fell to the ground, defendant on top of deceased. Bystanders interfered and the two separated, defendant walking away a few steps. When deceased arose he picked up a stone and threw it at defendant, hitting him on the left shoulder, and immediately ran into the warehouse and closed the door.

The eyewitnesses were Italians, whose testimony was taken through interpreters. Several exhibits were introduced to assist the jury in understanding the facts and circumstances surrounding the homicide, among which was the bullet causing the death of deceased, taken from the body of the deceased, the latter's clothing worn at the time, defendant's revolver, the door through which, as was claimed by the prosecution, the fatal shot was fired and in which two bullet holes appeared, the door casing or 4x4 scantling to which the door was latched when closed, and which showed an indentation claimed by the prosecution to have been made by one of the bullets when the first shot was fired, sundry photographs, diagram of the warehouse premises, and two or three other exhibits, none of which was sent up with the record. Obviously, we are deprived to some extent of the aid which these exhibits afforded the jury. For example, defendant claims that the bullet found in the body of deceased was a fragment only, and that the first shot fired by defendant struck a beer bottle which the deceased threw at defendant, and that the bullet was split and a fragment of it caused the death of deceased, and not one of the bullets that went through the door of the warehouse. The scantling or door case was introduced, and the indentation found on it was shown to the jury in support of the theory of the prosecution that the bullet from the first shot struck the edge of this door casing and passed on into the building. The second shot was shown to have gone through the door, and the bullet hole was in line with a bullet hole through the opposite side of the building. The third shot concededly went through the door, and the position of the hole tended to show that it was where deceased was pushing at the door.

We think, however, that the evidence found in the record is quite sufficient to justify the verdict without having these exhibits before us to explain the testimony.

It appeared that when the first altercation occurred the parties were within two or three feet of the warehouse door; when defendant released the deceased and the latter got up defendant moved away two or three steps and was standing sidewise to deceased when the latter threw the rock, hitting defendant on the left shoulder as above mentioned. Deceased immediately ran into the warehouse, the keeper, Fracchia, with him, and closed the door and both braced themselves against it on the inside, deceased next to the latch and Fracchia next to the hinges. When defendant was hit with the stone he ran after deceased and reached the door about the same time the two other men had closed it. He immediately endeavored to force it open, kicking and pushing it, and calling to deceased to "come out." It was testified by witnesses who were outside of the warehouse that defendant had his revolver in one hand while he was trying to force the door open. It was in evidence that during this struggle on the part of defendant to open the door and deceased and Fracchia to hold it fast, it was opened and closed a few inches at intervals, during one of which deceased threw or struck with a quart beer bottle which he had picked up with one hand while pushing with the other, and at about the same instant defendant fired the first shot. The bottle was broken into pieces, some of them falling within and some without the door. The evidence does not show how the bottle was broken. Defendant was not hit with it. He testified that he shot Coudera because he thought he was about to hit him with the bottle. Fracchia testified that he heard the bottle strike and break against the door casing just before the shot was fired. After the first shot the door was shut and Fracchia and deceased remained pushing against it. The second and third shots followed in quick succession, the last one, it is claimed by the prosecution, being the one that hit and killed the deceased. When deceased was hit he exclaimed, "I am shot in the stomach," and Fracchia cried out to stop shooting, that one of them was wounded. Deceased staggered back from the door to another part of the warehouse, and shortly afterwards expired. The door was opened, and, among others, defendant went in, looked at deceased, and immediately left, and was the next day arrested at the town of Tehama.

Fracchia testified:

"Q. Now, when Coudera came inside the warehouse, what did he do? A. He shut the door right away. Q. Was the door open or closed when Coudera came inside? A. Open. Q. When Coudera closed the door what did he do? A. He put himself right away against the door. Q. And how did he hold the door? A. With both hands. (Witness illustrates.) Q. What did you do? A. I put myself also against the door. (He explained the relative position of the two men, deceased on his right, next to the doorlatch.) Q. When you and Coudera placed yourselves against the door as you have illustrated, what next occurred? A. Finali was pushing at the door and we was pushing back. Q. Did Finali say anything as he was against the door on the outside? A. He was saying to open the door—'Open, open.' Q. While Finali was pushing against the door from the outside and you and Coudera were against the door on the inside, what happened to the door, if anything? A. It happened that after he pushed the door several times, Coudera got ahold of a bottle. Q. When you say 'He pushed the door several times,' whom do you refer to? A. I think it was Finali; I couldn't see outside. (It elsewhere appeared that defendant was the only person pushing the door from the outside.) Q. Where did Coudera get the bottle? A. From the floor. Q. And what part of the floor? A. To the right side—north side. Q. And how far was the bottle from the door on the north? A. More or less, a foot and a half. (A photograph was shown witness on which he located the place where the bottle was. He also illustrated how Coudera reached out and got the bottle with his right hand while pushing against the door with his left hand.) And when Finali pushed the door he (Coudera) done like that (illustrating as if throwing an object with the right hand.) Q. Which hand, right or left, did Coudera reach for the bottle? A. With the right one. Q. At the time that Coudera reached with his right hand for the bottle, where was his left hand? A. At the door. Q. What did Coudera do with the bottle after he got it in his right hand? A. He held it there for a little while, and while the other was pushing at the door, he threw it at him—he threw it. He threw it. Q. And was the door open or closed at that time? A. When he threw the bottle, the door was open a little bit. Q. What happened when Coudera threw the bottle? A. When Coudera threw the bottle, I heard the report of the bottle, and the shot, 'Pom! Pom!' Q. What happened to the bottle? A. The bottle broke. Q. When did the bottle break with reference to the time that you heard the shot? A. First I heard the sound of the bottle, and then the shot of the pistol. Q. What do you mean by the sound of the bottle? A. The sound of the explosion of the bottle. Q. How did the bottle break, if you know? A. That I don't know. Q. Did the bottle break inside the door or outside the door? A. Inside the stable. Q. When the bottle broke what did Coudera do? A. He put himself against the door."

He was asked to illustrate:

"A. Like that. (Witness illustrates by arising and facing the wall, bending forward slightly and placing both hands flat against the wall.) Q. What occurred after Coudera placed himself in a leaning position with both hands against the door as you have illustrated? A. It occurred that the shots were fired. Q. How many shots were fired? A. Three shots. Q. How many shots were fired after Coudera placed both hands against the door in a leaning position immediately after the bottle was broken? A. Two shots. Q. After the two shots were fired, what happened? A. I heard Coudera say, 'Oh! I am wounded in the stomach.' Q. And what did Coudera do after he said that? A. He turned around and walked to the little room. Q. When you heard the bottle break did you hear another noise? A. When the bottle broke I heard the fire of the pistol—the shot of the pistol. Q. When Coudera said, 'I am wounded,' what did you do? A. Then I began to holler, 'Stop, stop, he is wounded.' * * * Q. From the time that Coudera came inside the warehouse, closed the door and leaned against the door, did he at any time let go of the door with both his hands? A. I never saw him move from the door."

He testified that the door opened two or three times, as he estimated it, before the first shot was fired, once he thought 8 or 10 inches.

Witness Benedetti went into the warehouse about the same time deceased entered it, and from a point 15 or 20 feet from the door saw and heard what took place in there. He testified:

"Q. At the time the bottle broke, was the door open or closed? A. There was about that much open (showing). Q. State how many inches? A. About a foot or foot and a half. Q. Was Fracchia against the door or leaning against the door when the last two shots were fired? A. He was at the door pushing. Q. What happened after the last shot was fired? A. Mr. Coudera went backwards and he was wounded here (indicating in the breast). * * * Q. Did any one say anything after the last shot was fired? A. Mr. Fracchia told him not to fire any more—told Mr. Finali not to fire any more."

He testified that Coudera had the bottle in his right hand and was "pushing against the door this way (showing)."

The autopsy showed:

That the bullet entered the body of deceased "between the first and second cartilages on the right side—in front * * * the bullet entered near the apex of the lungs, passed down through the base, through the diaphragm, through the liver, and passed out between the eleventh and twelfth ribs, and entered and lodged in the back about 3 inches from the spine on the right side of the body about one inch from the skin—general course was down and back."

Dr. Sanholdt, who made the autopsy, testified:

That the cause of death was "bleeding from the vena cava which was torn by the bullet"; that a man with such a wound would live but a short time—"it is only the matter of a moment. Q. As much as a minute? A. I don't think so. * * * He might utter a few words, but I doubt if he could make any coherent sentences."

He testified that the point where the bullet lodged was about 12 inches lower than the point of entrance, and that the bullet encountered no bone in its passage.

[1] We think the jury were warranted in finding that the fatal shot was fired through the door while deceased and Fracchia were holding it shut and endeavoring to keep defendant from entering. The position of deceased at the door—a position one would naturally assume in pushing with his hands against a door to hold it fast—would account for the entrance of the bullet as described and its course backward and downward. It is true this might possibly have happened had the bullet struck the bottle and had a fragment of it been deflected toward deceased. Bullets take eccentric courses sometimes after entering the body. But the evidence was that deceased did not exclaim that he was shot until the third shot was fired and while he and Fracchia were pushing at the door, and the evidence was also that had he received this wound from the first shot it would have immediately disabled him from making any further physical effort towards keeping defendant out of the building. But if it be conceded that the first shot was the fatal one, we cannot see that it was justified upon any view of the doctrine of self-defense. Defendant was clearly the aggressor. With revolver in hand he was trying to force his way through the door which was being held to prevent his entrance. Having succeeded in pressing it partially open the deceased was the one then in danger, and had he given defendant a fatal blow with the bottle, the doctrine of self-defense and the right to act upon appearances might have been available to deceased.

[2] Defendant could not by his own willful act create a situation giving rise to appearances which he could interpret as endangering his life, and thereupon kill the person he was assailing. As was said in People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 462, 42 Pac. 307, 311 (30 L. R. A. 403):

"A man may not wickedly or willfully invite or create the appearances of necessity or the actual necessity which, if present to one without blame, would justify the homicide."

Defendant lays much stress upon the fact that deceased hit him with a rock after they had separated from the first encounter. Had defendant overtaken deceased in the heat of the moment and suitably punished him for this assault, he might not have been blameworthy. But he lost this opportunity by deceased having reached a harbor of safety where he was in no position to do defendant further harm. Thenceforth defendant was clearly the aggressor. Under the circumstances disclosed, the plea of self-defense in killing deceased was not open to him. It seems to us that the jury exercised much charity in finding that the homicide was "upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion" and but manslaughter.

[3] 2. The court instructed the jury quite fully on the law of self-defense and the right of one being assailed to act upon appearances. It is not objected that these instructions were incorrect, but it is objected that the court in the same connection instructed the jury as follows:

"There must have been a present ability on the part of the assailant to accomplish his criminal design in order to justify the person assailed in taking his life."

It is contended that there was conflict in the evidence as to whether deceased struck at defendant through the open space when the door was open, or whether deceased threw the bottle at defendant through the opening, and whether the bottle was broken by the bullet at the first shot or struck the door casing and was broken, and that there was a conflict in the evidence as to whether the shot was fired before, at the time or after the bottle was thrown. In this state of the evidence it is claimed:

"That the jury may have believed, under this instruction of the court, that the bottle was broken before the first shot was fired, and that the door was closed when the last two shots were fired, and that therefore as a matter of law deceased at neither time had the present ability to inflict injury upon defendant, and defendant was in no real danger."

[4] We think the instruction was inconsistent with the doctrine of apparent danger to one who is assailed and was out of harmony with other instructions given upon the subject, and, taken alone, was an incorrect statement of the law. It must not be forgotten, however, that in no view of the evidence could it be reasonably said that deceased was the assailant. And when the door was pushed open by defendant who was at that moment the real assailant, armed with a deadly weapon, which the sequel showed he intended to use, deceased had a right to defend himself against the threatened danger. By doing so, his relation toward defendant was not changed. Throughout their argument the learned counsel of defendant seem to hold that deceased became the assailant in having struck defendant with a rock after the latter had withdrawn from the first encounter, and that notwithstanding deceased had taken refuge in the warehouse, defendant had a right to pursue and punish him and still be within the protecting aegis of the doctrine of self-defense, should deceased resist. This doctrine must not be confused with the lex talionis. The doctrine of self-defense presupposes that one who would avail himself of it has, without his fault, found himself in threatened danger of serious bodily injury to avert which the law gives him the right to resort to extreme measures. But, as we have already pointed out, the plea of self-defense is not available to him where he willfully, and without any necessity for his own protection, creates the danger with which he is threatened. The law of self-defense is a law of necessity and ceases with the disappearance of the necessity. Whatever may be said of the instruction, however, we are quite convinced that, error though it be, we cannot for a moment believe that the jury were so far misled by it as to have caused a miscarriage of justice, and unless we can so say we are forbidden to reverse the judgment. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.; People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042; People v. Bartol, 24 Cal. App. 659, 142 Pac. 510; Vallejo R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238.

[5] 3. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"Self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with a design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through his fraud, connivance, or fault, create a real or apparent necessity for the killing."

It is claimed that the instruction was not applicable to the facts because there was no evidence that either a real or apparent necessity for the killing was created by the fraud, connivance, or fault of defendant. The instruction was based upon the principle announced in People v. Hecker, supra. We think the evidence showed that whatever of real or apparent necessity defendant believed to exist for the killing was created by his fault. He had no right to break into the warehouse by force to assault deceased or to punish him for an assault previously made on defendant by deceased, and if, in doing so, danger to defendant appeared, it was of his own creation.

[6] 4. After the jury had been considering the case some time, they came into court and asked for the instructions on justifiable homicide to be again read to them. The court read its instructions on the subject including the reading of section 195 of the Penal Code. On the suggestion of defendant's attorney, the court read still other instructions on the subject given at defendant's request. Defendant then asked to have a particular instruction read:

"That the defendant need not wait until the blow is struck before acting in his own protection." "The Court: No, I will only act on the request of the jury. The Court: Is that all you wish, gentlemen? A Juror: Are we entitled to know what the penalties are in each degree? The Court: No, that is entirely in the discretion of the court. The Juror: That is what I thought. The Court: The court has told you about that heretofore. I will read you this, gentlemen."

The court then read one of its instructions in connection with the rule of reasonable doubt, and stating the law as to the right of the jury to fix the punishment should the defendant be found guilty of murder in the first degree. The jury were then asked if they desired any further instructions, and all answered satisfied.

The jury, being still unable to agree, came into court again and requested "a little information on one little point, and that is, what creates a reasonable doubt." The court read its instructions on that subject and asked the jury if they desired anything further.

"The Foreman: That seems to be the only thing, your honor. The Court: Is that plain enough to you gentlemen? (An affirmation is given to the court.)"

The jury retired and later brought in their verdict. Defendant was not entitled as matter of right to have instructions read which the jury had not called for or to have all the instruction on a given subject read when such as were read were satisfactory to the jury.

[7] 5. The court refused certain instructions requested by defendant on the ground that they were presented too late for consideration by the court: (a) As to the right of self-defense having been revived, after defendant withdrew from the first conflict, by deceased having hit him with a rock; (b) defendant not bound to retreat in the face of danger; (c) reasonable doubt as to who opened the door and for what purpose it was opened, and that such doubt should have been resolved in favor of defendant. Whether or not the reason given by the court was sufficient need not be considered, for we do not think the defendant was prejudiced by the court's ruling. The hitting of defendant with a stone by deceased after defendant had withdrawn from the first conflict did not so far revive defendant's right to self-defense as to justify him in forcing a second conflict as appeared by the evidence and killing deceased, because in doing so he believed himself to be in danger of great bodily injury. The doctrine of retreat in the face of apparent danger had no application, since defendant was the assailant. There was no evidence warranting the assumption that deceased opened the door for any purpose or raising any doubt on that question.

6. Two instructions were refused, for one of which rulings the court assigned no reason, and as to the other that it was covered elsewhere. The latter related to the doctrine of defendant's right to act upon appearances which was, as the court said, fully covered elsewhere in the instructions. The other instruction proceeded on the assumption that deceased was the assailant at the time he was killed, and that defendant acted upon the reasonable belief that he was in danger of receiving great bodily harm from deceased at that moment.

[8] 7. In the course of his argument to the jury, the district attorney referred to an instance, within his knowledge, of a bullet in passing through the front end of a wagon split in its course into two parts, hitting each horse and another part performing an equally freakish thing. Defendant objected, and the district attorney asked the court to instruct the jury to disregard the illustration and confine themselves to the evidence, which the court did.

The defendant at the time of his arrest made a somewhat self-incriminatory statement, which was introduced in evidence. The district attorney referred to the fact that defendant, when on the witness stand, did not deny the truth of the statement. Upon defendant's objection as misconduct prejudicial to defendant's rights and motion that the court instruct the jury to disregard the same, the district attorney said:

"While we do not feel that there is anything prejudicial, at the same time we have no objection to the court's giving the instruction."

And the court thereupon gave the requested instruction.

In his closing argument to the jury the district attorney stated that he did not believe Coudera (deceased) had ever made the statement to Tony Claro attributed to Coudera for the reason that defendant did not call Claro as a witness to prove it, though subpoenaed by defendant and excused.

Where misconduct of the district attorney is claimed as prejudicial, the more recent decisions of the Supreme Court hold that, if attention is called to it and the court instructs the jury to disregard it and not allow themselves to be influenced by it, the misconduct must be flagrant and obviously prejudicial to justify a reversal. Such was the misconduct of the district attorney in People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 139 Pac. 78, People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 593, 102 Pac. 266, and other cases cited by defendant.

In the present case the record shows that the district attorney exhibited commendable carefulness in the conduct of the trial, not to trench upon the rights of the defendant. No evidence was offered or admitted as to which defendant has assigned error. There was no attempt by the district attorney to repeat the objectionable statements. The reference to the eccentricities of a bullet was of no particular significance, and, in fact, had as much application to defendant's theory as to the people's.

As to the nonappearance of Claro as a witness, the reference could not have injured defendant, for whether it was true or not that he told defendant what deceased said had very little, if any, significance. Reference by the district attorney to defendant's failure to deny his extrajudicial statement, while violative of the defendant's right to remain silent without prejudice for so doing, the statements of defendant were as to circumstances connected with the homicide about which the jury had full knowledge through testimony of witnesses. We may safely adopt what was said in People v. Kromphold, 157 Pac. 599:

"While it was wrong for the district attorney to comment at all on the failure of defendant to testify upon this subject, it would be most unreasonable to assume, in the light of the attitude of the trial judge in the matter and the nature of the remarks, that the jury could have been influenced to the prejudice of the defendant by the statement complained of. See People v. Sansome, 98 Cal. 235 [33 Pac. 202]. Certainly we cannot hold that this statement 'has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.' Section 4½, art. 6, Const."

The defendant was ably defended and every opportunity given him to meet the evidence in support of the charge. We think the verdict was justified by the evidence, and that no prejudicial error occurred at the trial which would warrant a reversal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

YOUTZ et al. v. FARMERS' & MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES.

1. PARTIES $\S$ 59(2) — SUBSTITUTION—ACTION FOR DEPOSITS—REAL PARTY IN INTEREST—ATTACHING CREDITOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, providing that another person may be substituted for the defendant, an order in an action by a wife joined by her husband to recover money deposited in her name in the defendant bank, substituting for the defendant bank the plaintiff in an action against the husband with attachment served upon the defendant bank claiming that the deposit in fact belonged to the husband, so as to place the real parties in interest in an adversary position, was properly made.

2. ATTACHMENT $\S$ 304—BANK DEPOSIT—ACTION BY DEPOSITOR.

Such order was properly made over the objection that the bank could not claim the benefit of such provision and a discharge from its liability to its depositor unless a lien was created against the credit in its hands by the service of the attachment process, since, with notice as to the real ownership of the deposit and a claim thereto by a third person under attachment process, the bank would not be justified in honoring the check of the nominal depositor, and since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 544, if the money in fact belonged to another, it would be liable to such other's attaching creditor if it paid the money over to the nominal depositor.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW $\S$ 309(1) — "DUE PROCESS OF LAW"—ACTION FOR BANK DEPOSIT—SUBSTITUTION OF PARTY DEFENDANT.

In an action for a bank deposit, an order of substitution under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, authorizing a defendant in an action upon a contract or for specific personal property to show that a third person claims the proceeds or property to apply for an order to substitute such person as defendant, and for a discharge upon the deposit of the property in court, did not deprive the plaintiff of property without "due process of law," as leaving him without recourse to recover damages against the original defendant, where it required the full amount claimed, with interest, to be deposited, in view of Civ. Code, § 3302, under which there could be no further recovery of damages than the amount required to be deposited.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by E. B. Youtz and Joshua E. Youtz, her husband, against the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles. From an order making Gara Williams, plaintiff in an action against Joshua E. Youtz, with attachment against a deposit in defendant Bank, a substituted party, defendant, the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Harriman, Ryckman & Tuttle, of Los Angeles, for appellants. J. H. Shankland, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant bank in September, 1913, had on deposit in the name of E. B. Youtz, wife of Joshua E. Youtz, the sum of $2,704.83. One Gara Williams commenced an action in the superior court against Joshua E. Youtz, in which action judgment was sought in the sum of $11,000 on promissory notes. A writ of attachment was served upon the defendant bank with notice that all debts or credits owing by the bank to "J. E. Youtz, * * * E. B. Youtz, but belonging to Joshua E. Youtz, or either of them," were attached. The bank made answer to the writ stating the fact as to the name in which the deposit was held. E. B. Youtz thereupon drew her check against the bank for the full amount of the deposit, which demand the bank refused to honor. She then brought this action to recover the money. The defendant bank appeared before answering, and by motion asked that the plaintiff in the attachment suit be substituted in its stead, upon the money being deposited in court. In the affidavit of its cashier the bank asserted that the plaintiff in the attachment suit claimed a lien upon the fund upon the ground that the money in fact was the property of Joshua E. Youtz, although deposited by his wife. Other facts showing the pendency of the attachment suit and the issuance and service of the writ of attachment or garnishment were set out in the affidavit. No counter showing of facts appears to have been made; E. B. Youtz resting her opposition to the motion on the claim that the case furnished no sufficient ground to support an order substituting Williams as defendant. The court, upon the full amount of the credit being deposited in its charge, and the further sum of $17.87 interest, made an order substituting Williams in the place of the bank as defendant.

[1, 2] It may be here remarked that no point is made that the sheriff should have been made substituted defendant where the attachment suit had not gone to judgment. The court would have the power, nevertheless, to require the sheriff to be brought in, and if it was required to so do we must assume that such action would be taken in the progress of the case. The appeal taken by E. B. Youtz is from the order made as described.

The proceeding taken by respondent was in strict accord with the provisions of section 386, Code of Civil Procedure. The design of that statute is to enable a party who has been sued upon a contract as to which he admits full liability as to the amount thereof to show that a third party not named in the action claims some right to the proceeds of the contract either by way of complete ownership or that he possesses a lien against the same, and, so showing, to deposit the money due in court and have the third party made defendant in his stead, thus placing in positions of adversaries the real parties at interest. Appellants' counsel insist that the bank could not claim the benefit of section 386, Code of Civil Procedure, and secure a discharge from liability toward its depositor, unless a lien in fact was created against the credit in its hands by service of the garnishment process; that Joshua E. Youtz, the defendant in the attachment suit, must have been possessed of the right to maintain an action of indebitatus assumpsit against the bank on account of the deposit before any attachment lien could result. Redondo Beach Co. v. Cal. L. & T. Co., 101 Cal. 322, 35 Pac. 896, is cited to this point. The principal conclusion announced in that case was that a mere equitable claim, or a credit not liquidated in the sense that it had become a demand of a fixed and certain amount, could not be reached by attachment process. Hassie v. Congregation, 35 Cal. 378, is to the same effect. It must be kept in mind that in the cases cited the questions arose between the attachment plaintiff and the garnishee. There is room for distinction, we apprehend, between a case where a person served with garnishment disclaims liability because the debt is unliquidated or is attended by equities held in his favor and a case like this one. Can it be that a debtor, being possessed of money, may place that money to the credit of another in a bank, and that when so placed the credit becomes immune to attachment process issued against all except the nominal depositor? Surely the law will not spend its effort in furnishing to debtors such an easy and reliable means whereby creditors may be defrauded. With notice as to the real ownership of a deposit, and claim made by a third person under attachment process, a banking institution would hardly be justified in honoring the check of the nominal depositor. Section 544, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that every person having under his control credits belonging to the defendant, when served with attachment process, becomes liable to the attachment plaintiff for the amount of the credit. In this case Williams claimed that the money to the credit of E. B. Youtz belonged to Joshua E. Youtz, his debtor, and notified the bank of that claim and attached the credit. E. B. Youtz sued the bank for the money. If the money was Joshua E. Youtz's and the bank had full notice of this claim, it would, in our opinion, become liable to Williams in the event that it paid over the money to the wife and the fact was determined to be that Joshua E. Youtz owned the credit. It adopted the most convenient and reasonable course to free itself from liability for costs by asking that the real contending parties be compelled to try out the issue between them.

[3] The final point made in the brief of appellants is that the provisions of section 386, Code of Civil Procedure, are in derogation of a party's right not to be deprived of property without due process of law. Using this case as an illustration it is said in argument that the order substituting Williams as defendant in the place of the bank left the plaintiff without recourse in the recovery of damages in the sum of $500 which she claimed against respondent. If it appeared that this result followed the action of the court then a case would be presented where the making of the order for substitution would amount to an abuse of discretion. The court is vested with discretion as to the matter of granting such a motion as that here considered. But there is nothing in the statement of plaintiff's cause of action which shows that plaintiff was entitled to recover special damages in any amount, and plaintiff showed no facts in opposition to the motion which would tend to establish her right to recover on the account last mentioned. The detriment caused by the breach of an obligation to pay money only is deemed to be the amount due by the terms of the obligation with interest thereon. Civ. Code, § 3302. The court did require respondent to pay into court the full amount of the deposit, with accrued interest to the date of the order.

We are of the opinion that the court was authorized to make the order complained of. The order is affirmed.

FORMAN et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

MASTER AND SERVANT — 375(1)—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION—“ARISING OUT OF AND IN COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT.”

Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 283) § 12a, providing for compensation of employes for any personal injury arising out of and in the course of the employment, or where at the time of the accident the employé is performing services incidental to his employment and within its scope, does not govern injuries in a hotel fire to a salesman whom his employer directed to go to the city of the accident and remain indefinitely for the purpose of selling goods; the fire having occurred while the salesman was asleep and not at work.

Proceeding for workmen's compensation by Richard F. James, opposed by James H. Forman, employer, and the Georgia Casualty Company, insurer. On application for writ of review directed to the award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the employé. Award annulled.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of review directed at a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission, wherein the respondent Richard F. James sought to recover compensation from his employer, James H. Forman, and the insurer of said employer, Georgia Casualty Company, for injuries alleged to have been sustained during and in the course of his employment.

The stipulated facts are as follows: Richard F. James was employed by James H. Forman as a salesman for the purpose of selling real estate upon commission. The terms of his employment as such salesman did not call for regular working hours, but it was understood that he should make sales of real estate at any or such times as it was possible for him to secure a customer and complete the sale. Mr. James was directed by his employer to go to the town of Needles for the purpose of selling real estate there and to remain indefinitely. Mr. James went to said town for that purpose, and while there took a room in the White House Hotel, where, on the evening of February 28, 1916, he retired for the night. At or near the hour of 4:15 a. m. of February 29th a fire broke out in the White House Hotel, which destroyed the hotel and in which Mr. James lost his clothing and effects, and was also burned about the hands and arms and face in escaping from the fire. For the injuries thus suffered he made application for compensation from his employer before the Industrial Accident Commission, and upon a hearing was awarded the sum of $365.90. A petition for rehearing was presented and denied by the Commission, whereupon the petitioners herein applied to this court for a writ of review.

We are of the opinion that this case is one which does not come within the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1913, p. 279). Section 12a of the act provides as follows:

“Liability for the compensation provided in this act, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, shall, without regard to negligence, exist against any employer for any personal injury sustained by his employes by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. * * * (2) Where, at the time of the accident, the employé is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment, and is acting within the course of his employment as such.”

It seems clear to us that the injuries and losses which the respondent James suffered cannot be held to have been sustained by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, nor to have occurred at a time when the employé was performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment and acting within the course of his employment as such, and that this view is fully sustained by the following authorities: Gaskell v. Van Voorhies Co., 2 I. A. C. No. 14, p. 1020; Green v. Shaw, 5 Buttersworth Compensation Cases, 573; Kitchenam v. The Johannisberg, 4 Buttersworth Compensation Cases, 311; Rodger v. Paisley Schoolboard, 5 Buttersworth's Compensation Cases, 547; Milken v. Towle Co., 216 Mass. 293, 103 N. E. 898, L. R. A. 1916A, 337; Bryant v. Fissell, 84 N. J. Law, 72, 86 Atl. 458; and particularly the case of Ocean Accident & Guarantee Co. et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California et al., 159 Pac. 1041, decided by the Supreme Court in bank September 8, 1916, and in which case the foregoing section of the Workmen's Compensation Act is given a very exhaustive review.

The award is therefore annulled.

TORMEY v. MILLER. (Civ. 1547.)

1. BANKRUPTCY — 216—EFFECT OF ADJUDICATION.

After adjudication in bankruptcy, the bankrupt's property cannot be resorted to in execution or satisfaction of any judgment obtained upon an obligation created prior to the adjudication.

2. BANKRUPTCY — 433(2)—EFFECT OF ADJUDICATION—RIGHT TO JUDGMENT NOTWITHSTANDING BANKRUPTCY.

Where plaintiff sued out attachment which was released on filing bond conditioned for payment of any judgment that might be rendered in such suit, and the debtor thereafter was adjudicated a bankrupt, the attachment creditor could have judgment against the debtor as a basis for pursuing his remedies against the surety, in view of federal Bankruptcy Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 67d, 30 Stat. 564 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 9651), providing that liens given in good faith shall not be affected by the act and section 16 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 9600), providing that the liability of a person who is surety for a bankrupt shall not be altered by the discharge of the bankrupt, and in spite of section 67c, invalidating a lien arising from attachment of property within four months before filing of bankruptcy petition if created while defendant was insolvent and in effect a preference or if it was created in fraud of the Bankruptcy Act.

3. BANKRUPTCY — 433(2)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In such case, the sole question being whether the creditor could have judgment at all against the debtor, the attachment and proceedings thereunder need not appear of record, but are mere evidentiary matters.

4. BANKRUPTCY — 433(2)—EFFECT OF ADJUDICATION—REMEDIES OF CREDITORS.

In such case the creditor's proper remedy was to move for judgment against the debtor after trial of the issues, with the perpetual stay of execution against the debtor's property.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR — 302(1) — SCOPE—PRESERVATION OF EXCEPTIONS.

An appeal after abrogation by St. 1915, p. 209, of right to appeal from order denying new trial, as granted by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, is properly before the court, regardless of whether the motion for new trial was based upon sufficient grounds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Ben E. Tormey against Frank N. Miller. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Milton Newmark and Clarence A. Shuey, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Lon Bond, of Chico, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendant in this action was awarded judgment, from which this appeal, supported by a bill of exceptions and a stipulation admitting as true certain facts, is prosecuted by the plaintiff.

The facts as agreed upon by the stipulation of the parties are with accuracy synoptically stated in the opening brief of counsel for the plaintiff, and we, therefore, adopt said statement thereof, together with the statement of the legal propositions submitted here for decision by the appellant.

"Appellant brought an action in the superior court of this state for Butte county, against respondent, for goods sold and delivered. A writ of attachment was issued in said action, directed to the sheriff of Butte county, and placed in his hands for execution. A bond was thereafter made, executed, and delivered, and thereupon the attachment was released and discharged. By the obligation of said bond, the sureties undertook 'that if the said plaintiff shall recover judgment in said action we will pay to the said plaintiff upon demand the amount of said judgment together with the costs not exceeding in all the sum of $1,200, gold coin of the United States.' Thereafter, and within four months of the commencement of the attachment suit, respondent filed a petition in the District Court of the United States for adjudication as a voluntary bankrupt, and thereafter was duly adjudged a bankrupt and discharged of his debts by order of said District Court. Respondent filed a supplemental answer in the attachment suit, setting up his discharge in bankruptcy as a defense. Upon these issues the case was tried, and at the trial counsel for plaintiff, in his opening statement, told the court that he proposed to ask for judgment against the defendant with a perpetual stay of execution against the property of said defendant for the purpose of maintaining his rights against the bondsmen. The allegations of the complaint in regard to the incurring of the indebtedness sued upon and nonpayment were admitted by stipulation of counsel for respondent. The bankruptcy proceedings, culminating in the order of discharge, were also admitted by stipulation, and this constituted the sole defense interposed to the action. Plaintiff offered evidence establishing the facts in regard to the issuance of the writ of attachment, the execution and delivery of the undertaking, which evidence was excluded by the trial court upon defendant's objection that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The bond was also offered and similarly excluded. At the conclusion of the trial plaintiff again asked for judgment against defendant, with a perpetual stay of execution against the property of said defendant. Judgment went for defendant. The question of law thus presented and raised by the exclusion of the testimony in regard to the issuance of the attachment and the execution of the bond, and also by the absolute judgment in favor of the defendant, relates to the right of a plaintiff under such circumstances to a qualified judgment against the defendant sufficient to preserve his rights against the sureties arising out of the bond given to release the attachment. By the terms of the bond, recovery of a judgment is made a prerequisite to an action against the sureties."

[1] It is not questioned but, indeed, admitted by the stipulation of counsel for the defendant, that but for the special plea, setting up by way of supplemental answer the fact of the defendant's discharge from his debts under the federal bankruptcy law, the plaintiff would have been entitled to judgment.

ment against the defendant for the amount of the debt sued for. By reason of the adjudication in bankruptcy, however, the defendant's property could not, obviously, be resorted to in execution or satisfaction of any judgment obtained against him by the plaintiff or, for that matter, by any other person suing upon an obligation created prior to and consequently affected by the adjudication. But, as seen, the plaintiff contends that the effect of the defendant's discharge in bankruptcy was not to destroy his rights originally created by the lien of the attachment, or, speaking with respect to the case as it appears, his rights against the sureties on the undertaking given to discharge the attachment levied upon the property of the defendant to secure his judgment. The contention so urged is clearly in harmony with the construction placed by the courts upon certain provisions of the bankruptcy law. Indeed, counsel for the defendant does not combat or dispute the soundness of the proposition, but, as we shall presently see, bases his resistance to this appeal solely upon grounds involving procedure.

Section 67d of the federal bankruptcy law provides:

"Liens given or accepted in good faith and not in contemplation of or in fraud upon this act, * * * shall * * * not be affected by this act."

Section 16 of said act reads:

"The liability of a person who is a co-debtor with, or guarantor or in any manner a surety for, a bankrupt, shall not be altered by the discharge of such bankrupt."

The courts have uniformly held, in cases like the present, that, under the foregoing sections, while the adjudication, when pleaded, will, of course, have the effect of granting immunity to the defendant from the execution of any judgment obtained against him from his property, such adjudication cannot operate to destroy the rights of the plaintiff under the undertaking given to release the attachment, or, in other words, will not itself relieve the sureties on the undertaking of their obligations thereunder. See Bank of Commerce v. Elliott, 109 Wis. 648, 85 N. W. 417; Hill v. Harding, 130 U. S. 699, 9 Sup. Ct. 725, 32 L. Ed. 1083, and cases therein cited; Smith v. Lacey, 86 Miss. 295, 38 South. 311, 109 Am. St. Rep. 707; U. S. Wind Engine & Pump Co. v. North Penn. Iron Co., 227 Pa. 262, 75 Atl. 1094; Rosenthal v. Nove, 175 Mass. 599, 56 N. E. 884, 78 Am. St. Rep. 512. The principle is discussed and approved in Harding v. Minear, 54 Cal. 502, and Holladay v. Hare, 69 Cal. 515, 11 Pac. 28. As was said by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in Bank of Commerce v. Elliott, 109 Wis. 648, 85 N. W. 417:

"The language of the bankrupt act, preserving a lien incident to a debt, by implication preserved the debt notwithstanding its discharge, so far as is necessary to make the lien effective."

The above cases further hold that where, under such circumstances as are present in the case at bar, the defendant has pleaded and proved his discharge after the attachment had been levied upon his property and said attachment released upon the giving of the undertaking, the remedy of the plaintiff against the sureties on the undertaking must be made effectual, if at all, by the entry of a qualified judgment against the defendant for the amount found to be due on the account declared upon; that is to say, that, in order to enable the plaintiff to reap the benefit of his attachment, which can be obtained in this case only by proceeding against the sureties on the undertaking upon the giving of which said attachment was dissolved, he is entitled to have a judgment entered against the defendant, with a perpetual stay of execution, so as to prevent the plaintiff from enforcing the judgment against him, and leave him at liberty to proceed against the sureties. Smith v. Lacey, 86 Miss. 295, 38 South. 311, 109 Am. St. Rep. 707, supra, and the other cases above cited.

As has been shown, in the present case the undertaking given for the release of the attachment provided, as a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to a recovery against the sureties thereon or to maintain an action against them on the undertaking that a judgment shall have first been rendered and entered against the defendant. Indeed, it is obviously true that, if no judgment in the attachment suit were entered against the defendant, there would be no predicate for the support of an action against the sureties, the obligation of the latter being to pay the debt only when it should be established by a judgment.

Excerpts from the opinions in a few of the cases above referred to will be sufficient to disclose the reasons for or the theory of the rules above considered.

In Danforth Mfg. Co. v. Barrett & Co., 138 Ill. App. 244, which was concerned with an action commenced in a justice's court, judgment was rendered against the defendant, who appealed, giving an appeal bond with surety conditioned for the payment of any judgment obtained against the defendant, if the latter defaulted in the satisfaction of the same, it is said:

"It is admitted in argument by appellant that it is proper for a trial court to enter a judgment against a defendant with a perpetual stay of execution in order that the plaintiff in said judgment may enforce the same against the sureties on a bond given upon an attachment levied more than four months prior to the bankruptcy of the defendant, as held in Hill v. Harding, 116 Ill. 92, 4 N. E. 361, and Hill v. Harding, 130 U. S. 699 [9 Sup. Ct. 725, 32 L. Ed. 1083]. But it is contended * * * that this rule should not be applied where the plaintiff or claimant has acquired no lien under his judgment, and that there should be no judgment against the appellant in this case because the sureties on the appeal bond are not liable. On this record the sureties on the appeal bond are not before the court, and we cannot determine their rights and liabilities. It will be time enough to determine the question of their liability when a proper case is presented for our consideration involving that question. * * * In view of this question of the liability of the sureties on the appeal bond—a question not necessary for us to decide, and which we do not decide—the proper judgment in this case is a special judgment against appellant for the amount due to appellee with a perpetual stay of execution. Such a judgment against appellant can work no harm to it, and will not interfere with any rights or privileges acquired by its discharge in bankruptcy.”

In U. S. Wind Engine & Pump Co. v. North Penn. Iron Co., supra, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment, with directions to enter a special judgment against the defendant, with a perpetual stay of execution, for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to proceed against the surety upon a bond given to secure the release of an attachment levied upon the property of the defendant. The court there said:

“The appellee has secured its discharge in bankruptcy, and its personal liability is gone; but that does not constitute any reason why a judgment against it should not be entered for the special purpose of fixing and enforcing the liability of the surety. The surety took the risk of the appellee’s insolvency—a risk that the appellant was supposedly protected against by the very bond in question; so it would be most unfair to allow the substitution of the bond for the goods attached, and then to deny the formal relief necessary in order to enforce its terms against the surety. There is nothing in our law, or practice, or in the announced public policy of the state, to require such a ruling.”

Further quotation is not necessary, it being sufficient to say, as we have before declared, that all the other cases above cited are to the same effect.

It is true that section 67c of the Bankruptcy Act provides that a lien arising from the attachment of a debtor’s property and so created within four months before the filing of a bankruptcy petition by the litigant debtor shall be dissolved by the adjudication of such debtor to be a bankrupt, if:

“1. It appears that said lien was obtained and permitted while the defendant was insolvent, and that its existence and enforcement will work a preference, or 2. The party or parties to be benefited thereby had reasonable cause to believe the defendant was insolvent and in contemplation of bankruptcy, or 3. That such lien was sought and permitted in fraud of the provisions of this act.”

It is asserted in the brief of appellant that the bankruptcy proceedings in the case at bar were instituted within four months after the levy of the attachment. We find nothing in the record justifying this statement; hence we do not know when, with respect to the time at which the attachment lien was created, the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced by the defendant. But it is altogether immaterial whether the attachment lien in this case was created within four months prior to or within four months after the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, since the attachment had, by virtue of the undertaking, been dissolved before the proceedings in bankruptcy were begun. As seen, the bond or undertaking was given for the express purpose of effecting a release of the attachment, the attachment was accordingly released, and such release operated as a sufficient consideration to support the obligation of the bondsmen. It has repeatedly been held that the bondsmen are, under such circumstances, liable. Rosenthal v. Perkins, 123 Cal. 240, 55 Pac. 804; S. F. Sulphur Co. v. Aetna Indemnity Co., 11 Cal. App. 695, 106 Pac. 111; In re Maaget (D. C.) 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 14, 173 Fed. 232; McCombs v. Allen, 82 N. Y. 114; King v. Will J. Block Amusement Co., 126 App. Div. 48, 111 N. Y. Supp. 102.

The Rosenthal Case involved an action against the sureties on an undertaking given to release an attachment. The defendant in the attachment suit, one Brusie, had the attachment released upon giving an undertaking for that purpose. Within a month after the levy of the writ of attachment, Brusie filed his voluntary petition in insolvency under the State Insolvency Act of 1880 (St. 1880, p. 82). That act contained a provision that the effect of the commencement of insolvency proceedings was to dissolve any attachment levied within one month next preceding the commencement thereof. The defendants (sureties on the bond) contended that:

“The effect of this provision was to dissolve the attachment in Rosenthal et al. v. Brusie, and render impossible the return of the released property to the attaching officer, and hence to destroy the obligation of their undertaking.”

After showing that the contract involving the undertaking embodied two alternative promises, viz., that the released property would be redelivered and applied towards the satisfaction of the judgment, or the sureties would pay the value thereof, not exceeding the amount of the judgment, and that if an agreement is in the alternative, and one branch of the alternative cannot by law be performed, the party is bound to perform the other, the court said:

“It is clear, for reasons which need not be enlarged upon, that if at the time the proceeding in bankruptcy is instituted there is no attachment in force on which the proceeding can operate, if the attachment lien has already been discharged by a bond for that purpose, then the liability of sureties on the bond is not affected by the subsequent bankruptcy of their principal. McCombs v. Allen, 82 N. Y. 114, and cases cited; Easton v. Ormsby, 18 R. I. 309 [27 Atl. 216]; Insolvent Act, § 45, last proviso. The mistake of defendants lies in supposing that the lien of the attachment in Rosenthal v. Brusie continued on the attached goods after they had been released to Brusie in consequence of the delivery bond. Our statute and the inferences which follow from the decisions of this court seem to put that question at rest. Upon the execution of the bond, such as was given by defendants, ‘an order may be made releasing from the operation of the attachment any or all of the property attached.’ Code Civ. Proc. § 554. It is impossible that property can be ‘released from the operation of the attachment’ if it yet remains subject to the attachment lien. * * * We are satisfied that no lien of the attachment persisted on the goods in this case after the release to the owner.”

[2] Our conclusion from all the authorities which we have examined and to many of which special attention has been directed in this opinion is that there is no provision in the federal Bankruptcy Act with which the judgment asked for by the plaintiff in this action would be in conflict. In other words, there is no language in said act which prevents the rendering or entering of such a judgment, and our opinion is that the court below should have entertained the motion of the plaintiff for a special or qualified judgment against the defendant, and that, in refusing to do so, and in disallowing the above indicated proof offered by the plaintiff in support of said motion, the court erred to the prejudice of the latter.

[3] As stated above, the defendant has not, in his brief or otherwise, assailed or challenged the legal propositions above considered, but, as we understand him, he denies the propriety of their application to the case in hand and further maintains that, even if this case in the abstract presented an appropriate instance for their application, the plaintiff did not properly proceed in the court to make them or to justify a review of the ruling of the court denying him the remedy sought. In support of this position it is declared:

"(1) There is absolutely no mention made in any of the pleadings of a writ of attachment having been issued or a bond to prevent its levy having been given. There was therefore no issue presented as to those matters; (2) the findings fully covered all the issues raised; (3) the specifications of particulars wherein plaintiff claims the evidence insufficient to support the decision is in fact addressed to the conclusions of law, and not to findings of fact; (4) the notice of intention to move for a new trial fails to specify as one of the grounds, 'errors in law, occurring at the trial, and excepted to,' etc., the only grounds of the motion being: Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and that the decision is against law."

The reply to the first of the above stated propositions is, in our opinion, that, since the ultimate question at issue was whether the plaintiff was entitled to any sort of judgment against the defendant under the issues as finally framed, the fact of the issuance of the writ of attachment, the fact of its levy upon the property of the defendant, the fact of the giving of the undertaking for the purpose of effecting a release of the attachment, and the fact of such release were purely evidentiary, or constituted mere evidence upon which the court might predicate its conclusion upon said question. It was therefore, even if proper, unnecessary to plead those facts.

[4] Nor can we conceive of a more appropriate procedure to which the plaintiff might have resorted for the protection and preservation of his rights against the sureties than that adopted. The trial of the case was, of course, necessary, notwithstanding the special plea set up by the supplemental answer and its availability as a perfect defense to the action, if proved. If it transpired, as it did transpire, that the special plea could be established, then the plaintiff, still concerned with the ultimate decision, was entitled to a judgment in form which could do the defendant himself no possible harm, but which would preserve to him (the plaintiff) certain rights arising out of the controversy to which he was justly and legally entitled.

[5] As to the fourth proposition above stated, it is sufficient to say that whether the grounds upon which the plaintiff founded his motion for a new trial were or were not such as to warrant the trial court in legally considering and passing upon the alleged errors involved in the rulings of the court excluding proof of the attachment and the bond given to secure the release thereof is, so far as this appeal is concerned, wholly immaterial. Indeed, under the existing system for taking appeals in this state, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to move for a new trial to authorize this court to review the errors mentioned, and, so far as is concerned our right and authority to do so, it may be assumed that no motion for a new trial was in fact made. The appeal here was taken after the abrogation by the Legislature of 1915 of the right to appeal from an order denying a new trial¹ (Stats. 1915, p. 209, amending section 963, Code Civ. Proc.), and the said errors may therefore be reviewed by this court on the appeal from the judgment, notwithstanding that the court below might have been justified in denying the motion for a new trial because of the insufficiency of the grounds upon which the motion was based, as designated in the notice of intention, to point the errors relied upon. Section 956, Code Civ. Proc. The last-named section provides:

"Upon an appeal from a judgment the court may review the verdict or decision, and any intermediate ruling, * * * order or decision which involves the merits or necessarily affects the judgment, or which substantially affects the rights of a party. * * *" (Italics ours.)

The motion for a new trial was made upon the minutes of the court, and the errors occurring at the trial were preserved by a bill of exceptions, duly settled, for use on the appeal from the judgment. Section 950, Code Civ. Proc. The errors are therefore legally before this court for review, and quite manifestly they "involve the merits," "necessarily affect the judgment," and most unquestionably "substantially affect the rights of" the plaintiff.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

RICHMOND DREDGING CO. v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO.

1. DAMAGES $\S$ 124(1)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—PLEADING.

A dredging company's first cause of action against a railroad for breach of contract to pay for filling in land, which alleged that the work was to be done "strictly in accordance with the terms of said contract," and was "accepted by the defendant as having been done in accordance with the terms of said contract," did not authorize the jury to add to the total contract price of the quantity of earth deposited at so much a yard, as further damages, an amount based upon evidence that the hardest part of the work had been done when plaintiff quit on account of defendant's default.

3. RAILROADS $\S$ 159(4)—MECHANICS' LIENS—CONTRACT TO FILL IN LAND FOR RAILROAD—STATUTE—"CONSTRUCTION, ALTERATION, ADDITION TO, OR REPAIR OF"—"STRUCTURE."

A contract between a dredging company and two railroads, whereby the dredging company agreed to fill in a tract of land owned by one railroad, so that it might open an avenue across its land and provide a roadbed to which it might, at its own expense, remove the line of the other railroad at some time in the future, was not within the Mechanics' Lien Law (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1183), giving a lien for labor or material used in the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair, in whole or in part, of any building, railroad, wagon road, or other structure, the moving of the second road's tracks to another location not being the "construction, alteration, addition to, or repair of" the first railroad, or a "structure" connected with it.

4. ACCOUNT STATED $\S$ 4 — INSTALLMENT VOUCHERS.

Monthly vouchers, made out by a railroad, showing the estimated amount due a dredging company for work, in filling in the railroad's land at so much per cubic yard, done during the previous month, the installment of 75 per cent. of the contract price due, and the 25 per cent. retained by the road, as provided in the contract, carrying a receipt at the bottom of each, signed by the dredging company, for the amount of the voucher, but nothing else to show that they were new agreements containing the elements of an account stated, or were intended as a settlement of the number of cubic yards of filling deposited, were not accounts stated.

5. CONTRACTS $\S$ 305(3)—PERFORMANCE—PAYMENT—ESTOPPEL TO DENY TENDER OF PAYMENT.

Where a dredging company, filling in a railroad's land at so much per yard, the contract providing for payment in monthly installments, received money on the railroad's monthly vouchers at dates later than the 15th of each month, the contract date for payments, without protest, it was not estopped to deny that payment for a subsequent month was not tendered in time, it having protested the road's late payments and demanded payment as per contract.

6. CONTRACTS $\S$ 303(5) — BREACH—FAILURE TO PAY INSTALLMENT.

Where a dredging company, filling in a railroad's land at so much per cubic yard, payments to be made monthly, protested against previous late payments and demanded payment on the contract date, the road's failure to make a monthly payment on such date was a substantial breach of the contract justifying the dredging company in not proceeding farther.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by the Richmond Dredging Company against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying its motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

E. W. Camp, of Los Angeles, H. D. Pillsbury and Platt Kent, both of San Francisco, and C. E. McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is for damages arising out of a written contract of date January 31, 1910, between defendant as first party, plaintiff as second party, and East Shore & Suburban Railway Company, third party. This latter company is not made a party to the action.

Defendant is the owner of a tract of land situated in the city of Richmond, Contra Costa county, and was desirous of having "said land filled in as herein (by the contract) provided." The area to be filled is particularly described in the contract; the cubic measurement of said area as stated in the contract, was "estimated at approximately 220,000 yards" and "the second party agrees to fill, at the rate of 15 cents per cubic yard, within the area described." A map was attached to the contract as part thereof, showing the area to be filled, and other facts. Defendant was to pay plaintiff on—"the 15th day of each month, for the work done during the preceding month, 75 per cent. of the amount estimated by the engineer of the first party to have been earned by the second party during such preceding month, and the first party will retain the remaining 25 per cent. of all monthly estimates of work done until 35 days after the completion and acceptance by the first party, of the work herein agreed to be performed. * * * The first party is to construct and maintain any and all levees north of Ohio street necessary or proper to impound the material deposited on the area hereinabove described as lying north of said Ohio street; also such levees as may be necessary to protect its main line between Ohio street and Richmond avenue."

Plaintiff's claim is presented in four causes of action.

By the first cause of action it is alleged that plaintiff entered upon the work pursuant to the contract and gave the bond specified therein and continued the work "up to on or about the 17th day of August, 1910"; that the work performed and material furnished "was accepted by the defendant as having been done and supplied in a workmanlike manner and in accordance with the terms of said contract"; that defendant refused to pay plaintiff for its said services and material furnished by plaintiff "during the month of July, 1910, or any part of said money, and in accordance with the terms of said contract, and by so refusing and neglecting to pay such money, defendant rendered, caused, and made it possible for the plaintiff to further continue performance under the contract; and on or about the 17th day of August, 1910, the plaintiff, without fault on its part, did discontinue and suspend work under said contract, although plaintiff was fully equipped and prepared to continue such work and had expended a large amount of money for materials and supplies necessary to complete the same," whereupon on said last-mentioned day, "plaintiff notified the defendant that plaintiff would perform no further work under said contract because of defendant's neglect and refusal to pay to the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of said contract the amount due, owing, and coming to the plaintiff from the defendant for the work and services theretofore performed and labor and material theretofore supplied under said contract"; that plaintiff furnished material and performed work under said contract and in accordance with its terms of the value of $46,575, no part of which has been paid to plaintiff except the sum of $10,575, and there is now due and owing plaintiff from defendant the sum of $36,000.

The second cause of action is for "work and labor and services heretofore performed and material furnished and supplied by plaintiff for the defendant at the special instance and request of defendant."

In the third cause of action the making of the contract is alleged; furthermore, that the defendant undertook to build the levees called for in said contract, but that it constructed said levees in such a negligent and imperfect manner as that they failed to hold or impound the material deposited on the said area by plaintiff to the great damage of plaintiff; that by reason thereof the defendant so delayed and embarrassed plaintiff as to cause plaintiff to suspend the entire work under said contract and large amounts of material deposited on said area by plaintiff were not held or impounded thereon; that by reason of defendant's said default, plaintiff was compelled to keep its working forces idle for long periods of time and to pay wages to its employes and rent for a dredger used by plaintiff, * * * all to the loss and damage of said plaintiff in the sum of $6,818.81.

As a fourth cause of action the contract is pleaded, and it is alleged that plaintiff on February 12, 1910, notified defendant that plaintiff would be ready to commence operation under said contract as soon as the necessary levees were constructed to impound the material to be dredged, and defendant, on or about February 15, 1910, notified plaintiff that proper levees would be constructed on or before February 20, 1910; that on said last-named date plaintiff hired a dredger at large expense and placed it in position to enter upon said work, together with a full crew of men to operate the same, and was in readiness to commence work on February 25th; that defendant failed and neglected to construct the levees necessary to impound the material to be deposited until March 10, 1910, and thus prevented plaintiff from commencing operations under said contract until March 10, 1910, to its damage in the sum of $3,000.

In the prayer plaintiff asks judgment for $36,000, the amount claimed in the first and second causes of action, and interest from August 15, 1910; for the further sum of $16,818, the amount claimed in the third cause of action; and for the further sum of $3,000, the amount claimed in the fourth cause of action.

In its answer to the first cause of action defendant denies most of its averments; alleges that it mailed at Los Angeles vouchers for work done by plaintiff, to wit, for March, on April 21, 1910, for April, on May 21, for May, on June 21, and for June on July 20, 1910, amounting in all to $10,596.53, and that plaintiff accepted the said payments, and that on or about August 17, 1910, defendant offered to pay plaintiff the amount found to be due for work performed and materials furnished for the month of July, but plaintiff refused and still refuses to accept the same; alleges that at the time of the abandonment of said contract by plaintiff the value of the work done and materials furnished by it was the sum of $21,978.80, and not the sum of $46,575, as set forth in the complaint; denies that there is any sum due and owing plaintiff save and except the sum of $3,387.57; that there was due plaintiff for July the sum of $4,080, which sum defendant tendered plaintiff and was refused, and that there is due plaintiff for work done and materials furnished from August 1 to August 17, 1910, the sum of $1,837.57; that said contract was signed and delivered on March 3, 1910, and not on January 31, 1910, as alleged in the complaint.

Answering the second cause of action, defendant alleges that there is due plaintiff from defendant the sum of $3,387.57, and no more.

Answering the third cause of action defendant denies that it has failed to perform the contract, and alleges failure of plaintiff to evenly distribute the material dredged, and that plaintiff so negligently filled said area that the embankments constructed by defendant were thereby caused to break and give way, and the progress of the work was thereby delayed.

For answer to the fourth cause of action, it denies the averments of the complaint, and avers that by the terms of the contract it was agreed that plaintiff should begin work thereunder not later than April 1, 1910, and alleges the construction of the levees by defendant as called for in the contract.

By way of counterclaim it alleges that plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract on or about March 3, 1910, which provided that the work should be done and completed on or before October 1, 1910; that plaintiff failed to complete said work, and it still remains uncompleted, to defendant's damage in the sum of $30,000.

For further and distinct defense it alleges the contract attached to plaintiff's complaint; that defendant made payments monthly as therein provided for, and plaintiff received the same except the voucher for the month of July, 1910, which plaintiff "returned without cashing the same"; that by accepting said vouchers and payments for the months of March, April, May, and June, for said work plaintiff "is estopped from denying that said work was done and performed in accordance with said contract or from denying that said contract was at all said times and now is in full force and effect."

For a further defense it alleges that "the estimate of the engineer was a condition precedent to the making of such payment," and defendant was unable to obtain the estimates in time to furnish its voucher "until after the 15th day of the month, upon which the payment was to have been made," and that defendant was not in default in respect of March payments; that on September 1, 1910, and before payments could be made under said contract, defendant was served with an attachment in an action wherein plaintiff was defendant, and by reason thereof defendant has been prevented from making any further payments.

For further defense it alleges that under the terms of said contract the payment to be made thereunder is largely in excess of $1,000, and said contract has never been recorded in the office of the county recorder of Contra Costa county, and by reason thereof is wholly void.

The cause was tried with the assistance of a jury, and defendant submitted certain interrogatories which, with their answers, follow:

"(1) How much do you find from the evidence the defendant has paid to the plaintiff for work done under the contract described in plaintiff's complaint? Answer: $10,575.00.

"(2) How many cubic yards of earth do you find from the evidence was deposited upon the entire area described in the contract that remained there? Answer: 181,500 cu. yards.

"(3) How many cubic yards of earth do you find from the evidence was deposited by the plaintiff outside the area described in the contract resulting from overflow through breaks in the levees? Answer: 1,000 cu. yards.

"(4) When was the contract described in plaintiff's complaint signed and delivered by the East Shore & Suburban Railway Company? Answer: On or about the 3d of March, 1910.

"(6) If you find for the plaintiff, how much do you allow upon the first cause of action, described in plaintiff's complaint? Answer: $19,773.00.

"(7) If you find for the plaintiff, how much do you allow upon the second cause of action in plaintiff's complaint? Answer: Nothing.

"(8) If you find for the plaintiff, how much do you allow upon the third cause of action in plaintiff's complaint? Answer: $5,476.50.

"(9) If you find for the plaintiff, how much do you allow upon the fourth cause of action in plaintiff's complaint? Answer: $675.00.

"(10) Do you allow the defendant any sum for damages, as set forth in the answer, and counterclaim, and, if so, how much? Answer: Nothing."

Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $25,925, from which, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

1. Appellant contends first that the amount found by the special verdict under the first cause of action, to wit, $19,773 (interrogatory 6), was excessive to the extent of $3,123. That conclusion is thus reached:

181,500 cu. yards found by the jury to have been deposited on the ground (interrogatory 2) at the contract price of 15c per cu. yard, equals...	$27,225.00
Amount paid plaintiff as found by the jury	10,575.00

Bal. due	$16,650.00
----------------	-------------

Respondent replies that the interrogatory called for the cubic yards "deposited upon the entire area described in the contract that remained there," and that appellant has overlooked the latter part of the interrogatory; that the jury in reply to it had the right to take into consideration all the materials deposited upon the described area, including that which escaped because of insufficient levees. To meet this reply appellant calls attention to interrogatory 3, which was the finding of the jury that the quantity of earth deposited outside of the area "resulting from overflow through breaks in the levees," was 1,000 cubic yards. If this can be held to be the amount of earth which escaped from the designated area, and should be considered as earth that did not "remain there," it would add but $150, and the excess would still be $2,973. It is not claimed by plaintiff that it deposited, or had the right to deposit, earth outside the area. Its claim is that where earth deposited in the described area escaped for lack of sufficient levees, it should be compensated therefor. Appellant's answer is that the jury having found the extent of this overflow, the damages are measured by the contract price of 15 cents per cubic yard.

Respondent, however, makes the further contention, as borne out by the evidence, that the work done previous to its suspension was the hardest and most expensive part of the dredging work, and "the jury had a right to take this fact into consideration in arriving at the amount which respondent had earned under the contract mentioned in the first cause of action."

No special damages are alleged in the first cause of action. The averments are that plaintiff entered upon the work "pursuant to the terms of said contract, and continued on the work provided for in and by said contract up to on or about the 17th day of August, 1910." It is further alleged "that all the said work and labor and service done and performed and all material supplied by said plaintiff was done and performed and supplied strictly in accordance with the terms of said contract, and was accepted by the defendant as having been done in a workmanlike manner and in accordance with the terms of said contract." The second count was on quantum meruit, but the jury found that there was nothing due on the second cause of action. (Interrogatory 7.)

Special damages were alleged in the third count for defendant's failure to construct necessary levees and the consequent damages for which the jury allowed $5,476.50, and in the fourth count special damages were alleged for defendant's neglect in not having levees constructed at the time promised, and hence the additional cost to plaintiff by reason of expenses incurred while thus delayed in the work. For this the jury allowed plaintiff $675.50. These three items make up the exact sum found by the general verdict.

[1, 2] It seems to us that there is no allegation in the first cause of action which can be made the basis for damages other than as provided for by the contract, and the agreement there is to pay 15 cents per cubic yard for earth deposited under the contract. The number of cubic yards was found by the jury, and the contract fixed the price to be paid. We can discover no averment in the first cause of action which would authorize the jury to add as further damages an amount based upon evidence "that the hardest part of the work had been done" when plaintiff quit the job. It was expressly alleged that the work was done "strictly in accordance with the terms of said contract," and was "accepted by the defendant as having been done in accordance with the terms of said contract." It was held in California Wine Ass'n v. Commercial Union Fire Ins. Co., 159 Cal. 49, 52, 112 Pac. 858, 860, that "the special verdicts absolutely control the general verdict." Napa Valley Packing Co. v. S. F. Relief and Red Cross Funds, 16 Cal. App. 461, 118 Pac. 469. It seems to us quite clear that the special verdicts were addressed directly to the issues in the case and responded specifically to each of the causes of action. These several answers to interrogatories or special verdicts constituted the basis of the general verdict, and if any one of these answers or special verdicts was unsupported by the evidence, the general verdict cannot stand. The special verdict upon the first cause of action is not supported by the evidence. The contract provided that plaintiff was to be paid 15 cents per cubic yard for earth deposited by it, and the jury found the number of cubic yards deposited both within and without the area. The exact damage, therefore, under the first cause of action, may be ascertained by a simple example in multiplication, and we see no reason why this may not be resorted to as showing the amount of plaintiff's damage under the first cause of action. The contract price for depositing 181,500+1,000 cubic yards of earth at 15 cents per cubic yard will give the amount of plaintiff's damages—$27,375. Deducting payments made of $10,575 leaves $16,800, the amount due upon the first cause of action. This amount added to the findings under the third and fourth causes of action, to wit, $5,476.50 and $675.50 makes in all the sum of $22,952, instead of $25,925.

2. Appellant claims that the work was of such character as to bring the contract within the provisions of section 1183 of the Mechanics' Lien Law, and, as the contract was not recorded, it was void, and plaintiff's only remedy was in an action on quantum meruit for the value of the labor and material furnished, and the contract price will be taken as the basis for recovering damages, which brings the same result as above shown. Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 170, 65 Pac. 391; Condon v. Donahue, 160 Cal. 749, 118 Pac. 113.

It is claimed further, however, that plaintiff's recovery being limited to the contract price as above claimed, the verdict was against law because the jury awarded recovery on counts under which plaintiff was entitled to nothing (counts 3 and 4), and was denied recovery on count 2, the only one under which plaintiff had any legal ground for a verdict in its favor.

[3] We cannot accept appellant's claim that the mechanics' lien law is applicable. The area to be filled was part of a tract of 50 or more acres, the property of defendant. As near as we can determine from the provisions of the contract and from the map made part thereof, defendant's principal object was to locate and open an avenue, called Ashland avenue, across defendant's land, and provide a roadbed to which the line of the East Shore & Suburban Railroad Company might some time be removed from its present location between the defendant's track and the proposed Ashland avenue. Just why this was deemed necessary or advisable does not appear. The contract reads:

"The third party (Suburban Railway) agrees that upon the filling in of said Ashland avenue to grade, as hereinabove provided, the first party shall have the right to remove the tracks of the third party now situated in part on the area to be filled in under this contract in the following manner: [Describing the route or new location of the suburban track.] * * * The cost of the removal and the relocation of said line is to be borne wholly by first party," etc.

We do not think that this work can reasonably be held to fall within the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure which gives a lien to "all persons * * * performing labor upon or furnishing material to be used in the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair, in whole or in part, of any building, * * * railroad, wagon road, or other structure," etc. There is no evidence tending to show that defendant intended to make any present use of this filled-in ground for the extension or relocation of its tracks. The moving of the Suburban Railway Company's track to another location cannot be said to be the "construction, alteration, addition to, or repair of" defendant's railroad, or to be a "structure" connected with said railroad. It did not appear that the fill was necessary to the operation of defendant's road, or for stations, roundhouses, shops, and the like which have been held to be included in the term "railway."

[4] 3. We do not think that the monthly vouchers made out by defendant showing the estimated amount due for work done during the previous month, the installment of 75 per cent. due, and the 25 per cent. retained as provided in the contract, can be regarded as accounts stated. Appellant claims that "the parties were bound thereby, and no recovery can be had except for the unpaid balance." There were four of these for the months of March, April, May, and June, respectively. The first one states the estimated number of cubic "yards dredger filling," but the others give only the estimated amount of money due, the result of former accounts being carried forward in successive accounts. At the bottom of each is a receipt signed by plaintiff for the amount of the voucher. Beyond this there is nothing to show that they were in effect new agreements or contained the elements constituting an account stated, or that they were intended as a settlement of the number of cubic yards actually deposited.

[5, 6] 4. Nor do we think that because plaintiff received money on these vouchers at dates later than the 15th of each month without protest, it is estopped to deny that payment for July was not tendered in time. There might be force in this contention had plaintiff failed to notify defendant that prompt payment must be made in the future. On August 10, 1910, plaintiff wrote defendant as follows:

"Because of the fact that our contract with you allows you to retain 25 per cent. of the money we have earned and because of the fact that your engineer persists in underestimating the amount of material delivered it is absolutely necessary that we should receive your check for the material delivered during the preceding month on the 15th as our contract specifies. Heretofore your check has arrived anywhere from the 23d to the 30th of the month instead of on the 15th. Our contract with the power company compels us to pay for the current used on the 15th. Unless we pay our bill the current will be shut off and we will be caused both damage and delay; therefore we must demand that we be paid as per contract on the 15th."

Notwithstanding this demand, defendant did not offer to pay for the July work as demanded, and on August 17, 1910, plaintiff notified defendant in writing that plaintiff considered itself released from "further performance under said agreement," and demanded payment for the work and services performed. The failure to make the payment demanded in compliance with the terms of the contract was a substantial breach thereof, and justified the plaintiff in not proceeding further. S. F. Bridge Co. v. Dumbarton L. & I. Co., 119 Cal. 272, 51 Pac. 335; Woodruff Co. v. Exchange Realty Co., 21 Cal.

App. 607, 132 Pac. 598; American-Hawaiian Eng. & Con. Co. v. Butler, 165 Cal. 497, 133 Pac. 280, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 44.

[7] 5. It is urged that the third cause of action included every element of damage which could accrue from the breach of the contract, and that the damages were duplicated by reason of damages also being awarded under the fourth cause of action; that a party cannot split up a single cause of action and maintain separate actions thereon; that damages arising from a single wrong, though at different times, make but one cause of action. Hall v. Susskind, 109 Cal. 209, 41 Pac. 1012.

This rule of pleading was not invoked by demurrer, nor was it raised at the trial. Doubtless the facts constituting the damages could have been set up in a single count and probably should have been, but we cannot see that defendant suffered prejudice by plaintiff's failure to do so. The third cause of action was grounded on defendant's failure to maintain the levees necessary to impound the material deposited, thus causing suspension of work by plaintiff. The fourth cause of action was grounded on defendant's failure to have the levees in readiness at the time defendant promised. There was evidence sufficient to support the verdict on both of these counts.

[8-10] 6. The only remaining error assigned as prejudicial relates to the admission in evidence of certain letters purporting to have been written by Mr. Ball, defendant's engineer in charge of the work. The testimony was conflicting as to the failure of defendant to construct the levees to impound the material. There were two of these letters dated respectively May 2d (Exhibit 4), and May 13, 1910 (Exhibit 8), each purporting to be signed "R. B. Ball, Division Engineer." The letter of May 2d refers to a conversation previously had with plaintiff, and plaintiff answered this letter on May 3d (Exhibit 5); the letter of May 13th (Exhibit 8) refers to defendant's letter of May 12th, and all of them dealing with the matter of these levees, and defendant's letters to some extent conceding defendant's default. The letters were produced in court by witness Cutting, president of plaintiff company, who testified that he received these letters in due course through the United States mail. It appeared that on Saturday, Mr. Cutting had a conversation with Mr. Ball, and that the letter of May 2d (Exhibit 4) was in response to this conversation and to which plaintiff replied on May 3d. Defendant's letter of May 12th was answered by plaintiff by letter the next day. Witness Cutting did not testify to the handwriting of Mr. Ball nor that he knew his signature, nor that he saw either of the Ball letters written, nor that he was a subscribing witness thereto. On these grounds defendant objected, and it is now urged that the letters were not properly identified. Appellant relies upon the rule as stated in People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535, 550, 102 Pac. 517, 523:

"Where not acknowledged, a private writing must be proved in one of three ways: By any one who saw the writing executed, or by evidence of the genuineness of the handwriting of the maker, or by a subscribing witness. Code Civ. Proc. § 1940. Such execution must be shown before it is entitled to admission. Sinclair v. Wood, 3 Cal. 98."

Mr. Jones states the rule thus:

"Before letters are received in evidence there must be, as in the case of other documents, some proof of their genuineness. This is not proved by the mere fact that the letter is received by mail, when the signature is not proved." Jones on Evidence (2d Ed.) § 583.

The evidence shows that Mr. Ball and Mr. Cutting were in frequent, almost daily communication in connection with the very matters the subject of the letters; sometimes their differences were made known in conversations and sometimes in letters. The evidence showed that the parties acted upon the suggestions in exchanged letters. The genuineness of Mr. Ball's letters was not challenged. He was a witness and in court and could have disclaimed writing them. Cutting no doubt was familiar with Ball's handwriting and his testimony;

"That is a letter I received from Mr. Ball on Monday, the 2d day of May, 1910, through the mail" (referring to Exhibit 4); again, "that is a letter received by me, received from Mr. Ball, Division Engineer, Santa Fe Railroad" (Exhibit 8)

—we think, under the circumstances, was more than a mere conclusion of the witness. It was stated in Verzan v. McGregor, 23 Cal. 339, 343:

"It is often the case that the main question in controversy is the execution and authenticity of the instrument. And the rule is, that if there be no evidence of authenticity, the instrument cannot be read to the jury; but if there be any fact or circumstances tending to prove the authenticity from which it might be presumed, then the instrument is to be read to the jury, and the question, like other matters of fact, is for their decision."

The rule contended for is sound and is not to be disregarded. It would have been a very simple thing to prove the authenticity of these letters not only by Cutting, but by their writer who was in court, and it should have been done. We cannot, however, under all the circumstances, say that the error was so prejudicial as to cause a miscarriage of justice or to justify a reversal.

The judgment is modified by reducing the same from $25,925 and costs to the sum of $22,952 and costs, with direction to compute interest from the date of the original judgment, and, as thus modified, the judgment and order are affirmed, appellant to recover costs on appeal.

We concur: HART, J.; ELLISON, Judge pro tem.

PEOPLE v. MARTINEZ. (Cr. 358.)

1. JURY $\hookrightarrow$ 97(4) — COMPETENCY—BIAS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In a prosecution for burglary, where three jurors stated that accused would be required to produce evidence in his favor to create a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, and another juror said that if there was a reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt he would presume the possibility of his guilt to overcome such doubt, but where all of them declared that if accepted as jurors they would determine the defendant's guilt according to the evidence and the law, and give him the benefit of the presumption of innocence, the denial of defendant's challenges for implied bias, and their acceptance as jurors, was not an abuse of discretion.

2. BURGLARY $\hookrightarrow$ 35, 38—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—FOOTPRINTS—FINDING ARTICLES STOLEN.

In a prosecution for burglary, where there was no direct evidence of defendant's guilt, evidence that defendant and another were seen together at the place of the burglary and had obtained work together, that defendant wore a particular kind of a cap, and his companion a particular kind and size of shoes, that there was snow on the ground, and that footprints therein had the precise measurement of the shoes of defendant and his companion, that part of a leather case of one of the watches taken was found at a place at which defendant and his companion had been seen together, was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 83, 91; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 35, 38.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 531(1) — EVIDENCE — POSSESSION OF STOLEN GOODS—VOLUNTARY STATEMENT.

In a prosecution for burglary, it was not necessary to make the preliminary showing that the statements of defendant, and those of his companion made in his presence after their arrest, were voluntarily made, where the statements involved no confessions of guilt, but were merely inconsistent explanations of the possession of a stolen watch by defendant's companion.

4. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 412(2)—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS—FOREIGN LANGUAGE.

In a prosecution for burglary, testimony of the owner of the stolen goods as to a conversation he overheard between defendant and his companion while they were in jail, carried on in Spanish, was admissible, where witness understood Spanish to some extent and related only the part of the conversation which he clearly understood.

5. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 448(7) — EVIDENCE — CONCLUSION.

In a prosecution for burglary, a question to the owner of the stolen property as to whether he had the same powers of observation as any one that was with him had, following an unsuccessful attempt to secure a statement from him as to the relative distance between two houses located back of his store and between one of such houses and the store, called for a conclusion of the witness.

6. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 386 — EVIDENCE — OBSERVATION OF WITNESS.

In such prosecution, an objection to question on cross-examination of owner of stolen goods as to his powers of observation as to distances between his store and a house was properly sustained, where the witness could have given no more information than he did, whatever his powers of observation.

7. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1170½(5) — HARMLESS ERROR — CROSS-EXAMINATION — EXPLANATION—REMARK OF COURT.

In a prosecution for burglary, where the owner of the stolen goods after an exhaustive cross-examination as to the number of houses situated on the street back of that on which his store was, stated that there was more than one house, the refusal to permit the defendant's attorney to explain the object of such examination over the district attorney's objection, and the court's remark that the evidence was not material enough to take any time, was not prejudicial to defendant, where either an affirmative or negative answer would not have affected the witness' credibility.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3133; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1170½(5).]

8. WITNESSES $\hookrightarrow$ 330(1) — EVIDENCE—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS.

In a prosecution for burglary, a question to the owner of the stolen property who had been examined as to the number of houses situated on the street back of the street on which his store was located, "You are as sure of this as you are of any other part of your testimony," was meaningless, as either an affirmative or a negative answer would not add to or detract from his credibility, or the weight of his testimony.

9. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 762(5)—INSTRUCTION—OPINION OF COURT.

In such prosecution, an instruction that under the information the jury might, if the evidence warranted, find the defendant guilty of burglary in the first or second degree, and that if there was a reasonable doubt, defendant should have the benefit of the doubt and be acquitted of the higher offense within Pen. Code, § 460, was not objectionable as intimating that defendant was guilty of burglary.

10. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 784(4) — ARGUMENTATIVE INSTRUCTION.

In such prosecution, an instruction that where circumstantial evidence is wholly relied upon to prove defendant's connection with the commission of the crime, any fact essential to sustain the hypothesis of guilt and exclude that of innocence and any single fact from which the inference of guilt is to be drawn, must be proved by evidence satisfying the jury to the same extent as they are required to be satisfied of facts where the evidence is direct, was not objectionable as being argumentative.

11. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1137(3)—APPEAL—INVITED ERROR.

Such instruction, if objectionable as argumentative, could not be complained of by defendant where it was given and read to the jury at his request.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Frank Martinez was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

J. D. McLaughlin, of Quincy, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. Defendant claims: That his rights were prejudiced by alleged errors of the court, in disallowing challenges of certain veniremen for implied bias, in allowing certain testimony to be received into the record, and in the giving of certain instructions. It is charged that he was prejudiced by alleged misconduct of the district attorney, and insisted that the evidence does not support the verdict.

The alleged crime was committed at the town of Portola, in Plumas county, between the hours of 8 and 10 o'clock of the evening of February 13, 1916. The building entered was the property of one Arkin. Therein he carried on the retail drug business, and also had living rooms, where he and his family resided. A portion of the store was occupied by one Johnson as a jewelry store and repair shop. On the evening named, Arkin and his family attended a moving picture show located on the opposite side of the street from the said store. He left the store at about half past 7 o'clock in the evening. Johnson had previously left the store and also attended the picture show mentioned. Arkin returned to the store at about 15 minutes after 9 o'clock on that evening, and discovered that a window to one of his living rooms in the rear of the building had been broken so as to admit of the easy entrance of a person into the building. An investigation following this discovery disclosed that the jewelry case belonging to Johnson had been broken into and a large quantity of watches, lockets, and other like articles had been abstracted therefrom, aggregating in value the sum of $500 approximately.

The defendant and another man, known as Ed. Martinez and also as Ed. Leal, were, within a few days after the burglary was committed, arrested at Gerlach, Nev., and on the person of Ed. Martinez was found one of the stolen watches. Other facts developed at the trial will be stated as we consider some of the points, particularly the contention that the verdict is not sufficiently supported.

[1] 1. Objections by way of challenges for implied bias were interposed to the legal competency of four of the talesmen to serve as jurors in the case. These were jurors McKenzie, Grother, Guidici, and Jansen.

In reply to a question upon voir dire by the attorney for the defendant, McKenzie stated that the accused would be required to "produce evidence in his favor to create a reasonable doubt" in his mind as to the defendant's guilt. Grother and Ohlsen, also replying to questions by defendant's counsel, made similar replies. Guidici affirmatively answered the following question propounded by defendant's attorney:

"If there was a reasonable doubt in your mind as to the guilt of the defendant would you presume, or indulge in any possibilities that he would be guilty, to overcome that doubt?"

Each of the jurors, however, on being questioned by the district attorney, declared that, if accepted as a juror in the case, he would, in determining the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant, be governed entirely by the evidence and the law as the court stated it to them; that he would, at all times, give the defendant the benefit of the presumption of innocence until his guilt was satisfactorily proved and acquit him if, after a full and fair consideration of the evidence by the light of the court's instructions upon the law, he entertained a reasonable doubt of his guilt. "Under this state of the record upon the question whether such jurors possessed such bias as would prevent them from trying the case fairly and impartially, it was for the court to determine that preliminary issue, and in all such cases the court's discretion will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears that it has been abused." People v. Conte, 17 Cal. App. 771, 777, 122 Pac. 450, 457. As was well said in People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 371, 92 Pac. 856, where the precise proposition under consideration was discussed:

"Many persons, competent as jurors, have not given much attention to such subjects, are inexperienced as witnesses, and are unable readily to comprehend the force and effect of the language in which such questions are couched, and they generally answer without reflection as to the effect of their own words. Such contradictions are by no means infrequent, if, indeed, they are not the rule, rather than the exception. The trial court must decide which of the answers most truly shows the juror's mind. * * * Where there are such contradictions its decision is binding upon this court"—citing a large number of cases.

As is readily to be noted, the challenged veniremen in this case each made conflicting and directly contradictory statements as to the course he would pursue in the discharge of his duty as a jurymen—one statement which would disqualify him and another which would make him legally competent to serve—and, under these circumstances, it was, of course, with the trial court to decide, upon his examination as a whole, whether he was in all respects qualified to try the issue fairly and impartially. There is nothing upon the face of the record here indicating that in its decision in any of the instances referred to the trial court abused its discretion, and therefore the conclusion of that court upon the question is conclusive upon this court.

[2] 2. The next assignments involve objections which were made to the reception into the record of certain testimony. The case made against the accused was by evidence of circumstances, no direct proof of his guilt having been presented. The defendant, with Ed. Martinez or Leal, together applied for and secured work as section hands for the Western Pacific Company at Portola, a few days prior to the date of the burglary. They worked for the company for a few days only. They were subsequently seen together on the streets of Portola. The people, over objection by the defendant, were permitted to prove that the two men applied for and obtained work together; that the defendant wore a particular kind of cap while in Portola; that his companion wore a particular kind and size of shoes; that there was considerable quantity of snow on the ground in Portola at the time of the burglary, this testimony being allowed in connection with testimony that there were observed on the surface of the snow the impressions of human feet, and that measurements were made of the footprints so observed, which precisely compared in measurement with the shoes of the defendant and his companion; that the remnants of a leather case in which one of the watches taken from the store was kept were found a few days after the burglary at a place called Hawley, a short distance from Portola, and toward which place the defendant and his companion were seen hastily going by foot in the neighborhood of 10 o'clock of the night the building was entered, and other like circumstances tending in a greater or less degree to place upon the accused and Ed. Martinez or Leal responsibility for the crime. All this testimony, it is here claimed, was improperly received. Not so. The two men were shown to have been companions, and at all times in the company of each other from the time they procured work with the railroad company until they were placed under arrest at Gerlach, Nev. The people, therefore, were entitled to the benefit of any testimony bearing upon the description of the two men and their wearing apparel, or which disclosed their joint movements and flight or their actions and declarations in the presence of each other having any tendency to show or point to their guilt of the crime charged.

[3] 3. It was not necessary to make a preliminary showing that the statements made by the defendant when placed under arrest, and those made by Ed. Martinez at the same time in the defendant's presence, were voluntarily made. The statements did not involve a confession of guilt. They merely involved conflicting or inconsistent explanations of the possession of the stolen watch found in the possession of Ed. Martinez. In their conversations with the officers, both denied that they were connected in any manner with the crime, or that they had any knowledge of it.

[4] 4. The ruling allowing the witness Johnson to state a conversation which he testified he overheard between the defendant and Ed. Martinez while they were confined in the county jail at Quincy, awaiting trial, was not erroneous. The conversation was carried on between the two men in the Spanish language, and the special ground of the objection to the testimony was that Johnson did not fully understand that language. But the witness testified that he could understand Spanish when spoken to some extent, and related only that part of the conversation which he testified that he clearly understood.

[5, 6] 5. It was not error to sustain the objection to the following cross-question to the witness Johnson:

"You had the same powers of observation as any one that was with you had, or didn't you?"

The question followed an unsuccessful effort to secure a statement from the witness as to the relative distances between two houses located back of the Arkin store and between one of those houses and said store. The question was argumentative in character and, as framed, called for a conclusion of the witness. But it is probable that what counsel intended to ask was whether the witness' opportunity for observation was equal to that of any other person with him at the time they were inspecting and following the footprints in the rear of the store. But, even so viewing it and if in that view a proper question, it is very clear that, inasmuch as the witness, after considerable questioning on that line, showed that he had formed no judgment as to the distances so sought to be shown, he could have given no more information upon the subject than he did, whatever his powers of observation might be or his opportunity for observation on that occasion might have been.

There are some other rulings similar to the last above considered animadverted upon in the briefs of the defendant, but even if not strictly correct, they were obviously harmless in their effect.

[7, 8] 6. There was nothing detrimental to the rights of the defendant either in the action of the court in refusing to permit his attorney to explain the object of a certain line of the cross-examination of the witness Johnson, and to which the district attorney objected, or in the language used by the court in ruling upon the proposition. The witness Johnson had been exhaustively cross-examined upon the question as to the number of houses situated on a street back of the street on which Arkin's store is situated. The witness declared that he was able to remember and say that there was more than one house on a certain part of the back street, whereupon counsel asked him, "you are as sure of this as you are of any other part of your testimony?" to which question an objection by the district attorney was sustained. Counsel then attempted to explain that he desired to test the memory of the witness as to the number of houses, and upon objection by the district attorney, the court ruled and said, "I don't think that particular part is material enough to take any time with it." The question is of an argumentative character, and one which, though frequently asked of a witness on cross-examination, is really meaningless. Either an affirmative or negative answer to the question would not have the effect of adding to or detracting from his credibility or the weight of his testimony.

[9] 7. It is insisted that the court, in instruction No. 6, as given, told the jury that the defendant was guilty of one or the other of the two degrees of burglary. Said instruction reads:

"Under the information in this case you may, if the evidence warrant it, find the defendant guilty of burglary of the first degree or burglary of the second degree. Should you entertain a reasonable doubt as to which of the two degrees he is guilty, if any, you will give the defendant the benefit of the doubt and acquit him of the higher offense."

It seems to us that the language of said instruction is so plain and clear as to put the meaning thereof beyond all doubt or even cavil. It obviously means that, if the jury find by the proper degree of proof that the defendant committed the crime charged, but should entertain a reasonable doubt as to which of the degrees of that crime (Pen. Code, § 460), if any, he was, under the evidence, guilty of, then he would be entitled to the benefit of such doubt, and in that case should be convicted only of the lower degree of the crime. It would seem to be hardly necessary to say that nowhere in said instruction does the court intimate that the defendant is guilty of the crime of burglary.

[10, 11] 8. Instruction No. 16 is challenged upon the ground that it is argumentative. It explained that, where circumstantial evidence is solely relied upon for the proof of an accused's connection with the commission of a crime, "any fact essential to sustain the hypothesis of guilt and exclude the hypothesis of innocence," and any single fact from which the inference of guilt is to be drawn, "must be proved by evidence which satisfies the minds and conscience of the jury to the same extent that they are required to be satisfied of the facts in an issue in cases where the evidence is direct." We see nothing legally objectionable in the instruction; but, if it were amenable to just criticism, the defendant cannot complain of it, since the record shows that it was given and read to the jury at his request.

9. The general instructions preferred by the defendant and disallowed by the court we have carefully examined and find that they involved the statement of principles fully and clearly submitted to the jury in the court's charge. It is therefore unnecessary to give them special consideration.

[12] 10. We cannot say that the verdict was not justified. It at the least appears to be sufficiently supported by the proofs, and this is all that is required to put it beyond the power of a reviewing court to set aside a verdict, so far as the evidence is concerned. We have already stated that the evidence was not direct, but consisted wholly of circumstances. Some of the most important of these have been adverted to. It is not necessary to further rehearse them herein. There are, however, several other circumstances of no inconsiderable significance, when considered with the other circumstances, and they are: (1) That on the evening of the burglary and after Arkin and family and Johnson had left the burglarized building and gone to the picture show, a man answering the description of the defendant as to stature, build, and headgear was seen standing in a sort of hallway leading into the Arkin drug store and peering through the window of said store; (2) that when the defendant and Ed. Martinez were first searched at Gerlach, the watch was not found on the person of either. An Ingersoll watch of the value of $1 was found on the person of Ed. Martinez, who declared to the officers that that was the only watch they had. In this connection, it was shown that, after Ed. Martinez was searched, he stepped up to and near the defendant, and that the two men were thereafter again searched and a gold watch positively identified by Johnson as one of the watches stolen from his store, was found on the person of Ed. Martinez; (3) that the defendant was heard to ask Ed. Martinez, while the two were confined in jail, if the latter had "told anything" to the officers, the natural inference from which question was whether Ed. had made any statement to the officers of an incriminatory character concerning the case or their possession of a part of the stolen property.

There is, then, this situation presented here, so far as the proof is concerned: The presence of the defendant and his companion in Portola just before the burglary was committed and thus opportunity to commit the crime available to them; the correspondence in size of the footprints on the surface of the snow leading to and from the building with the shoes worn by the defendant and his companion; the finding at Hawley, in which direction the accused were seen traveling, of a part of the leather case in which one of the stolen watches was encased when taken from the store, a short time after the burglary; the possession by one of the parties of one of the stolen watches, and the contradictory statements made by the defendant and his companion in attempting to explain such possession. These, with the other circumstances mentioned, make out what may well be deemed a strong circumstantial case. At all events, if, as appears to be so, the jury believed the circumstances and the evidence by which they were shown, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that they thus arrived at an erroneous conclusion.

[13] 11. The last point calling for consideration involves the charge of misconduct on the part of the district attorney during the progress of the trial. The most serious of the several objections under this head may be shown by the following colloquy:

Mr. McLaughlin: "While Mr. Myers (a witness for defendant) is coming, we will ask to strike out all the testimony in this case in regard to those shoes. The prosecution had those in their possession at one time, and could produce them here as an exhibit, if they had used due diligence; and we object to the shoes being used."

Mr. Kerr (district attorney): "We object to the statement of counsel that we had the shoes that got away from us before this trial was started through no fault of the prosecution."

Mr. McLaughlin: "Or defendant."

Mr. Kerr: "You tell us where they are and we will attempt to get them in here."

Mr. McLaughlin: "You probably know as much about their whereabouts as I do, Mr. Kerr, and we resent the insinuation in the remark."

Mr. Kerr: " * * * I certainly apologize if he (attorney for defendant) takes it as a personal proposition, for it wasn't meant that way."

It is, of course, always improper for an attorney in the trial of a case before a jury to make any remark pregnant with an insinuation that either party to the action, or any party acting on the suggestion or in the interest of one of the parties to the action, has suppressed testimony or disposed of physical objects so that they may not be available for use as testimony at the trial and which, upon inspection by the jury, might tend to weaken the case of one of the parties.

In the present case, both the district attorney and the attorney for the defendant, during the course of the discussion, made statements which should not have been made in the presence and hearing of the jury. While such conduct on the part of lawyers during the trial of a warmly contested case is generally the result of their zeal for the interests of their clients and not intended as means for bringing some fact before the jury which it is not legally proper for them to know, it often results seriously to the rights of the parties, and may lead to gross injustice. In this case, however, it is reasonably probable that the remarks of the attorneys made no impression upon the jury. They involved a charge and countercharge by two persons, in theory at least hostile to each other, upon a matter not of overruling importance, since, as we have shown, there were many other inculpatory circumstances of a convincing character brought out against the accused than the circumstance of the footprints in the snow answering to the description of the shoes worn by the defendant and Ed. Martinez at the time of their arrest. The putting of the shoes themselves in evidence could have accomplished no more than to confirm or confute the testimony showing that, in size, they corresponded with the footprints; and if said testimony had been so confirmed or corroborated, nothing would have been added thereto, and if thus refuted, then the result would merely have been to destroy only one circumstance, important, it is true, but which still left many other circumstances the verity of which did not rest upon the production of the shoes and which, on their face, were sufficient to justify a verdict of guilty.

We have not succeeded in discovering the slightest semblance of misconduct by the district attorney in any of the several other assignments of misconduct on the part of that official. Those assignments, therefore, do not merit, and will not be given special notice.

We have now considered all the points to which we conceived special attention should be given, and, finding no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

sion, admission of incompetent evidence to prove such facts would be mere error, not ousting the commission of jurisdiction, nor justifying writ of review; so that the question of unconstitutionality of Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) § 77, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1102, § 28, providing that no award of said commission shall be invalidated by admission of hearsay evidence, cannot be considered.

In Bank. Petition by the Southern Surety Company for writ of review against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and another. Writ denied.

George F. Hatton and Hartley F. Peart, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

SHAW, J. This is a petition to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission to the widow of Giovanni Gaggero for the death of said Gaggero found to have been caused by an accident to him arising out of and in the course of his employment in the service of Macdonald and Kahn. The petitioner is the insurance carrier for Macdonald and Kahn.

The ground upon which the intervention of this court is asked is that there was no competent evidence given to prove that the decedent was injured while in the course of said employment; the claim being that the only evidence in proof thereof was hearsay. The petitioner attacks the validity of section 77 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as amended in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1102), providing that no award of said commission shall be invalidated because of the admission of hearsay evidence of declarations by a person who is dead or who cannot be found, and relating directly to the injury. The claim is that such section is unconstitutional.

Upon the showing made, we cannot consider the question sought to be presented. There is substantial evidence, aside from the hearsay evidence complained of, sufficient to establish the fact that the decedent received the injury in question while in the service aforesaid, and that it arose out of said employment. This being true, the admission of incompetent evidence to prove the same facts would be mere error. It would not oust the commission of jurisdiction, nor justify a writ of review.

The writ is denied.

CONTRACTS ⇨337(2)—ACTION FOR BREACH—COMPLAINT.

A substantial breach of the agreement of defendant retail liquor dealers to buy of plaintiff all their beer and liquors during the life of the lease, and fixing liquidated damages for its breach, is not shown by the complaint, alleging merely that on a certain day defendants neglected and refused to purchase all beer of plaintiff.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Action by C. J. Vath against James F. Hallett and others. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed by the District Court of Appeal, and petition is made for transfer and hearing in the Supreme Court. Denied.

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal is as follows:

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. The plaintiff brought this action to recover of the defendants Davitt and Hallett the sum of $3,000 alleged to be due under the terms of a written contract. Two other persons were made defendants under an allegation that they refused to join with the plaintiff. Davitt and Hallett will be referred to as the defendants. The defendant Davitt demurred to the complaint, and, his demurrer having been overruled, he declined to answer, and judgment was entered against him. He appeals from such judgment.

For a clear understanding of the case it seems necessary to set out in full the contract sued upon as it appears in the complaint. It is as follows:

"This agreement made between James J. Davitt and J. F. Hallett, of the county of Santa Clara, state of California, parties of the first part, and A. L. Brassy, C. J. Vath and George Geoffrey, of the same said county and state, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas the said James J. Davitt and J. F. Hallett are about to enter into partnership in the business of retailing liquor, at number 19 South Second street, in the city of San Jose, county of Santa Clara, state of California, and the said J. F. Hallett is desirous of having associated with him the said James J. Davitt, and the said Davitt, in order to become associated with the said Hallett, has to raise the sum of six thousand ($6,000.00) dollars, and whereas the said parties of the second part are willing to loan to the said Davitt the said sum of six thousand ($6,000.00) dollars, in consideration of certain security to be given by to parties of the second part. One of which is the guaranty of parties of the first part, on their part, that they will during the entire period of the leasehold, now held by said Hallett, pertaining to said premises, to purchase of said parties of the second part, all steam and lager beer and liquors of every kind and character and all incidentals pertaining to the retail liquor business of and from said parties of the second part. It being impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damage which may result to parties of the second part from a breach or violation of the terms hereof by parties of the first part, it is agreed that the sum of three thousand ($3,000.00) dollars be and the same is hereby fixed as liquidated damages for which sum judgment may be taken by parties of the second part upon proof of a breach of the terms hereof by parties of the first part.

Jas. F. Hallett.

"James J. Davitt."

Additionally the complaint alleges: "That from the nature of the subject-matter of the said contract and the relation of the parties thereto, it would have been, was, and still is impracticable and extremely difficult to fix, have fixed, or to now fix the actual damage which plaintiff would sustain by reason of a breach thereof by parties of the first part." "That on or about the 29th day of May, 1913, the defendants, contrary to the terms of said agreement, and in violation of their obligation thereof, neglected and refused to purchase all lager beer of the plaintiffs as provided in said contract." That at the time of said neglect and refusal, defendant Davitt was conducting said retail liquor business. That plaintiff at all times was ready, able, and willing to comply with all the terms of said contract on his part to be performed, and had done so. That plaintiff advanced, and defendants accepted, the $6,000 loan provided for in said agreement. That defendants complied with the terms of said contract for a period of about two years after its date. Judgment is asked for the $3,000 and costs.

1. We are of the opinion that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and the demurrer thereto should have been sustained. While the contract pleaded is somewhat vague, indefinite, and incomplete, it is manifest that the defendants were to buy of the plaintiff only such beer as they might need from time to time in their business of retailing liquor. There is no allegation in the complaint that they needed any beer on or about May 29, 1913, or that they bought any from any other source. For aught that appears in the complaint, they needed none at about that time. There is no averment that they ceased to buy of the plaintiff for more than one day. It is alleged that they failed and refused to buy all beer of plaintiff. This allegation would be sustained on a trial by testimony that on the day named, the defendants bought ten cases of beer from the plaintiff and only one quart from some one else. Conceding for the present that the contract is to be construed as one for liquidated damages, yet no recovery can be had unless a substantial breach thereof is alleged and proved. "This action is brought upon the theory that the sum of $200 specified in the agreement is liquidated damages for any breach of the requirements thereof, and such is the contention of the plaintiff. For the purposes of the case, the correctness of this proposition will be conceded. In such a case, before any liability to pay the liquidated damages can attach to the party in default, he must have been guilty of a substantial breach of his agreement, a breach that has resulted in something more than mere nominal damages to the other contracting party. This rule is so manifestly just that no discussion of it is necessary." Hathaway v. Lynn, 75 Wis. 186, 43 N. W. 956, 6 L. R. A. 551.

As an application may be made to amend the complaint in the lower court, it becomes necessary to notice some other points raised by appellant.

For several reasons we are of the opinion the contract cannot be the foundation of an action for either liquidated damages or for actual damages.

(1) It lacks certainty. There is no direct promise or agreement on the part of the defendants to buy liquor from the plaintiff. Such promise can only be inferred from the general language of the contract. The plaintiff agreed to loan defendant $6,000 "in consideration of certain security to be given by to parties of the second part. One of which is the guaranty of parties of the first part, on their part, that they will during the entire period of the leasehold, now held by said Hallett, pertaining to said premises, to purchase of said parties of the second part, all steam and lager beer and liquors of every kind and character and all incidentals pertaining to the retail liquor business of and from said parties of the second part." Perhaps a promise on the part of defendants to buy beer, etc., from plaintiff may be inferred from this general language, but it seems unnecessary to definitely pass on the point. The contract fixes no price at which plaintiff was to furnish beer, etc., to defendant. He did not bind himself to furnish it at any agreed price. The plaintiff did not promise and bind himself to sell beer, etc., to defendant at all. He assumed no obligation to do so, and it was left entirely at his pleasure to sell defendant beer, etc., or not to sell it, and any failure to so furnish and sell would have given plaintiff no cause of action against defendant. An executory contract must have the element of mutuality. An agreement on part of defendant to buy beer of the plaintiff is not enforceable against the defendant where there is no agreement or promise on the part of the plaintiff to sell such articles to him. Hence the contract cannot be the basis for a suit for damages for not buying of the plaintiff.

The contract is not enforceable as one for liquidated damages. It will be observed that by the contract the same damage, $3,000, is fixed as the estimated and agreed damages for a complete violation of its terms and for a partial violation. According to the terms of the contract, if the defendant failed and neglected during the entire five years to buy anything of the plaintiff, the damage would have been $3,000. Whereas, if he bought all beer and other supplies for the saloon during all the five years except the last week of said five-year period, he would also owe plaintiff $3,000. This shows that no good-faith valuation of the damages, which might result from the breach of the contract, was made. "A good-faith valuation of the damages which will result from the breach of a contract is generally upheld, and the amount specified recoverable." Elliott on Contracts, § 1559. And the converse is equally true, viz.: That where the contract on its face shows that no good faith estimate and valuation of the damages that might result from a breach of the contract was ever made or attempted, the amount thus arbitrarily fixed without any reference to the actual damages that may be incurred, will not be recoverable as liquidated damages. In 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 259, the rule is said to be that it must be "apparent that the damages have already been the subject of actual and fair calculation and adjustment between the parties."

We conclude that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. That the contract is not enforceable as a contract for liquidated damages, and by reason of its lack of mutuality of obligation and uncertainty cannot be the basis of an action for actual damages.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

Hoefler & Morris, of San Francisco, for appellant. William H. Johnson, of San Jose, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petition for transfer and hearing in this court is denied. We think the judgment was properly reversed upon the first ground stated in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, viz. that the complaint does not state facts showing a substantial breach of the agreement. We are not satisfied of the correctness of the views expressed by the District Court of Appeal on other points, and withhold the expression of any opinion on such points. Upon a new trial the superior court will not regard as decided or as the law of the case any proposition except the one which is above stated to have our approval.

MIDWAY OIL CO. (L. A. 3968.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR—§475—STAY OF EXECUTION—INADEQUACY OF SECURITY—RELIEF—STATUTE.

Where a surety on an undertaking to stay execution of judgment pending appeal becomes insufficient, or the undertaking is inadequate as security to the full amount specified, relief can be obtained, under Code Civ. Proc. § 954, in the court from which the appeal was taken, but not where the amount is not sufficient in event of affirmation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2244; Dec. Dig. §475.]

2. EXECUTION—§59—AUTHORITY TO ISSUE—ENFORCEMENT.

The only way in which a judgment can be legally enforced under the law of California is through the process of the court by which the judgment is given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 145; Dec. Dig. §59.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR—§475—STAY OF EXECUTION—INSUFFICIENCY OF UNDERTAKING—POWER OF SUPREME COURT—STATUTES.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 942-946, 948, and 954, relative to the stay of judgments or orders pending appeal, the Supreme Court has no power, where the trial court has fixed the amount of the undertaking on stay of execution of judgment for plaintiffs pending defendant's appeal, to require that further security be given as a condition to the maintenance of the stay of execution, on the ground that, on account of the character of the land involved in the suit, being oil land from which defendants were and are extracting petroleum, the amount of the undertaking had become inadequate, since the statutes make the order of the judge of the trial court fixing the amount of the undertaking an adjudication as to the amount of security to be given to effect a permanent stay pending appeal, while they deny any inherent power in the Supreme Court to so protect plaintiffs from loss by reason of the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2244; Dec. Dig. §475.]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 475—STAY OF EXECUTION—FIXING AMOUNT OF UNDERTAKING—REVIEW OF ACTION OF TRIAL COURT.

The Supreme Court has no authority, on application by plaintiff respondents for an order requiring defendant appellant to give a further and additional undertaking as a condition to further maintenance of stay of execution pending appeal, to review the action of the trial court in fixing the amount of the undertaking to be given to stay execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 2244; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 475.]

In Bank. Action by J. W. Jameson and another against the Chanslor-Canfield Midway Oil Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed, and plaintiffs apply for an order requiring defendant to give a further and additional undertaking, in an amount to be fixed, as a condition to the further maintenance of the stay of execution. Application denied.

E. W. Camp, M. W. Reed, U. T. Clotfelter, all of Los Angeles, and Oscar Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellant. Waters & Goodcell, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Respondents obtained a judgment against the defendant in the superior court adjudging them to be the owners and entitled to the possession of an undivided three-fourths of certain lands, and substantially directing that possession thereof be delivered to them. Defendant appealed to this court from such judgment, and the appeal is now pending herein. Desiring to stay execution of the judgment pending appeal, defendant sought in the trial court an order fixing the amount of the necessary undertaking, and, according to the affidavit of respondents filed in this application, "said superior court, upon due proceedings had thereupon made an order fixing the amount of the undertaking to be given to stay such execution in the sum of $500,000, and thereupon said defendant gave such undertaking in said sum, and execution of said judgment has been and is thereby stayed." Respondents now seek from this court an order requiring appellant to give a further and additional undertaking in an amount to be fixed by us as a condition to the further maintenance of the stay.

[1] The claim is not that a surety or sureties on the undertaking already given has or have become insufficient or that such undertaking is inadequate as security to the full amount specified therein, a matter as to which relief could be obtained in the court from which the appeal was taken (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 954), but that such undertaking is in amount insufficient to protect them in the event of the affirmance of the judgment, a matter as to which relief cannot now be obtained from the lower court. It appears from such affidavit that the land consists of numerous mining claims valuable chiefly for deposits of petroleum therein, and that defendant for years prior to and ever since the entry of the judgment has been operating on the same for the production of petroleum therefrom, and has been extracting large quantities of petroleum therefrom. It is claimed that the interest of respondents in the petroleum so extracted already far exceeds in value the amount specified in said undertaking.

[2-4] It is contended by appellant that, under such circumstances, this court has no power to require further security as a condition to the maintenance of the stay of execution of the judgment. In view of our statutory provisions relative to the matter, we are satisfied that the claim of appellant in this regard is well founded.

By certain sections of our Code of Civil Procedure (sections 942, 943, 944, and 945) it is provided that judgments or orders in various specified cases cannot be stayed by an appeal except by the giving of a stay undertaking, or the deposit with a specified officer of documents or personal property ordered assigned or delivered, or the execution and delivery to the clerk of the court of a conveyance or other instrument directed to be executed. This case, the judgment being one directing the delivery of the possession of real property, comes within the provisions of section 945, which provides that the execution of such a judgment cannot be stayed—

"unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant * * * to the effect that during the possession of such property by the appellant he will not commit, or suffer to be committed, any waste thereon, and that if the judgment be affirmed, or the appeal dismissed, he will pay the value of the use and occupation of the property from the time of the appeal until the delivery of possession thereof, pursuant to the judgment or order, not exceeding the sum to be fixed by the judge of the court by which the judgment was rendered, or order made, and which must be specified in the undertaking."

By section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that:

"Whenever an appeal is perfected, as provided in the preceding section of this chapter, it stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein."

Provision is made that the sureties may be required to justify before a judge of the court below on proper notice, and that, unless they so justify when required, execution of the judgment or order is no longer stayed (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 948), and also that the judge of the court from which the appeal is taken may require a new bond as a condition to the maintenance of the stay whenever it is made to appear "that a surety or sureties upon an appeal bond from any cause has or have become insufficient, and the bond or undertaking inadequate as security for the payment of the judgment appealed from, or that the bond has been lost or destroyed" (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 954; Mersfelder v. Spring, 136 Cal. 619, 69 Cal. 251). The only way in which a judgment can be legally enforced under our law is through the process of the court by which the judgment is given. It thus appears that in such a case as the one before us the law expressly declares that the execution of the judgment shall be permanently stayed pending appeal upon the giving of the undertaking prescribed by section 945, that is, an undertaking in such sum as may "be fixed by the judge of the court by which the judgment was rendered or order made," except only when there is a failure of sureties to justify as required by section 948, or an order made by such judge for a new bond under the circumstances specified in section 954. There is no room for doubt, in view of the language of the statutory provision, that it was the intention of the Legislature to provide for a permanent stay pending appeal upon the giving of such an undertaking. The judge of the court by which the judgment was given or order made was finally to fix the amount of the undertaking, such amount as in his judgment would secure the respondent against waste and loss of the value of the use and occupation of the property. His order in this respect was to be an adjudication as to the amount of security to be given to effect a permanent stay pending appeal, described in Doudell v. Shoo, 158 Cal. 50, 109 Pac. 615, as "the statutory stay of proceedings." The law declares, in substance, that when the security so required is once given, the status, in so far as the matter of stay pending appeal is concerned, is irrevocably settled, save as it may be affected by proceedings in the trial court under section 948 or section 954. The fact that the Legislature has made provision in section 954 for the requirement by the lower court of a new bond when a surety or sureties become insufficient, or the original bond is lost or destroyed, but emphasizes what the language of sections 945 and 946, already referred to, clearly shows in this regard. It is to be doubted whether the order of the judge fixing the amount of such undertaking is appealable. If it be conceded, as claimed by respondents, that it is not appealable, we simply have a case where the Legislature has designated that officer as a tribunal to determine that question, and has provided no mode by which his conclusion may be reviewed, thus making his decision conclusive, precisely the situation that has been held to exist with relation to the justification of the sureties when excepted to under section 948. See Boyer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 401, 42 Pac. 892; Kreling v. Kreling, 116 Cal. 458, 48 Pac. 383. Certainly there is no authority in this court to review the action of the judge in such a proceeding as the one before us.

What then is the situation here? We have an appeal from a judgment as to which the law provides that, by virtue of what has been done, the giving of a proper undertaking in an amount fixed by the judge, there shall be a stay of execution pending the determination of the appeal. We are asked to make an order requiring further security of the applicant as a condition to the maintenance of the stay which has already been given by the law. This is asked upon the ground that the amount fixed by the judge as the amount of the undertaking is not sufficient to completely protect respondents in the event of affirmance. Admitting that there is no statutory authority for such action on the part of this court, it is urged that the court has the inherent power to so protect a respondent from loss by reason of the appeal. Learned counsel say that "there is no statutory denial of such power," and that a court's inherent power can sometimes be invoked in cases for which the Legislature has failed to make provision. We are clearly of the opinion that in the provisions of law we have already referred to there is a statutory denial of any such power. Those provisions in effect practically say that upon the giving of the undertaking in the amount prescribed by the judge of the lower court the execution of the judgment shall be stayed until the determination of the appeal, save in the instances specified in section 948 and 954, Code of Civil Procedure. The statute so providing, we necessarily have a "statutory denial of power" as to any tribunal to affect the stay given by the law. The situation in this regard is the same as in the cases covered by section 949, Code of Civil Procedure, in which no bond is essential to stay the judgment, but as to which it is provided that the mere "perfecting of an appeal * * * stays proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from," thus expressly commanding a stay pending appeal and completely denying power in any court to order otherwise. Has an appellate court inherent power under such circumstances to require an appellant to give such security as it deems necessary to the protection of a respondent, as a condition to a maintenance of the stay thus given by the law? Over and over again this court, as to cases so covered by section 949, has regarded the statute as entirely settling the matter of stay, and granted supersedeas without requiring security, solely because the law gave that effect to the appeal, entirely regardless of the question whether respondent might suffer injury by reason of the stay. The same is true as to cases covered, as is this, by section 945 (see Boyer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 401, 42 Pac. 892; Kreling v. Kreling, 116 Cal. 458, 48 Pac. 383), cases in which the Legislature has provided for security in an amount to be fixed by a designated tribunal, viz. the judge of the court by which the judgment was given or order made. No decision of this court has been cited that can be held to sustain the proposition that, where the statutes fully cover such a matter as the one here involved, an appellate court has inherent power to make provision contrary to the statute. The whole course of our decisions is opposed to any such view, and we do not understand learned counsel for respondents to contend to the contrary; their theory being that the matter is not one which is in fact covered by the statute. The controlling effect of the statute in such a matter was clearly recognized by this court in such cases as Cluness v. Bowen, 135 Cal. 660, 67 Pac. 1048. In that case it was said that the restriction of section 1176, Code of Civil Procedure "takes the case at bar out of the rule declared in Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493, as applicable to ordinary civil cases with respect to which there is no such restriction."

We are satisfied that it must be held that the matter as to which relief is sought from us is one fully regulated by statute in this state, and that in view of our statutory provisions we have no right to require additional security as a condition to the maintenance of a further stay of execution of judgment.

The application is denied.

HOLLAND v. McCARTHY et al. (S. F. 7107.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 30, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 27, 1916.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER — 3(3) — CONTRACT TO SELL.

A writing addressed to brokers, agreeing to sell a lot for $3,000, was not a valid contract to sell, merely authorizing the brokers at most to find a suitable purchaser, without binding the owner to make a contract of sale to any person.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF — 116(5) — REALTY BROKERS—NECESSITY FOR WRITTEN AUTHORITY TO SELL.

By Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5, an agent's authority to make a contract to sell his principal's land is not valid, unless in writing and signed by the principal.

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF — 108(4) — "MEMORANDUM"—DEED.

A deed, deposited with a third person for delivery to the grantees upon their payment of the price for the land, which recited a consideration of $10, was not a memorandum of the grantor's oral contract to sell for $3,000 sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 220; Dec. Dig. — 108(4).]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Memorandum.]

4. ESCROWS — 4 — DELIVERY — DEPOSIT FOR DELIVERY ON PAYMENT.

The deposit of a deed with a third person to be delivered to the grantees upon payment of the price for the land fixed by the grantor is not a delivery in escrow, where there was no prior or contemporaneous contract of sale of the land of which the delivery of the deed was to be the consummation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escrows, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. — 4.]

5. DEEDS — 58(4)—DELIVERY TO THIRD PERSON FOR DELIVERY ON PAYMENT—DEATH OF GRANTOR.

Where the grantor of land delivered her deed to a third person to be held until payment of the purchase money by the grantees, prior to such payment, or part thereof, the delivery was nothing but an offer or proposal which the grantor had the legal right to withdraw, her death terminating and revoking the offer and the authority of the third person to accept payment and deliver the deed, the third party being only a voluntary agent of the grantor to hold the deed subject to her order.

6. ESCROWS — 4—DELIVERY IN ESCROW.

Where, after the grantor of land deposited her deed with a third party for delivery to the grantees upon their payment of the price, the grantees consented that the third party might retain the deed until they were ready to pay, the deed was not converted into a valid escrow; no consideration having passed, and the grantees remaining without beneficial interest until payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escrows, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. — 4.]

7. GIFTS — 18(1)—GIFT INTER VIVOS—LACK OF CONSUMMATION.

Where the owner of land, to effect a gift of money, made a deed to the land and deposited it with her prospective donee under instructions to deliver to the grantees only upon payment of $3,000 for the land, which the donee should keep, previously to payment or tender of the money by the grantees, no right vested in the donee to the money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. §§ 29, 30, 32, 33; Dec. Dig. — 18(1).]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Patrick Holland, administrator of the estate of Mary A. Holland, deceased, against Julia McCarthy and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. El. Cashman, of San Francisco (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment below. The complaint states a cause of action to quiet title to a lot in San Francisco. In addition to the usual allegations it states that the defendant McCarthy has in her possession a deed signed and acknowledged by the decedent Mary A. Holland, purporting to convey the lot to the McDermotts, but that said deed had never been delivered. The prayer is for judgment quieting title, and for the delivery up of the deed for cancellation. The court gave judgment that McCarthy delivered the deed to the McDermotts, upon the payment by them to her of $3,000 to be kept by her for her own use, and declaring that when the money was paid and the deed so delivered the McDermotts would be the owners of the lot, and that the plaintiff has no interest in the lot, either as administrator of said estate or otherwise.

The facts relating to the title and to said deed may be briefly stated. On April 20, 1911, Mary A. Holland was the owner of the lot. On that date A. G. Sala, James W. Doherty, and the defendant Julia McCarthy called on her at her home. Doherty was a notary public. Mary A. Holland, in the presence of the other three persons, then signed the deed in controversy and acknowledged its execution before Doherty as notary public, who thereupon made and attached to the deed his official certificate to that effect. Mary A. Holland then handed the deed to Julia McCarthy, saying to her that it should be delivered by her to the McDermotts upon the payment of the sum of $3,100, and that when she received the $3,100 she should give $100 to Sala for his commission and keep the $3,000 for herself. The deed was in the usual form. It purported to convey the lot, in consideration of $10, to James E. McDermott and Mary McDermott, husband and wife. After this disposition of the deed Mary A. Holland signed and delivered to Sala an instrument in writing as follows:

"Apr. 20, 1911.

"To Sala & Sala: I hereby agree to sell that certain lot on the west side of Capp St. 155 feet north of 18th street. Size 30x122½ feet, at the price of $3,000. Mary A. Holland.

"Witness, A. G. Sala."

On the same day, prior to the visit to Mary A. Holland, Sala and the McDermotts had executed a contract, the material parts whereof are as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal., April 20, 1911.

"Received of Jas. and Mary McDermott the sum of three hundred and ten dollars, being deposit on account of thirty-one hundred dollars, the purchase price of the property this day sold to them and subject to the owners approval, situate * * * (then follows the description of the lot in controversy and certain provisions for sixty days time to examine title, and that the price was to be paid in cash on tender of a deed conveying good title). Sala & Sala.

"A. G. Sala.

"I, the said Jas. and Mary McDermott, hereby agree to purchase the above-described property, and to comply with all conditions herein contained. Jas. and Mary McDermott,

"By Mary McDermott,"

No money was paid as recited in said agreement, or at all, on the purchase price and sale. Neither of the McDermotts ever saw Mary A. Holland or had any agreement or communication with her, nor did they ever pay or tender the price of the lot, or any part of it, to any person. A few days after April 20, 1911, Mary McDermott called on Julia McCarthy, saw the deed in McCarthy's possession, was told by McCarthy that when the McDermotts paid the $3,000 the deed would be delivered to them, and Mary McDermott then said that they would give her (Mc-Carthy) the $3,000 when she (McCarthy) gave them the deed. Nothing further was said or done then or afterward relating to the sale or to the completion thereof. Mary A. Holland died on May 7, 1911.

[1] The instrument signed by Mary A. Holland, addressed to Sala & Sala, was not a valid contract by her to sell the lot to the McDermotts, or to any other person. Sala & Sala were real estate brokers. At most, that instrument merely authorized them to find a suitable purchaser, without binding the owner to make a sale if a purchaser were found, and we do not say that it is valid for that purpose. It did not authorize Sala & Sala to make a contract of sale for Mary A. Holland to any person. Grant v. Ede, 85 Cal. 420, 24 Pac. 890, 20 Am. St. Rep. 237; Swain v. Burnette, 89 Cal. 569, 26 Pac. 1093.

[2] From the propositions last stated, it follows that the contract between Sala & Sala and the McDermotts was not binding on Mary A. Holland. It does not even purport to bind her or to be made in her behalf, or as her contract, but even if it did, it would be invalid, so far as she is concerned, for the reason that the brokers had no authority in writing to make a contract of sale for her. An agent's authority to make a contract to sell the land of his principal is not valid unless it is in writing and signed by the principal. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5. It may be added that there is no evidence that they, or either of them, had from her even verbal authority to make such contract for her.

[3, 4] The only foundation, therefore, for the claim that the McDermotts, or Julia McCarthy, had any right or interest in the lot, or its proceeds, lies in the delivery of the deed to Julia McCarthy. This deposit, as we have seen, was not made in pursuance of any prior contract between Mary A. Holland and the McDermotts, or McCarthy, for the sale of the lot. It was not done to carry out any such contract, oral or written, for, so far as appears, none had been made. There is no evidence that any such agreement was made at the time of the deposit. The McDermotts were not present at that time, and none of those present was authorized to act or contract for them, or either of them, or assumed to do so.

The case, then, stands thus: Mary A. Holland was willing to sell the lot for cash at the price of $3,100, and, apparently, she desired to do so and make a gift of the proceeds to Julia McCarthy. She was, as we may infer, informed that the McDermotts were willing to buy the lot at that price. Thereupon she executed this deed purporting to convey it to them and deposited it with McCarthy, with instructions to her to deliver it to the grantees on payment of $3,100, and to keep the money for herself, except the $100 to be paid to Sala. The promise of the McDermotts that they would pay the price on delivery of the deed was made afterwards and to the depository only. It does not appear that it was ever communicated to Mary A. Holland, the owner, or that the depository had any authority from the owner to make any contract or agreement concerning the lot except to deliver the deed upon payment of the $3,100, none of which was ever paid. In this condition of the affair Mary A. Holland died.

The case is similar in principle to Fitch v. Bunch, 30 Cal. 212. Mrs. Fitch, the owner, deposited with Norton a deed to Bunch to be kept by Norton, pending negotiations for a sale of the land to her by Bunch and to be delivered to Bunch on the order of her agent, if the sale was agreed upon. She declined to make the sale, but an order was given to Norton, by her agent, for the delivery of the deed. Before that order was given she sued Norton to enjoin such delivery. Discussing the effect of the deposit as a valid delivery in escrow, the court said:

"Not only must there be sufficient parties, a proper subject-matter and a consideration, but the parties must have actually contracted. * * * The grantor must have sold and the grantee must have purchased the land. A proposal to sell, or a proposal to buy, though stated in writing, will not be sufficient. The minds of the parties must have met, the terms have been agreed upon, and both must have assented to the instrument as a conveyance of the land, which the grantor would then have delivered, and the grantee received, except for the agreement then made that it be delivered to a third person, to be kept until some specified condition is performed by the grantee, and thereupon to be delivered to him by such third person. The actual contract of sale on the one side, and of purchase on the other, is as essential to constitute the instrument an escrow, as that it be executed by the grantor; and until both parties have definitely assented to the contract, the instrument executed by the proposed grantor, though in form a deed, is neither a deed nor an escrow; and it makes no difference whether the instrument remains in the possession of the nominal grantor or is placed in the hands of a third person, pending the proposals for sale or purchase."

A similar question arose in Cagger v. Lansing, 43 N. Y. 550. Speaking of the effect of a deed on deposit as a memorandum satisfying the statute of frauds, the court said:

"No one will contend that a contract for the sale of land, executed by the vendor, is binding upon the purchaser, unless the contract is delivered to and accepted by the purchaser as a valid subsisting contract. A delivery in escrow cannot bind the purchaser, although he verbally promises to perform the condition. Until performance and acceptance by the purchaser, he is at liberty to abandon the contract."

In Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 144, 13 Pac. 315, it is said that an oral contract of sale is sufficient to make a deed deposited in pursuance thereof an escrow, and that the deed, deposited in pursuance of such oral contract, is a sufficient note or memorandum in writing subscribed by the party to be charged to satisfy the statute of frauds and render the contract valid and enforceable. In that case there was a prior oral contract of sale. The statement that a deed so deposited was a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute of frauds is supported by citations to Cagger v. Lansing, 57 Barb. (N. Y.) 421, and Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 214. The decision in Rutenberg v. Main does not discuss the question. The decision in Cagger v. Lansing was made by the New York Supreme Court, but in the Court of Appeals the case was reversed, and it was there decided, as indicated by the above quotation from 43 N. Y. 550, that the deed did not constitute a sufficient memorandum in writing to take the case out of the statute. But, however this may be in some cases, it cannot be successfully claimed that the deed involved in the present case is sufficient for that purpose. It was introduced in evidence and, as stated, it shows a consideration of only $10. Therefore, instead of being a memorandum of the contract on which defendants rely, it is utterly inconsistent therewith. No case has been cited, and we have found none where the deposit of a deed with a third person to be delivered to the grantee only upon payment of the price fixed by the grantor, has been sustained as an escrow, where there was no prior or contemporaneous contract of sale of which the delivery of the deed was to be the consummation.

[5, 6] We are not here concerned with the case of deeds put in escrow for subsequent delivery upon the happening of a future event with regard to which the grantee has no causative function and in which the delivery is absolute, the grantor retaining no right of recall or revocation, and where the transaction is not to consummate a contract of sale, but for the purpose of effecting a gift. Such transactions are governed by a different rule, and a contract is not an essential part thereof. Here no right to revoke or recall was expressed as a condition at the time the deed was handed to Julia McCarthy. But, as no part of the consideration was paid, this was not necessary. Mary A. Holland had the right to recall the deed at any time before the grantees paid the money specified. Until that event, Julia McCarthy was nothing more than a voluntary agent of the grantor to hold the deed subject to her order. Only upon the payment of the price or some part thereof would the grantees have a beneficial interest sufficient to make delivery irrevocable. Prior to such payment the delivery was nothing but an offer or proposal which the grantor had the legal right to withdraw. Her death terminated and revoked the offer and the authority of Julia McCarthy as her agent subsequently to accept the money and deliver the deed. Seibel v. Higham, 216 Mo. 132, 115 S. W. 987, 129 Am. St. Rep. 502. At the time of her death she had not parted with the title nor bound herself to do so, and it at once descended to and vested in her heirs free from any claims of the defendants. The consent of the McDermotts, after its deposit, that Julia McCarthy might retain the deed until they were ready to pay the money, did not convert the deed into a valid escrow, for no consideration passed and they remained, as before, without beneficial interest, and with nothing more than an unaccepted offer awaiting their acceptance. No interest could vest in them sufficient to make the escrow beyond recall without payment by them of some consideration.

[7] The transaction did not vest in Julia McCarthy any right to the $3,000. It was to be paid by the McDermotts. Inasmuch as the transaction was inchoate and vested in the McDermotts no right until they paid or tendered the money, it necessarily follows that no right vested in the defendant McCarthy. There was, at best, nothing more in her favor than a mere intention on the part of the decedent to give her the money in the event that it was paid, which intent she did not carry out in her lifetime. Our conclusion is that the court erred in giving the judgment appealed from, and that, upon the facts disclosed by the evidence, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐79(1)—JUDGMENTS APPEALABLE.

Judgment, after plaintiff's refusal to amend when demurrers to the complaint were sustained, in favor of three defendants in suit to avoid a deed under which they claimed, but not affecting their mortgagee, who was made a party, is nevertheless a final judgment as to them and appealable.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⇐29(2)—APPOINTMENT—VALIDITY.

Bill by one heir attacking appointment of administrator is demurrable if it recites application by another heir for appointment of the appointee.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⇐29(2)—APPOINTMENT—VALIDITY.

Bill by one heir, attacking appointment of administrator, showing that deceased intestate was a nonresident, and that her husband nominated the administrator, does not reveal any right to attack that appointment collaterally by suit to avoid administrator's deed for minor irregularities in signatures to application for appointment, since it shows the jurisdiction and appointment and actual action at the court's direction, and is, as against collateral attack, conclusive as to due appointment.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Suit by Malcolm Baxter, Jr., against Charles A. Boege, wife, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals, and defendants move to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied, and judgment affirmed.

A. W. Ashburn, of Los Angeles, and H. C. Head, of Santa Ana, for appellant. Williams & Rutan, R. Y. Williams, and A. W. Rutan, all of Santa Ana, and F. C. Spencer, of Anaheim, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff, as assignee of the heirs of Christina E. Romer, brought a suit in equity to avoid the effect of a deed by which the defendant Chester Spencer, as administrator of the said Christina E. Romer's estate, sought to convey certain real property of the said estate to one Emma M. Hunter. Respondents Charles A. and Louise Callow Boege and George Vandenberg are claimants to the title of Emma M. Hunter under subsequent conveyances. All of the said respondents demurred to plaintiff's amended complaint. Their demurrers were sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered accordingly against him and in favor of the three respondents. This judgment was that plaintiff take nothing as against respondents; that respondents be awarded costs; and that as to them the action be dismissed. The defendant Chester Spencer filed a demurrer to the amended complaint, but the record reveals no action thereon by the court. Answers were filed by German-American Bank, Frank L. Eastman, and Minnie H. Eastman. The bank asserted a lien upon the property as mortgagee of Emma M. Hunter, and the Eastmans based their claim of interest in the property upon a mortgage in their favor by the Boeges.

[1] Plaintiff has appealed from the judgment, and respondents have moved to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that no final judgment has been entered, and that therefore the attempted appeal is not from an appealable judgment. We are of the opinion that the motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied. Respondents insist that, since no judgment will be regarded as final unless all necessary issues of law and fact have been determined and the case completely disposed of (citing Freeman on Judgments [4th Ed.] § 34), plaintiff can have no right of appeal until all of the defendants shall have suffered some sort of judgment against them or in their favor. There is no question of the correctness of the rule announced by Judge Freeman, but it does not apply to this case. Appellant cites Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works v. Glen's Falls Ins. Co., 98 Cal. 557, 33 Pac. 633, which was an action on a contract, in which defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint, which plaintiff answered. Judgment was entered upon the issues raised by the cross-complaint and the answer thereto, which were tried first. The other issues in the case being undisposed of, this court held that the judgment upon the issues raised by the cross-complaint and the answer thereto was not an appealable final judgment. In the opinion in that case it was said:

"The judgment or decree of December 19, 1890, denying to defendant the relief demanded in what is termed its 'cross-complaint,' was not a final judgment, and the attempted separate appeal therefrom must be dismissed. There can be but one final judgment in an action, and that is one which in effect ends the suit in the court in which it is entered, and finally determines the rights of the parties in relation to the matter in controversy."

It will appear at a glance that the question there presented was not like the one before us here. In that case there were but two parties to the action, and it was, of course, necessary to determine all of the matters in litigation between them. In the case at bar the controversy between the plaintiff and the respondents was adjudicated and determined upon issues of law, and it does not necessarily follow that because the matters between plaintiff and defendants, other than these respondents, remain undetermined, respondents must therefore await trial of all issues involved between plaintiff and all other defendants before any final judgment may be entered and an appeal from it taken. In Nolan v. Smith, 137 Cal. 360, 70 Pac. 166, the action was against Smith, a justice of the peace, and the two sureties on his official bond. The court sustained a demurrer of the sureties to the complaint and entered a judgment in their favor for costs. The demurrer of Smith was overruled, and the action was still pending against him. The appeal of plaintiff from the judgment in favor of the two sureties was dismissed upon the ground that the judgment was not final because all of the issues of fact necessary to be adjudged had not been determined. In that case the asserted liability of the defendants was joint and several and it was held that only one final judgment might be given in the action. In other words, the rule is that any set of parties whose interests are identical must have the controversy as to them settled before any final judgment may be entered. No given set of parties may try the case piecemeal, but separate parties, if the court in its discretion so directs, may litigate their controversies separately, and may proceed to final judgment without waiting for judgments as to other parties. Section 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows:

"In an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper."

In Anglo-California Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 753, 96 Pac. 803, it appeared that the superior court had made an order that certain money held by plaintiff be paid to the receiver of the California Safe Deposit &

Trust Company. It was contended that the order was not appealable because it failed to consider the rights of certain interveners and was not, therefore, final. The court said:

"The rule invoked is the one applied in Nolan v. Smith, 137 Cal. 360 [70 Pac. 166], to the effect that a judgment is not a final judgment within the meaning of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to appeals, unless it be one which finally disposes of the rights of all the parties to the action in relation to the matter in controversy, and thus, in effect, ends the proceeding in the court in which it is entered. * * * The whole controversy was regarding the present disposition of the money in the possession of plaintiff. The receiver claims that it should be forthwith delivered to him by plaintiff, the interveners claim that $3,349.77 thereof should be paid to them by plaintiff, and sought an order requiring such payment, and the plaintiff claimed that it should not be required to deliver up the money to the receiver in the face of the adverse claim made by the interveners, until the question of ownership had been determined. The order made purported to dispose of this whole controversy by decreeing immediate payment by plaintiff of the whole amount to the receiver, and, in effect, ended in the superior court the particular proceeding under consideration. We are satisfied that it must be held to be an adjudication of the subject-matter of the controversy as to all of the parties thereto."

See, also, Hildebrand v. Superior Court, 159 Pac. 147.

The court has power to render a several judgment by default against one of two joint tort-feasors and allow the action to proceed against the other. Cole v. Roebeling Construction Co., 156 Cal. 443, 105 Pac. 255.

The judgment in the case at bar in favor of respondents is not inextricably connected with the claims of the mortgagees, nor with the asserted delinquencies of Chester Spencer. If plaintiff has failed in his attempt to set aside the deeds to the respondents, the Boeges and Vandenberg, it makes no difference who assert rights as mortgagees of their interest. It is our opinion, therefore, that the judgment entered after default of plaintiff (who declined to amend his complaint after the sustaining of the demurrer by the court), is a final judgment from which an appeal will lie, and that the motion of respondents to dismiss the appeal herein should be denied.

[2] We now come to the discussion of the demurrers. The plaintiff's bill is very elaborate. It contains three counts, in which plaintiff as representative of the heirs of Christina E. Romer, deceased, attacks the validity of the title of respondents to certain land in Orange county acquired by proceedings taken in accordance with sections 1597-1607, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is averred that Chester Spencer, assuming to act as administrator of the estate of Romer, executed the conveyance of said property to Emma M. Hunter. In the first count the death of Mrs. Romer in New York in 1910 is pleaded. It is further averred that she left the property here in dispute, and that it was of her separate estate; that for more than two years prior to her death she had been mentally incompetent; that plaintiff has for many years resided in New York and never has lived in California; that proceedings were had in Orange county, resulting in the making of an order by the court purporting to appoint Chester Spencer administrator of the estate of Christina E. Romer; that the proceedings and order were void because: (1) The petition for letters of administration was not signed by Spencer or his attorney; and because (2) the notice of hearing recited that William H. Romer, the husband of Christina E. Romer, had applied for the issuance of letters to himself, whereas, in truth, he had asked that letters be issued to Chester Spencer; that plaintiff and his assignors had no actual notice of the proceeding; that Chester Spencer assumed to qualify and act as administrator; that thereafter an order was made by the court, directing the administrator to convey the land to Mrs. Hunter; and that respondents claim title as successors of said grantee.

The second count contains averments of a conspiracy between Spencer, his attorney, and Emma M. Hunter to present a petition to the court, praying for an order authorizing the administrator to convey the land to said Emma M. Hunter, and that pursuant to said conspiracy Mrs. Hunter filed such a petition, setting forth certain untrue allegations, among them being a false statement that Mrs. Romer had contracted to sell the property to her. Other facts are alleged which need not be set out in detail, and it is averred that the administrator entered his appearance, waived notice, and joined in the fraudulent petition. It is alleged that plaintiff was ignorant of the conspiracy and of the fraudulent acts done and committed in furtherance thereof until a few days prior to the commencement of the action, and that he had no knowledge of the application for a conveyance until the same time, antedating the filing of his bill in equity by a few days.

The third count pleads that defendants had knowledge sufficient to put prudent persons upon inquiry regarding the correctness of the proceedings in probate and the authority of the administrator to execute the conveyance; that actual knowledge of the facts might have been acquired by defendants by the exercise of due diligence on their part; that the alleged copy of the contract of sale which was attached to Hunter's petition was of a document calculated to arouse suspicion regarding its genuineness in the mind of any person who might read it; that no original nor purported original contract was produced; that F. C. Spencer acted as attorney for both the administrator and Hunter; that no appraisal of the property was had at the time of the hearing of the petition; and that if such appraisal had been made it would have convinced the court that Mrs. Hunter obtained an unconscionable advantage by the enforcement of the supposed contract. The demurrers were properly sustained. One great fault of the bill is that it lacks equity in this, namely, that plaintiff attacks the appointment of Spencer as administrator; but pleads that such appointment was upon the recommendation of William H. Romer, one of the heirs at law, and one of his assignors. But there are other reasons why the demurrer should have been sustained.

[3] This action is a collateral attack upon the title of respondents. It is not denied that deceased was a nonresident of California; that she died intestate; that William H. Romer was her surviving husband, who had the right to nominate an administrator of her estate; and that the court did appoint his nominee. In such an attack as this the plaintiff is in no position to take advantage of informalities in the issuance of letters. The appointment of Spencer is attacked because the petition for letters was not signed by the "applicant," but by his nominator, William H. Romer, and because the notice stated that Romer had prayed for issuance of letters to himself. But the jurisdiction is pleaded, and the issuance of letters to Chester Spencer is alleged, as well as facts showing that he acted in the capacity of administrator under the direction of the court. As against collateral attack these facts, set up by the pleading itself, are conclusive of Spencer's due authority. Ganahl v. Soher, 68 Cal. 95, 8 Pac. 650; Dennis v. Bint, 122 Cal. 39, 54 Pac. 378, 68 Am. St. Rep. 17; Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 318, 86 Pac. 183, 90 Pac. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105. This court has recently held that where a guardian was possessed of letters issued under a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, such judgment may not be collaterally attacked. Fresno Estate Co. v. Fiske (Fiske v. Fresno Estate Co.) 157 Pac. 1127. The same rule applies to a judgment, directing the conveyance of real property by an administrator acting under the direction of the superior court exercising its probate jurisdiction after letters have been issued to him. It has been held that the decree appointing an administrator may not be collaterally attacked even though it appear that he failed to comply with the requirements of the statute with reference to his bond. Abrook v. Ellis, 6 Cal. App. 451, 454, 92 Pac. 396.

In any view of the case there was not sufficient allegation of the purchase by Mr. and Mrs. Boege with knowledge, actual or constructive, of the fraud. The same may be said with reference to the averments concerning George Vandenberg. The learned judge of the superior court who tried the case, in rendering his decision, spoke of this phase of the pleading in part as follows:

"There is absolutely nothing alleged in the complaint to show that the Boeges acted in anything except the utmost good faith in this transaction, or that there was anything within their knowledge to put them upon inquiry as to the alleged fraudulent conspiracy. Presumably before purchasing they caused an examination to be made into the title of the property which they contemplated buying; if so, they found an apparently valid decree, directing the administrator to convey this property to Emma M. Hunter in specific performance of the contract under which she claimed that right; the record disclosed absolutely nothing to indicate that there had been a fraud practiced on the court. To be sure, the record showed that Chester Spencer, as administrator, joined with Emma M. Hunter in her petition for specific performance instead of taking the attitude of an adversary, but he might with propriety have made the application himself (section 1598, C. C. P.), or, if he believed it to be for the best interest of the estate, he might with no seeming impropriety join in the petition for specific performance. If again there was no adversary position between Emma M. Hunter and the administrator in this matter, the mere fact that F. C. Spencer acted as attorney for both in what appeared to be a friendly proceeding was not indicative of any fraud, however questionable it may have been as a matter of legal ethics. In any event, an examination of the record would show that all of these matters were before the probate court at the time the petition for specific performance was heard, and the decree of that court was an adjudication of the regularity of the proceeding and all matters antecedent thereto. Under these circumstances, the Boeges must be held to be purchasers for value in good faith, and without notice of any infirmity of title of Emma M. Hunter, their grantor."

No other matters discussed in the briefs require comment.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. The judgment is affirmed.

HALSTED et al. v. FIRST SAV. BANK
et al. (S. F. 7728.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 460(4)—STAY—STATUTE—JUDGMENT AGAINST EXECUTOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 949, providing that, in cases not provided for in sections 942, 943, 944, and 945, the perfecting of an appeal stays proceedings in the court below on the judgment and order appealed from, in an action by executors against an individual and a bank to recover a savings deposit, so far as judgment for the individual against the bank for the amount of the deposit was one against the executors, proceedings thereon in the court below were stayed, by the executors' duly perfected appeal, without any stay bond.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 460(2) — STAY — STATUTES.

The provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 942, 943, 944, and 945, relative to stay of proceedings below on a judgment and order appealed from by perfecting an appeal, apply only where appellant has money or other property in his possession or under his control which has been adjudged to belong to respondent, or where appellant has been directed to do some act for respondent's benefit.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 1224 — EFFECT — STAY OF PROCEEDINGS—UNNECESSARY STAY BOND—CONSIDERATION.

If there is no provision of law requiring a stay bond on appellants' part, as a condition precedent to the stay of proceedings in the court below on the judgment appealed from, any stay bond given by them is without consideration and unenforceable.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 460(2) — STAY — STATUTE.

In an action by executors against an individual and a bank to recover a deposit, if the bank had appealed from judgment for the individual for the amount of the deposit, it could have stayed enforcement of the judgment pending its appeal only by giving the stay bond provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 942.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 485(2) — STAY OF EXECUTION—STATUTES.

In view of the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 942, 943, 944, 945, and 949, relative to stay of proceedings in the court below by appeal, in an action by executors against an individual and a bank to recover a deposit standing in the name of the individual, but alleged to belong to executors' decedent, the executors' appeal did not stay enforcement of the individual's judgment against the bank for the amount of the deposit.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR 479(1) — SUPERSEDEAS—CIRCUMSTANCES CALLING FOR ISSUANCE.

In an action by executors against an individual and a bank to recover a deposit standing in the individual's name, but alleged to belong to the executors' decedent, where the individual recovered judgment against the bank, for the deposit, and the executors appeal, applying for supersedeas, alleging that the successful defendant has no means, and if the money is collected from the bank by her they will be unable to recover it from her, should they ultimately prevail, the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its inherent power, will grant a writ of supersedeas as prayed, provided the executors file bond in double the amount of the judgment.

In Bank. Action by the special administrator of the estate of James D. Halsted against the First Savings Bank and Anna N. Collins, wherein James D. Halsted and John Yule, as executors of the last will and testament of decedent, were substituted as plaintiffs. There was a judgment for defendant Collins against defendant Bank, and the executors appealed, and apply for a writ of supersedeas to restrain the enforcement of the judgment pending their appeal. Writ ordered to issue as prayed on condition that the executors file a bond.

O'Neill & O'Neill and Chapman & Trefethen, all of Oakland, for appellants. Harry E. Leach and Abe P. Leach, both of Oakland, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an application by the appellants for a writ of superseas to restrain the enforcement of a judgment in favor of defendant Anna N. Collins (respondent here) pending their appeal therefrom. This relief is sought on the ground that their duly perfected appeal ipso facto stays the enforcement of the judgment in the respect in which it is about to be enforced, without the giving by them of any bond to stay proceedings. There is no dispute as to the material facts.

The special administrator of the estate of James M. Halsted, deceased, commenced an action in the superior court of Alameda county against the defendants, alleging in his complaint that at the time of his death deceased had a large amount of money on deposit with defendant bank, in the form of a savings bank deposit, which, although standing in the name of defendant Anna N. Collins, was the property of deceased. He alleged that said Collins had wrongfully caused the deposit to be changed from the joint name of the two to her own individual name. He further alleged that said Collins was about to withdraw said deposit and appropriate the same to her own use; that she is without means, and if permitted to draw said money will depart from the state. He asked judgment against the bank for the amount; that said Collins be adjudged to have no interest in said deposit; that an order be made restraining her from withdrawing said money; and that the bank be restrained from paying the same to her. The executors of the will of deceased were subsequently substituted as plaintiffs in such action. Defendant Collins filed an answer and cross-complaint. In her cross-complaint she alleged that all of said money was her own property, and that she was entitled to the same. She asked that the temporary restraining order be dissolved; that plaintiffs take nothing by their action; that it be decreed that the property is her sole and separate property; and that the bank be ordered to pay the same to her. Plaintiffs answered this cross-complaint. The action was tried by the court, defendant bank not appearing. The findings of the court were in favor of defendant Collins, and on these findings judgment was entered that the temporary restraining order be dissolved; that said defendant "do have and recover of and from the defendant First Savings Bank the sum" of $11,379.38, with interest; that neither plaintiffs nor the estate of James M. Halsted have any interest in said money; and that defendant Collins recover her costs from plaintiffs. Plaintiffs duly appealed from said judgment, "and from the whole" thereof, and such appeal is still pending. They gave the ordinary $300 bond for costs, etc., which was formerly necessary to perfect an appeal, but gave no stay bond. No appeal has been taken by defendant bank. Defendant Collins is proceeding to enforce her judgment for the recovery of the money from the bank, and has taken out a writ of execution to that end, which the sheriff of the county is about to enforce.

In brief, then, the situation is simply this: Defendant bank owes this money either to plaintiffs or defendant Collins. In an action to which all of these are parties, it has been adjudged that plaintiffs (appellants) have no interest therein; that defendant Collins (respondent) is the owner and entitled to the possession of all thereof; and that she recover all of the same from the bank. The bank is entirely neutral in the matter, and has not appealed. Plaintiffs have appealed. In view of our statutes relative to appeals, does the appeal by plaintiffs stay the enforcement of her judgment for the money by defendant Collins against the bank?

[1] By virtue of section 949, Code of Civil Procedure, which substantially provides that, except in certain specified cases of which this is not one, in cases not provided for in sections 942, 943, 944, and 945, Code of Civil Procedure, the perfecting of an appeal stays proceedings in the court below upon the judgment and order appealed from, it must be conceded that, in so far as the judgment here involved is one against the appellants, proceedings therein in the court below are stayed by the appeal duly perfected, without any stay bond. As appears from what has been said, there is no judgment for the payment by appellants of any money, appellants have no money or other property in their possession which has been adjudged to belong to respondent, and they are not directed by the judgment to do any act for the benefit of respondent, Collins.

[2. 3] It must now be taken as absolutely settled by our decisions that the provisions of sections 942, 943, 944, and 945 apply only where the appellant has money or other property in his possession or under his control which has been adjudged by the lower court to belong to the respondent, or where the appellant has been directed to do some act for the benefit of the respondent. See Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 Pac. 696; Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 33, 26 Pac. 617; Estate of Schedel, 69 Cal. 241, 10 Pac. 334; Born v. Horstmann, 80 Cal. 452, 22 Pac. 169, 338, 5 L. R. A. 577; McCallion v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 98 Cal. 442, 33 Pac. 329; Rohrbacker v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 633, 78 Pac. 22. Therefore there is no provision of law requiring a stay bond on the part of appellants as a condition precedent to the staying of proceedings in the court below upon the judgment appealed from, in so far as the judgment is against them, i. e., requires them to do something or permits something to be done as to them, and the statute itself stays execution of the judgment in this regard. Any stay bond given by them under such circumstances would be without consideration, and for that reason unenforceable. McCallion v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., supra.

[4, 5] The question here, however, is whether the enforcement of that portion of the judgment which is a judgment directing the payment of money by defendant First Savings Bank to respondent Collins, a judgment for Collins against such bank for such money, is stayed by the appeal of appellants. If the bank had appealed therefrom, it could have stayed enforcement of the judgment against it pending such appeal only by giving the stay bond provided by section 942, Code of Civil Procedure. We have here, in part, a simple judgment for the payment of money to the respondent by a party other than the appellants. Said section 942 provides that, "if the appeal be from a judgment or order directing the payment of money, it does not stay the execution of the judgment or order, unless" an undertaking be given to secure to the judgment creditor the fruits of the judgment in the event of its affirmance or the dismissal of the appeal. Of course, it is obvious that this portion of the judgment was given solely because of the determination by the trial court of the controversy between appellants and respondent in favor of respondent, a controversy in which the First Savings Bank in fact remained neutral. It may be conceded that this portion of the judgment is so plainly the result of the determination in favor of respondent against appellants that this court has the power on the appeal by the plaintiffs alone to reverse the whole judgment, including the portion against the bank, if it concludes that the appellants should prevail as against the respondent. See Hamilton et al. v. Prescott, 73 Tex. 565, 11 S. W. 548; Whalen v. Smith, 163 Cal. 360, 125 Pac. 904, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1319. It does not follow that the mere money judgment in favor of one defendant against the other defendant is a judgment against appellants. And while we have the power, in view of all the circumstances apparent from the record, and the broad power of an appellate court in the event of substantial error in the trial court to so frame its order of reversal as to best promote the doing of substantial justice as to all the parties, to reverse the whole judgment, we are unable to see any good ground upon which it may be held that the portion of the judgment which awards to respondent a recovery against the bank is in any sense a judgment against the appellants. No enforcement of the judgment as against appellants is being sought, and, of course, none could be had pending the appeal. The stay given by the statute in the event of appeal is effectual only as to the judgment in so far as it affects the appellant, requires him to do something, or permits something to be done as to him. We are constrained to hold that, in view of the provisions of our

Code of Civil Procedure, the appeal by the plaintiffs in the action does not stay the enforcement of respondent's money judgment against the bank.

We are thus brought to the question whether the circumstances are such as to warrant us in granting a writ of supersedeas, upon proper terms, in the exercise of the inherent power of an appellate court to give such relief under certain circumstances. In this connection it was said in Southern Pacific Co. v. Superior Court, 167 Cal. 250, 139 Pac. 69, that:

Such power exists "in cases where the writ is necessary to preserve the status quo so that the rights involved in an appeal, when determined by the appellate court, may not be lost or prejudiced by reason of the intervening execution of the judgment or order appealed from, in cases where the statute regulating a stay of proceedings on appeal makes no provisions for such stay in the particular case."

See, also, Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493.

[6] As we have seen, the statute makes no provision for a stay in such a case as this. It is said in 3 Corpus Juris, p. 1290, that:

"As a rule a supersedeas or stay should be granted, if the court has power to grant it, whenever it appears that * * * it is reasonably necessary to protect appellant or plaintiff in error from irreparable or serious injury in case of a reversal, and it does not appear that appellee or defendant in error will sustain irreparable or disproportionate injury in case of affirmance."

From what we have said it is apparent that this action was not an ordinary action for the recovery of money. So far as plaintiffs and defendant Collins were concerned, it was, in substance and effect, an equitable action between conflicting claimants as to a specific fund, a contest between them in which the depository of the fund, the bank, was entirely neutral. There is nothing in the pleadings or elsewhere to indicate that the bank was not entirely willing at any time to pay the money to the person legally entitled to it upon a proper demand, or that there was any reason for making the bank a party except that it was the depository. What we have said sufficiently indicates the real nature and character of the action. But the trial court gave a simple money judgment in favor of defendant Collins against the defendant bank, the enforcement of which, as we have seen, is not stayed by the appeal of plaintiffs. It is substantially alleged that defendant Collins has no means, and that, if this money is collected by her plaintiffs will not be able to recover the same from her in the event that they ultimately prevail. It may be that, in the event that plaintiffs ultimately prevail, they could enforce their claim against the bank, notwithstanding that defendant Collins' judgment against it had been enforced in the meantime. That, however, is something that cannot here be foretold with any degree of certainty. Having paid the money once, the bank would naturally claim that it was free from further liability. It may fairly be assumed that the practical difficulties in the way of the recovery and enforcement of any judgment by appellants against the bank would be materially increased if, pending this appeal, the bank should be compelled to pay the amount to Collins. Instead of being confronted by a party absolutely neutral in fact and ready to pay without question either plaintiffs or Collins, as might be determined in the action, plaintiffs would find in the bank an actively hostile party, disputing their claim on every possible theory, and possibly upon some theory that would preclude a recovery altogether. We think that it may fairly be assumed that the preservation of the status quo is reasonably necessary to protect the plaintiffs from serious injury in the event of a reversal. If proper security be given defendant Collins, we can conceive of no possible way in which any of her substantial rights can be prejudiced by a stay pending appeal, and it is extremely desirable both for plaintiffs and the bank that the present status shall be preserved until the final determination of this action. We are of the opinion that we are warranted in view of the peculiar circumstances of this case, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, in granting a writ of supersedeas upon the giving by appellants of a proper bond to secure to respondent Collins the fruits of her judgment against the bank in the event that the same be affirmed or the appeal dismissed.

It is ordered that a writ of supersedeas issue as prayed for herein, provided that within ten days the appellants file herein a good and sufficient bond in double the amount named in the judgment of defendant Collins against the bank, approved by a judge of the superior court of the county of Alameda, to the effect that, if the judgment appealed from be affirmed or the appeal dismissed, and the First Savings Bank does not forthwith pay to respondent the full amount of her judgment against the bank, the appellants and their sureties will pay to said respondent the whole amount then due on such judgment against the bank, or such portion thereof as may be necessary, in addition to such amount as may be paid by the bank, to give to said respondent the full amount then due on her judgment.

In re BAIRD'S ESTATE. (S. F. 7789.)

Rehearing Denied Dec. 1, 1916.)

1. JURY $\hookrightarrow$ 19(7) — RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL — PROBATE PROCEEDINGS.

The right to jury trial in probate proceedings was not given by common law.

2. JURY $\hookrightarrow$ 19(7) — RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL — PROBATE PROCEEDINGS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1716, providing that all fact issues in probate proceedings must be tried in accordance with the provisions of sections 1312-1318, inclusive, and section 1312, providing for jury trial as to fact issues in will contests, in any probate proceeding in which section 1312 authorizes formation of issues, either party, at his option, is entitled to jury trial.

3. JURY $\hookrightarrow$ 19(7) — RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL — PROBATE PROCEEDINGS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1716, provides that all issues of fact in probate proceedings must be tried in conformity with requirements of sections 1312-1318, inclusive, which relate to jury trial of fact issues as to validity of wills. Section 1658 provides that interested persons may apply for partial distribution. Section 1659 provides for notice thereof to all interested persons, and section 1660 provides for contest of application. Held, that formation of issues on trial of application for partial distribution is authorized, so that either party may, on demand, have jury trial.

4. BASTARDS $\hookrightarrow$ 13—PARENTAGE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In determining the right to a distributive share in a decedent's estate, a physician attendant on birth of illegitimate child should have been permitted to testify that, just after birth, while he was filling out the certificate, deceased admitted the child to be his.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. §§ 16, 17; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 13.]

5. BASTARDS $\hookrightarrow$ 13—PARENTAGE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Statements of deceased that he was the father of applicant for partial distribution, made to servants at the home of the mother, are admissible to show acknowledgment of parentage.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 1046(1)—SCOPE.

Where error is so grave as the unauthorized substitution of the court for a jury, the court on appeal cannot, as a general rule, deny that justice miscarried.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Application by David J. Baird, Jr., for partial distribution of the estate of David J. Baird. From a judgment denying the application, he appeals. Reversed.

C. M. Fickert and E. A. Cunha, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Mastick & Partridge and Karl C. Partridge, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appellant, David J. Baird, Jr., claiming to be the legitimate and only child of the decedent and his only heir, applied for partial distribution to him of the estate. His application was denied. He appeals from the judgment.

The petition avers that the applicant, who is a minor, was the illegitimate child of said decedent and one Lydia M. Valencia, to whom decedent was never married, and that the decedent, who was unmarried, adopted said child as his own lawful issue in the manner specified in section 230 of the Civil Code. Opposition to this claim was made by the mother, brothers, and sister of the decedent, who denied all the facts relating to such adoption. The court made findings declaring: (1) That the decedent was not the father of the applicant; (2) that the decedent did not publicly acknowledge the said applicant as his own child; and (3) that the decedent did not receive the applicant into his family, nor otherwise treat the applicant as if it were his legitimate child. In due time the appellant, in writing, regularly demanded a trial by jury. This demand the court below refused. This, it is claimed, was a fatal error. The basis of the claim that the appellant was entitled, as a matter of right, to a jury trial is found in sections 1716 and 1717 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The provision of section 1716 is that:

"All issues of fact joined in probate proceedings must be tried in conformity with the requirements of article two, chapter two, of this title."

That of section 1717 is:

"If, on written demand, a jury is called by either party, and the issues are not sufficiently made up by the written pleadings on file, the court, on due notice to the opposite party, must settle and frame the issues to be tried. * * * together with the evidence of each party, to the jury, on which they must render a verdict."

[1, 2] It will be observed that section 1717 does not grant the right to demand a trial by jury, but merely prescribes the procedure when such right exists and is exercised, or, in any case when a jury is allowed on such demand, whether of right or of grace. The right to demand a trial by jury in probate proceedings was not given by the common law. Estate of Moore, 72 Cal. 338, 13 Pac. 880. It exists in this state only where it is given by some statute. Estate of Dolbeer, 153 Cal. 657, 96 Pac. 266, 15 Ann. Cas. 207. The right, in cases of the class here involved, if it exists, is given by section 1716 above quoted, referring to article 2, chapter 2, title 11, Code of Civil Procedure. The said article 2 consists of sections 1312 to 1318, inclusive, and relates to pleadings and practice in will contests. Section 1312, after certain requirements relating to the pleadings in such cases provides for the trial as follows:

"Any issues of fact thus raised, involving: 1. The competency of the decedent to make a last will and testament; 2. The freedom of the decedent at the time of the execution of the will from duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence; 3. The due execution and attestation of the will by the decedent or subscribing witness, or, 4. Any other questions substantially affecting the validity of the will; must, on request of either party in writing (filed at least ten days prior to the day set for the hearing), be tried by a jury. If no jury is demanded, the court must try and determine the issues joined."

The question of the right to a jury trial in probate proceedings, in cases other than will contests, under sections 1716 and 1312, has been considered by this court in several cases. Many proceedings are authorized by the title of the Code relating to administration of estates. The question whether or not a jury trial is a matter of right in any of them depends upon the nature of the proceeding. In Estate of Moore, supra, it was held by Department 1 that these sections did not confer the right to a jury trial of issues arising upon the settlement of an account. In Estate of Sanderson, 74 Cal. 199, 15 Pac. 753, the court, in bank, was unanimous in the same conclusion. The Dolbeer Case, above cited, was a proceeding to contest a will instituted after it had been admitted to probate upon a regular contest thereof. It was, in substance, decided that the language of section 1330 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that in such cases if the original probate had been granted without a contest, either party could demand a jury for the trial of the second contest, was, in effect and by implication, a declaration that, if there had been a contest upon which the original probate was granted, there should be no right to a jury trial upon a contest after such probate, and, accordingly, that in that case the right did not exist. In Estate of Land, 166 Cal. 541, 137 Pac. 246, the court below, before proceeding with the trial of the merits of the original contest of the will of Land, had required the contestant to make preliminary proof that he had an interest in the matter sufficient to entitle him to maintain such contest, and had denied his demand for a jury to try the question of his interest. This court decided that the right to a jury trial, under section 1312, extended only to the issues therein specifically described, that is, to those affecting the execution or validity of the will, and that, as the description therein did not include the question whether or not the contestant was a "person interested," the right to a jury trial of that question was not given by the section, and therefore did not exist. In giving its reasons for denying the right of trial by jury upon a contested account, the court, in Estate of Moore, supra, said:

"We think the courts would have little difficulty in confining the operation of these sections to those cases in which the Code has expressly authorized issues of fact to be framed. Without such a provision, under the decisions, parties to a contest in the probate court would never be entitled to a jury trial." 72 Cal. 340, 13 Pac. 883.

In Estate of Sanderson, supra, the court further said that if there are proceedings, other than will contests, in which, under the aforesaid section, issues of fact must be submitted to a jury on due demand, "it would seem that they must be such, the verdict whereon would be determinative of an order or judgment to be entered by the court, and not merely determinative of subordinate facts which may be considered by the court in connection with other facts in making its order or judgment." 74 Cal. 209, 15 Pac. 758. The court there pointed out that in the superior court the exceptions to the account need not embrace all the matters into which the court below must inquire, that it has power to investigate any and all matters involved in the account of its own motion, and therefore that the issues framed upon exceptions would not cover all the matters which the trial court could determine, and also the well-known fact that the settlement of an account is not a matter which a jury can ordinarily intelligently determine. These statements point out the rule to be followed in determining whether or not, in any particular probate proceeding, the right to a jury trial is given by these sections. The test stated in Estate of Sanderson would authorize a jury in the present case. The issues necessary to be determined, upon the question of the right of the applicant to inherit the estate of the decedent, are those specifically mentioned in the foregoing statement of findings made by the court. If these issues were all decided in favor of the applicant, the judgment of the court, declaring him entitled, would necessarily follow. They were such as would be "determinative of an order or judgment to be entered by the court." More recent decisions, however, put more stress upon the rule above quoted from the Estate of Moore. In Carter v. Waste, 159 Cal. 23, 112 Pac. 727, the question arose whether the right to move for a new trial was given in a proceeding for final distribution of the decedent's estate under these sections, particularly the clause of section 1717, giving the right to move for a new trial after a trial of the issues joined in a probate proceeding, in connection with the clause of section 1716, providing that issues of fact joined "must be tried in conformity with the requirements of article 2" of that title. The provisions relating to the right to move for a new trial and those upon the right to a trial by jury, under these sections, are similar; the two propositions are cognate, and are governed by the same general principles. In the case last cited the court said that a careful consideration of the California cases on the subject led to the conclusion that the true test for determining whether a motion for a new trial would lie in any particular probate proceeding, under these sections, "is this, viz.: Does the law expressly authorize issues of fact to be framed in such proceeding? If the answer be, 'yes,' the issues must be tried in the manner provided by these sections to which we have referred, and the motion for new trial is expressly authorized." Among the California cases considered were the Moore, the Sanderson, and the Dolbeer Cases, above mentioned. We think it must be taken as established by the decisions that in any probate proceedings in which the statute authorizes the formation of issues of fact, either party is, under sections 1716 and 1312, entitled to a jury trial, at his option. The question remaining for decision on this point, therefore, is whether or not the statute authorizes the formation of issues upon a proceeding for partial distribution. We think there can be no doubt that it so provides.

[3] Such proceeding is authorized, and the practice therein prescribed, by sections 1658 to 1662, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1658 provides that any person, after four months from the issuance of letters, may present his petition for partial distribution. Section 1659 provides for notice to all persons interested in the estate. Section 1660 provides that "any person interested in the estate may appear at the time named and resist the application." The other sections provide the form of the order to be made, and of the bond to be given by the applicant. Respecting this proceeding, and discussing its nature, the court, in Estate of Ryer, 110 Cal. 561, 42 Pac. 1082, stated that such a proceeding "is in the nature of a collateral inquiry, or episode, injected into the proceedings for the administration of the estate, in which there are pleadings, process, trial, findings, and a judgment, thus presenting all the elements of a civil action." In Carter v. Waste, supra, the court had under consideration a proceeding for final distribution, and declared that section 1668 provided for issues in that proceeding, and that it was one class of cases in which the framing of issues of fact is expressly authorized by the Code. Section 1668, on this subject, is not substantially different from section 1660. It is clear, therefore, from these decisions and from these provisions of the Code, that a proceeding for partial distribution is one in which the Code authorizes the framing of issues of fact and, under the rule stated, sections 1716 and 1312 must be construed to give to either party thereto the right to demand a trial by jury of the issues of fact joined therein. It follows, therefore, that the court below erred in refusing the demand for a jury trial in this case.

The record shows that many other errors were committed by the court below in the course of the trial. In view of the possibility of another trial, we deem it advisable to notice some of them.

[4] The physician who attended the mother when the applicant was born was called as a witness for the applicant, and testified that he was requested to attend at the birth by the decedent Baird; that Baird was at the house on that night; that the birth took place at 5 o'clock in the morning; and that immediately afterwards on that day he made out and signed a certificate of birth, which was afterwards filed in the proper public office. This certificate was read in evidence. It stated that David Jennings Baird, the decedent, was the father of the child, and that Lydia Marguerita Valencia was its mother. By appropriate questions the applicant's counsel sought to elicit from the witness testimony that Baird, at the time the witness made and filled out the certificate, informed him of the facts stated therein, and then declared that he, Baird, was the father of the child, and that Baird read the certificate after it was prepared and signed. This testimony the court refused to allow. The ruling was clearly erroneous. No evidence as to the paternity of the child could be much more satisfactory and convincing than the statements of the reputed father declaring his paternity, made at the time of its birth and under the circumstances stated. The court not only rejected the evidence, but, in the face of many other admissions by Baird that he was the father of the child, allowed as proof of public acknowledgment of the fact by him, found that Baird was not the father, and that he did not publicly acknowledge the child as his own. The testimony sought from the physician was competent evidence of the fact. No confidential relation rendered it a privileged communication. The respondent does not even attempt to justify the ruling.

[5] Other witnesses were prevented from testifying to acknowledgments made by Baird that he was the father of the child. The reason for the rejection in many cases was that the acknowledgment was not made in public. On this ground all statements to that effect made by the decedent at the home of the child's mother to the servants were excluded. We know of no rule by which such rulings can be supported.

[6] The only argument made by the respondent in regard to these errors is that it is immaterial whether they were erroneous or not because, as they claim, the applicant should never have prevailed in any event. This argument is based upon the theory that whatever may be the fact as to the paternity of the child and public acknowledgment thereof by the decedent, the proof showed beyond controversy and without conflict that the decedent did not receive the child into his family as his own, and did not treat it otherwise as if it were a legitimate child. If the errors were confined solely to the admission of evidence on the other issues proposed, this claim would be more plausible. But where the error is so grave as the unauthorized substitution of the court for a jury as the tribunal to hear the evidence and determine the facts, we cannot, as a general rule, say that the scheme in force in this state for the administration of justice has not miscarried. See People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 65, 130 Pac. 1042. Doubtless there may be cases so devoid of merit, or so wanting in proof of some essential fact, that the judgment of the lower court to that effect should be upheld even in the face of such an error. Decisions affirming judgments of nonsuit are familiar examples. But here the court denied a motion for nonsuit, made in part upon the ground that the evidence did not show the two facts last mentioned. Evidence offered by the appellant in support of these facts was also improperly excluded by the rulings of the court. Upon the whole record it appears so probable that the appellant was prevented from fairly presenting his case by improper and adverse rulings that we deem it advisable to remand the cause for a new trial. Nothing we have said is to be taken as an expression of opinion on our part regarding the sufficiency of the evidence to prove that the decedent received the child into his family and treated it as if it were a legitimate child.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Mary L. Waters, Administratrix, etc., against J. C. Nevis. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Shinn & Hart, of Sacramento, and L. A. Kottinger and Milton Shepardson, both of Oakland, for appellant. Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of Antone H. Waters, deceased, to recover the sum of $1,240, alleged to be money had and received by the defendant Nevis from Antone H. Waters, under the circumstances detailed in the complaint, and when, it is alleged, that said Waters was incompetent to conduct any transaction. The complaint was unverified. The answer was a general denial. The evidence was quite voluminous. The court found the facts in the defendant's favor, and rendered judgment accordingly. The plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The facts of the case, concerning which there is little, if any, dispute, show that Antone H. Waters was a man of Portuguese extraction who had accumulated some considerable property, but who during the closing years of his life had become afflicted with various physical ailments, and, having also become estranged to some extent from his family, had, in about the year 1913, gone to live at the home of the defendant, Nevis, whom he had known for a number of years. While living there and in the month of February, 1914, said Waters and Nevis went together to the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. in Sacramento, and there deposited the sum of $1,240 in a joint account, and under a written agreement, which contained the following words:

"The money now deposited and also money which shall at any time be deposited by us or either of us with the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. in this account No. 8340, will be so deposited by us and is to and will be received and held by it with the understanding and upon the condition that the same and all dividends and interest thereon and all accumulations thereof are payable to and shall be collectible by us or either of us during our joint lives, and then belong absolutely to and be the sole and absolute property of the survivor of us, or the heirs, administrators or assigns of such survivor, without reference to or consideration of the original or previous ownership of such moneys or any part of the same."

The money remained on deposit at said bank until May 22, 1914, when it was withdrawn by Nevis. Waters died on December 21, 1914. It is the contention of the appellant that for a considerable period prior to the transaction at the bank, and for all the rest of his life thereafter, Waters was mentally incompetent to conduct a business transaction, and particularly to comprehend the nature and effect of the particular transaction by which the defendant, Nevis, became a party to the deposit of the money in question and the alleged owner thereof after the death of Waters.

[1] It is not seriously insisted by the appellant that the defendant Nevis would not have become the joint owner of the money deposited in the bank under the foregoing agreement, with the right of survivorship thereto upon the death of Waters, had the latter been capable of making, and had made, the deposit of his money in that form. The construction of deposit agreements of the kind shown here has been practically settled since the decision of the case of Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370, which has been upheld in the following cases: Carr v. Carr, 15 Cal. App.

480, 115 Pac. 261; Drinkhouse v. German Sav. & L. Soc., 17 Cal. App. 162, 118 Pac. 953; Denigan v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc., 127 Cal. 137, 59 Pac. 389; Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 Pac. 269. The appellant's contention that Nevis' withdrawal of the money in question in May, 1914, was an act of bad faith towards Waters which operated to terminate his rights to any portion thereof, and destroy the trust relation created by the bank deposit cannot avail against the finding of the court upon sufficient evidence that the withdrawal of said money was accomplished with Waters' consent; and, even were it otherwise, the status of the parties would not be changed by such withdrawal. Sprague v. Walton, 145 Cal. 228, 78 Pac. 645.

[2] This brings us to the main and, in fact, only contention upon which the appellant relied in the trial court, viz., that of Waters' mental incompetency during the period including the date of the deposit agreement and continuing up to the time of his death. The testimony upon this subject was, as we have seen, quite voluminous and very conflicting. The trial court having heard all of said testimony, and having observed both parties and the witnesses in the case, made its findings in the defendant's favor upon the question of the mental competency of the decedent during the period in question. This being so, and a careful examination of the record showing that a real and substantial conflict exists, it follows that under the well-settled rule of this court the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Action by W. C. Daniel against Sadie B. Calkins and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying defendants' motion for new trial, they appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for appellants. Earl Lamb and R. J. Glendenning, both of San Jose, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial.

The action was brought to recover the sum of $550 alleged to be due as the commission of a real estate agent in securing a purchaser for the property of the defendant Sadie B. Calkins, pursuant to a written contract of authorization and also an alleged oral agreement as to the amount of commission to be received in the event of a sale. The evidence in the case discloses that the plaintiff was a real estate agent residing and doing business as such at Sunnyvale in the county of Santa Clara in the year 1912; that during the month of July of that year the defendant Sadie B. Calkins was in possession of a piece of real estate of which she was shortly to become the owner, and that in that month and at her request the plaintiff took a Mr. Deckman (who subsequently became the purchaser of the property) out to see it with a view to buying it; that the price of $12,500 was quoted to him at that time by plaintiff, and he said he would take the property at that figure; but when the plaintiff reported these facts to Mrs. Calkins she said that she had decided not to sell, but later, in the meantime having received title to the property, she requested the plaintiff to reopen negotiations with Mr. Deckman. It was at or about this time that the following writing was executed between the parties:

"Sunnyvale, Cal., August 23, 1912.

"W. C. Daniel: I hereby authorize you solely to sell for me and my account the following described real estate * * * for the sum or price of $11,700.00 net; and I agree to pay you no per cent. as a commission on said sale when made. I further agree to furnish a complete abstract of title to date of transfer. This authorization to remain in full force and effect for thirty days, after which notice must be given in writing to terminate this contract.

"[Signed] Sadie B. Calkins.
[Signed] W. C. Daniel."

"Witness:

At the time of the execution of the foregoing writing the plaintiff testifies, and the court finds, that an oral agreement was made between the parties to the effect that in the event of his success in securing a purchaser for the premises the plaintiff was to receive as his compensation a sum equal to the difference between the net price specified in said writing and such price as the property should be sold for. In the meantime the plaintiff corresponded by telegrams and letters with Mr. Deckman, who was at the time in the East, but who later and during the life of the plaintiff's written contract came to California, re-examined the property, and finally purchased it directly from the owner for the sum of $12,000. After the consummation of such sale the plaintiff demanded as his commission a sum equal to the difference between the amount named in the written authorization as the net sum to be received by the owner and the sum actually paid by the purchaser of the property, to wit, the sum of $300. The trial court rendered judgment in plaintiff's favor for said sum, and from said judgment and from the order denying a new trial the defendants prosecute this appeal.

[1] The first contention of the defendants is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that the plaintiff procured Deckman as a purchaser of the property. In respect to this issue there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and this being so the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed.

[2, 3] The next and chief contention of the appellants is that the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to introduce evidence of the oral agreement between the parties to the effect that the plaintiff was to receive all over the net sum stated in the writing as the purchase price of the property. In making this contention it is apparently conceded by the appellants that when an agent's authorization is written the amount of his compensation in the event of a sale may be agreed upon orally. This concession is doubtless made in the light of the authorities sustaining this view. Toomy v. Dunphy, 86 Cal. 639, 25 Pac. 130; Kennedy v. Merickel, 8 Cal. App. 381, 97 Pac. 81; Baird v. Loescher, 9 Cal. App. 65, 98 Pac. 49; Naylor v. Adams, 15 Cal. App. 354, 114 Pac. 997. The appellants, however, insist that the oral agreement between the parties as to the sum to be received or retained as the agent's compensation is void, for the reason that it undertakes to vary the terms of a written instrument by parol, and that the ruling of the trial court in admitting evidence of such oral agreement was error. The clause in the writing which it is argued is varied and in fact abrogated by the oral agreement, according to the appellants' contention, reads as follows:

"I agree to pay you no per cent. as a commission on the amount of said sale when made."

This clause standing alone might support the appellants' contention; but it is to be interpreted in connection with the entire writing, with the nature and object of the contract, and with the circumstances attending its creation. Contracts between real estate agents and owners of real estate by which the former are given authority to engage in activities having for their object the sale of the latter's property, are entered into for the mutual material benefit of the parties to such contracts, and are to be so construed as not to defeat these objects when such construction is reasonably deducible from their terms. The foregoing clause in the written authorization of the plaintiff is to be read in the light of the preceding clause in such writing with which it is connected in the conjunctive, and which designates the net amount which the owner is to receive upon the sale of the property; and it is upon said "amount of said sale" that "no percentage as a commission" is to be paid. The use of the term "net," and specifying the amount which the owner is to receive, carries the plain implication that the selling price of the property is to be some larger sum, the excess of which is undisposed of by the terms of the written agreement. This being so, the oral agreement of the parties to the effect that the agent should retain such extra sum as the compensation for his services in the premises does not vary the terms of the writing, but only amplifies it so as to effectuate the mutual material interests of the parties in entering into it. The court, therefore, did not err in admitting the evidence of such oral agreement, nor in its finding predicated upon such evidence.

[4] The final contention of the appellants is that the plaintiff never in fact produced a purchaser ready and able and willing to purchase the property in question for the price at which the agent offered it to such purchaser. This argument is predicated upon the evidence in the case showing that the lowest price quoted to the prospective purchaser by the plaintiff was the sum of $12,250, which sum the purchaser was never shown to be willing to pay. The views above expressed as to the construction to be placed upon the plaintiff's written authorization to the effect that he was to endeavor to make a sale of the property for such sum in excess of the net amount which the owner was to receive, necessarily implies that in his offers of the property to prospective purchasers he was to fix a larger sum than said net amount as the lowest purchase price of the property; and if he found a purchaser who was ready and willing and able to buy the property for any sum up to or in excess of the net amount specified in his written authorization he would be fulfilling its terms and also the terms of the oral understanding of the parties supplementing their written agreement; and if such purchaser when found saw fit to deal directly with the owner, and the owner with him, within the life of the plaintiff's agency, and to consummate a sale of the property for a sum equal to or in excess of the owner's net figure, the agent would be none the less the procuring cause of such sale, and would under the authorities be entitled to his reward. Briggs v. Hall, 24 Cal. App. 586, 141 Pac. 1067.

This disposes of every material contention of the appellants in the case.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by E. S. Baxter against the Chico Construction Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Guy R. Kennedy, of Chico, and J. D. Peters, for appellant. W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. We think a rational conclusion from evidence disclosed by the record is found in the following statement of facts as claimed by respondent: Defendant had a contract for constructing within a given time a concrete dam for the impounding of water for irrigation. It sublet to one James Kirby the work of hauling the necessary gravel to the dam site. Defendant's headquarters were at Chico, Butte county, and the dam was being constructed some 40 or 50 miles away in the foothills of Yuba county. Plaintiff was conducting a general merchandise store a few miles from the site. The work was begun, and while hauling the gravel, Kirby incurred a bill at the store for the sum of $298.20 for supplies of various kinds, including groceries and a considerable quantity of beer and whisky. Up to about October 17, 1913, defendant had been represented at this place by its superintendent or foreman, a Mr. Cuddeback, and he was succeeded by a Mr. Jack McGeehan, each of them having authority to hire and discharge men, buy necessary supplies, incur bills in connection therewith, and represent defendant in the prosecution of the work. At said date, Mr. Kirby had a large amount of gravel on the way near plaintiff's store and plaintiff demanded the payment of his bill, refused to extend any further credit to the subcontractor, and was about to commence suit and attach the gravel. This was communicated to Foreman Cuddeback, and his successor, Mr. McGeehan, took up the matter and informed plaintiff that he would communicate with the president of defendant by telephone. To plaintiff's knowledge, he did have such communication with the president, who was then at Chico; went direct to plaintiff's store; assisted plaintiff and his clerk in figuring up the amount due and unpaid; ascertained it to be $298.20; told plaintiff that in his talk with the president of defendant over the phone, the president stated that defendant would pay the bill, and McGeehan further declared that he, the foreman would O. K. the bill; had a statement of the bill made out, which he, in fact, initialed and sent to defendant at Chico; stated to plaintiff that defendant desired him to continue giving credit to Kirby, and that it would pay for all necessary articles furnished to him thereafter. Plaintiff thereupon accepted defendant's promise thus made to pay the then existing bill of $298.20; released Kirby from all claim in connection therewith; stopped the proceedings to attach, or at least abstained from any action, and looked solely thereafter to defendant for payment; and, further carrying out his promise, furnished additional merchandise to Kirby in the sum of $81.20, looking to defendant alone for payment therefor. The foregoing are the most favorable inferences in favor of the judgment that can be drawn from the evidence, but that, of course, is no objection here, if they are substantially supported at all. The following quotation from plaintiff's testimony would seem to disclose said support:

"My store is a little less than a mile from the dam. James Kirby had a subcontract from the defendant for the hauling of gravel for the construction of the dam. In doing that work, he ran a bill with me for general merchandise. Ed. Fleming was on the ground representing Mr. Kirby, and at first Pete Cuddeback was the foreman and representative of defendant and he was succeeded by Jack McGeehan. On October 20, 1913, James Kirby owed me $298.20, and I told his foreman, Mr. Fleming, that I wouldn't furnish any more supplies unless it was fixed up. Mr. Fleming went to Oroville, came back in a couple of days, and said Pete Cuddeback, who went to the phone and talked with Mr. Polk, the engineer for defendant in charge of the work, and after talking with him, told me to fix up the amount owed me by Kirby and send it to the defendant, and that it would be paid and defendant would be responsible for it. Then Mr. Fleming and Jack McGeehan, who was then foreman and representative of the defendant, took my books, added up the account, which came to $298.20, and made out the statement introduced in evidence themselves, and Jack McGeehan took it, saying that he would O. K. it and send it to the defendant. I then and there accepted this promise on behalf of defendant, and I released James Kirby, canceled his indebtedness, and from this time on looked to the defendant alone for the payment of this bill. As a further inducement and consideration to defendant for assuming this bill, I promised Jack McGeehan that I would go ahead and let Kirby have thereafter anything that was necessary to complete the contract, which Mr. McGeehan, for defendant, asked me to do and stated the defendant would pay the same. Had not defendant assumed the prior account, I would not have done this, as I was going to attach, but having obtained this promise from the company, I released Mr. Kirby, and then furnished additional supplies to Mr. Kirby thereafter in accordance with the direction obtained from Mr. McGeehan, amounting to $81.20."

[1] There is thus shown a novation, and it is excepted from the operation of the statute of frauds by virtue of subdivision 3 of section 2794 of the Civil Code, excluding the case—

"where the promise, being for an antecedent obligation of another, is made upon the consideration that the party receiving it cancels the antecedent obligation, accepting the new promise as a substitute therefor," etc.

[2] We can see no valid objection to the course permitting plaintiff to testify that he did cancel the antecedent obligation and accepted the new promise. These were facts, and no one was better qualified than plaintiff to testify concerning them. The court would not be bound by his declaration to that effect, but they constituted evidence which we cannot say was insufficient to support the court's finding.

[3] We think also that there was sufficient showing that the foreman or superintendent had authority to bind the company in the promise to pay for the supplies.

There is no dispute that Cuddeback and McGeehan had the same authority, and the former testified that:

"My authority was to go ahead with the construction of the dam; hire men; discharge them; buy what supplies were needed for the work."

Mr. Fleming also testified that Mr. McGeehan was general foreman for the Chico Construction Company; that "he hired and discharged laborers and supervised the work and ordered supplies."

There is also strong circumstantial evidence in the fact that McGeehan, immediately after telephoning to the president of said company, made said agreement with plaintiff. He would quite naturally repeat to plaintiff what was said to him by his superior. It is altogether improbable that he would immediately make a contract entirely different from his instructions. It is true that there is a difference between the testimony of plaintiff and McGeehan as to this, but we must accept the version of the former.

The proposition involved in the case seems simple, and, as we cannot say that the conclusion drawn from the evidence by the trial judge is unreasonable or unsupported, we think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

VALENCIA v. MILLIKEN. (Civ. 2001.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 27, 1916.)

1. RAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 57(1)—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

The weight to be given testimony in criminal prosecutions for rape, even if uncorroborated, is for the jury, unless it is inherently improbable.

2. RAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 66—CIVIL LIABILITY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a civil action for rape, a less stringent rule relative to the sufficiency of evidence is applicable than in a criminal prosecution, since in a civil action a preponderance of the evidence is all that is required to establish a fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-111; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 66.]

3. RAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 66—CIVIL LIABILITY—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In a civil action for rape, the weight to be given conflicting evidence relative to the commission of the act held for the jury.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 1002—REVIEW—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

In a civil action for rape, the jury's conclusion on conflicting evidence in favor of plaintiff and against defendant's alibi is conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935-3937; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1002.]

5. RAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 66—CIVIL LIABILITY—EVIDENCE.

In a civil action for rape, where there was no controversy as to the birth of plaintiff's child, it was competent for plaintiff to testify that defendant was its father.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-111; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 66.]

6. RAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 66—CIVIL LIABILITY—CHILD AS EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR TRIAL COURT.

In a civil action for rape, the question whether the jury could be asked to compare plaintiff's child with defendant was peculiarly within the trial court's province to determine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-111; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 66.]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 1032(1)—BURDEN TO SHOW PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

The burden is on appellant to affirmatively show prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4047, 4051; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1032(1).]

8. RAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 66—CIVIL LIABILITY—EVIDENCE—CHASTITY.

In a civil action for rape, evidence as to the chastity of plaintiff was not only material on question of the measure of damages, but as tending to show the probability or nonprobability of resistance on the part of plaintiff.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 1047(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION.

In a civil action for rape, where the defense, being an alibi, was not based on the fact that plaintiff had consented, error in limiting the purpose for which evidence as to the chastity of plaintiff could be considered to the question of damages was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4146, 4150-4152; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1047(1).]

10. RAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 66—CIVIL LIABILITY—INSTRUCTION—DAMAGES.

In a civil action for rape, the instruction that compensatory damages should be given in such amount as would fairly compensate plaintiff for the injury she received by reason of the act complained of, considering her physical suffering and disability during pregnancy, if the jury found the pregnancy was the result of defendant's act, also her mental suffering, shame, and disgrace, and loss of social standing, and all other harm suffered as the natural result of the wrong, was not improper, in connection with the other instructions, as invading the right of the jury by telling that damages should be awarded plaintiff regardless of whether she consented or not; as the jury were told to compensate for the act complained of, the rape.

11. RAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 66—CIVIL LIABILITY—EVIDENCE—CAPACITY FOR RESISTANCE.

In a civil action for rape, the questions to plaintiff: "Did you become unconscious at any time while you were struggling with defendant? Did he say anything while he was doing this? Were you or were you not unconscious at the time he set you up? Before this assault were you as large physically as you are now?"—were proper, not only as tending to show damages, but as bearing on the question of plaintiff's power to resist.

12. RAPE — CIVIL LIABILITY—EVIDENCE.

In a civil action for rape, plaintiff's testimony that she weighed 140 to 145 pounds when the act was committed, whereas at the time of trial she weighed 215 pounds, was proper, where defendant claimed that, as he weighed only 155 pounds, it was improbable that he could forcibly rape a woman weighing 215 pounds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-111; Dec. Dig. —66.]

13. RAPE — CIVIL LIABILITY—EVIDENCE — MATERIALITY.

In a civil action for rape, the question to plaintiff why she remained on friendly terms with defendant after he raped her, to which she answered that defendant always promised to come and marry her, was material, and the evidence admissible.

14. APPEAL AND ERROR — 1050(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

In a civil action for rape, the admission of a physician's testimony as to the period of gestation was harmless, even if the period was a matter of common knowledge, and not one requiring expert testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1069, 4153, 4157; Dec. Dig. —1050(1).]

15. RAPE — CIVIL LIABILITY—IMMATERIAL TESTIMONY.

In a civil action for rape, the court properly struck from the testimony of a witness for the defense his statement that last summer he saw a man and plaintiff at "Urbita Springs," as the fact was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-111; Dec. Dig. —66.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by Alvina Valencia against Philipp Milliken. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying defendant's motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Miguel Estudillo, of Riverside, for appellant. Richard L. North, of Riverside, A. Orfila, of Los Angeles, and V. Rapp, of El Centro, for respondent.

SHAW, J. As appears from the complaint, defendant on or about December 19, 1911, with force and violence, made an indecent assault upon plaintiff, who at the time was a chaste and virtuous single woman over the age of 21 years, and then and there, without her consent, debauched and carnally knew her, as a result of which she became pregnant, and on September 17, 1912, gave birth to a child, to her damage in the sum of $25,000; all of which allegations were by defendant denied.

The case was tried before a jury, which brought in a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $4,000. Defendant moved for a new trial upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, errors in law occurring at the trial, and irregularities in the proceedings of plaintiff and the attorneys for plaintiff, which motion was overruled. The appeal is from the judgment and an order of court denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1-4] Appellant devotes a large part of his brief in support of his contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury. No purpose could be subserved in quoting at length the detailed acts of defendant in accomplishing his purpose, as related by plaintiff. Her statement, if true, clearly shows that she was, on December 19, 1911, against her will, ravished and debauched by defendant, as a result of which she gave birth to a child on September 17, 1912. As declared in criminal cases, the weight to be given testimony in prosecutions for rape, even if uncorroborated, is a matter solely for the consideration of the jury, unless it is inherently improbable (People v. Ah Lung, 2 Cal. App. 278, 83 Pac. 296; People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506; People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540); and a less stringent rule is applicable here, since it is a civil action wherein a preponderance of the evidence is all that is required to establish a fact. Not only do we find nothing improbable in plaintiff's story when all the circumstances are considered, but her testimony is strongly corroborated by that of her father and mother, to the effect that defendant did, on the afternoon of the day named, accompanied by plaintiff, leave their house in a buggy for a ride, from which trip he returned with her that evening, when plaintiff immediately, in the presence of defendant, informed her parents of the fact that the defendant had so abused her; that he then admitted the fact, as stated by plaintiff, and promised the father that he would marry his daughter within two weeks; that the clothing of plaintiff was torn and blood-stained; that the father, accompanied by plaintiff, visited the isolated place where the latter stated defendant had pulled her from the buggy, and found evidence of the struggle which plaintiff testified she had with defendant in an effort to protect her virtue. Defendant denied in toto the testimony of plaintiff; denied that he made any admissions or had any conversation with the father and mother; denied that he had gone riding with plaintiff or had seen her or her parents at all on the day referred to; and asserted that at the time when the offense is alleged to have been committed he was elsewhere, and a part of the time at the house of his brother, where he remained during the night, in which claim he was corroborated by his brother and one other person. The weight to be given this conflicting evidence was clearly a matter for the determination of the jury, and its conclusion thereon in favor of plaintiff and against the alibi which defendant sought to establish, must, so far as this court is concerned, be deemed conclusive. Appellant cites the case of Lind v. Closs, 88 Cal. 6, 25 Pac. 972, to the effect that, where in prosecutions for rape the circumstances tend to throw discredit upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecuting witness, the court in reviewing such testimony should be liberal in granting a new trial, to the end that justice may be done. For the reasons stated, however, the rule announced in that case is not applicable to the facts in the case at bar.

[5-7] It appears that the child, nearly a year old at the time, was produced in court, and in addressing the jury plaintiff's attorney said:

"I call your attention, gentlemen, to the child in question, and ask you to compare it with the defendant."

Defendant objected to the use of this language in argument to the jury, on the ground there was no evidence that the child was that of the defendant, and asked the court to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks of counsel. The testimony of plaintiff was that the child to which she gave birth nine months after the alleged act of intercourse with her by defendant was that of the defendant. The record is silent as to whether or not it bore any resemblance to defendant. For aught that appears to the contrary, its lack of resemblance might have constituted strong evidence in his favor. If, on the other hand, it resembled the alleged father, it would be convincing evidence, not of the alleged violence, but of the act of intercourse with him which it was necessary for plaintiff to establish. There existed no controversy as to the birth of the child, and it was competent for plaintiff to testify that defendant was the father thereof. State v. Miller, 71 Kan. 200, 80 Pac. 51, 6 App. Cas. 58. And it has also been held that a child may be exhibited to the jury in order that they may consider and determine whether or not there may be any resemblance to the defendant. State v. Danforth, 73 N. H. 215, 60 Atl. 839, 111 Am. St. Rep. 600, 6 Ann. Cas. 557. In State v. Danforth, supra, it is said:

"All of the authorities concede, in effect, that there may be cases in which the maturity of the child, or the character of the peculiarities relied upon as a ground of resemblance or dissimilarity, render the child competent evidence on the issue of paternity. The objections urged to the competency of the evidence go rather to its weight than to its relevancy."

In 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 166, it is said:

"The sound rule is to admit the fact of similarity of specific traits, however presented, provided the child is in the opinion of the trial court old enough to possess settled features or other corporal indications."

In our opinion, since the child is not before us, the matter complained of was a question peculiarly within the province of the trial court to determine. At all events, it devolves upon appellant to affirmatively show prejudicial error, and there is nothing in the record here presented upon which we can assume, even if the court erred, that defendant was prejudiced by the ruling.

"Whether or not plaintiff was chaste and virtuous prior to the alleged assault is not material to the maintenance of this action, and, should you find from the evidence that she was not, that alone would not justify you in finding for the defendant. Whether or not she was chaste prior to the alleged assault is only material for the purpose of showing the damages which she may have suffered by reason of the alleged assault."

The chastity of plaintiff prior to the assault was made an issue in the trial, and there was conflicting evidence touching the question. In our opinion, evidence as to the chastity of plaintiff was not only material touching the question as to the measure of damages, as stated by the court, but likewise material as tending to show the probability or nonprobability of resistance on the part of the prosecutrix; "for it is certainly more probable that a woman who has done these things voluntarily in the past would be much more likely to consent than one whose past reputation was without blemish, and whose personal conduct could not truthfully be assailed." People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622. Conceding, however, that the court erred in thus limiting the purpose for which such evidence was to be considered by the jury, it is nevertheless impossible to perceive how defendant could have been prejudiced thereby, since his defense, being an alibi, was not based upon the fact that plaintiff had consented to the act. Hence, conceding the error, defendant's substantial rights could not have been prejudiced by reason thereof.

[10] The court instructed the jury that:

"Compensatory damages should be given in such amount as in your judgment will fairly compensate her for the injury she has received by reason of the act complained of, taking into consideration her physical suffering and disability during pregnancy and in child birth, if you find the pregnancy was the result of the defendant's act, also her mental suffering, shame, and disgrace, and her loss of social standing, and all other harm you find she suffered as the natural result of the wrong."

Objection is made to this instruction upon the ground that it invades the right of the jury, telling it that damages should be awarded to plaintiff regardless of whether she gave her consent or not. We do not so construe it. Read in connection with other instructions, and also as stated therein, they are to compensate her for the wrong by reason of the act complained of. "The act complained of" was the rape alleged to have been committed upon plaintiff by defendant.

[11-15] Numerous assignments of error are predicated upon rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence. Conceding some of the questions calculated to elicit immaterial testimony, we are unable to perceive that any prejudice could have resulted therefrom. The questions: "Did you become unconscious at any time while you were struggling with him?" "Did he say anything while he was doing this?" "Were you or were you not unconscious at the time he set you up?" "Before this assault were you as large physically as you are now?"—were all proper, not only as tending to show damage, but for the further reason that they bore upon the question of her power to resist the defendant. In response to the last question plaintiff replied that she weighed 140 to 145 pounds at the time the act was committed, whereas at the time of the trial she weighed 215 pounds. This testimony was certainly proper, since defendant claims that, as he weighed only 155 pounds, it was improbable that he could forcibly rape a woman weighing 215 pounds. It was made to appear that after the commission of the act plaintiff remained on friendly terms with defendant, and she was asked the reason for such continued relations. Her answer to the effect that he always "promised Papa that he would come and get married, and we expected that he would keep his word," shows the materiality of the question. It is also claimed that the court erred in admitting the testimony of a physician as to the period of gestation. The ground of this objection is that such period is a matter of common knowledge, and not one requiring expert testimony. Conceding this to be true, how could defendant have been prejudiced by the answer? It is also claimed that the court erred in striking out the following testimony given by witness Mendez for the defense:

"Last summer I saw Frank Truhillo and Alvina Valencia at Urbita Springs. It was last year I saw them."

It is impossible to perceive how such fact could be material to any issue involved in the case. There were numerous other objections in character as trivial and unimportant as those to which we have adverted. No purpose could be subserved by a more extended reference thereto. Suffice it to say we find no error which in any event could have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Constitution.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

AINSWORTH et ux. v. MORRILL.
(Civ. 1922.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 22, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 20, 1916.)

1. HOMESTEAD §118(5) — INCUMBRANCE — JOINDER OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Under Civ. Code, § 1242, providing that the homestead of a married woman cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and acknowledged by the husband and wife, a written offer, accepted in writing, made and signed by only the husband, for an exchange of land of the wife upon which a homestead had been declared by her, was invalid and unenforceable by the husband and wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 216, 217; Dec. Dig. §118(5).]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE §32(1)—MUTUALITY.

Where defendant in suit for specific performance would not be entitled to have the contract reformed and enforced against plaintiffs, it cannot be reformed and enforced by them against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 89, 90, 99; Dec. Dig. §32(1).]

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS §7—VOID CONTRACT.

A void agreement has no standing in law and cannot be reformed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. §7.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by A. G. Ainsworth and wife against Enoch Morrill. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lindley & Bickhoff and Russell T. Ainsworth, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Redmond C. Staats, of Berkeley, and James M. Koford, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action the plaintiffs sought to have reformed and then specifically enforced a written contract executed by and between the plaintiff A. G. Ainsworth and the defendant Morrill, for an exchange of certain real property. The defendant's general and special demurrer to the plaintiffs' fourth amended complaint was sustained, and the plaintiffs declining to further amend, judgment was entered for the defendant, from which the plaintiffs have appealed.

The facts pleaded and relied upon for a cause of action are substantially these: The plaintiffs are and at all times mentioned in the complaint were husband and wife and living together as such in the county of Napa. The plaintiff Minerva L. Ainsworth was the owner of certain real property situate in the county of Napa, and the defendant Morrill was the owner of certain real property situate in the county of Alameda. Both properties were at the time of the making of the contract incumbered with mortgages, and the property of the plaintiff Minerva L. Ainsworth was further incumbered with a right of way and a homestead declared by her. The contract in controversy consisted of a written offer made and signed only by the plaintiff A. G. Ainsworth, which was accepted in writing by the defendant Morrill.

[1-3] In our opinion the plaintiffs' complaint does not and cannot be made to state a cause of action, and therefore the defendant's demurrer was rightfully sustained upon that ground alone. It affirmatively appears from the allegations of the complaint that the contract in suit was not signed and acknowledged by the plaintiff Minerva L. Ainsworth; and we have no doubt that its effect if valid and enforceable would be an incumbrance upon the homestead previously declared by her within the meaning of section 1242 of the Civil Code, which provides that:

"The homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife."

Although the contract was signed only by the plaintiff A. G. Ainsworth and was executory in its nature, nevertheless its tendency was to cast a cloud upon the property involved, and to that extent at least constituted an incumbrance upon the existing homestead. The policy and purpose of section 1242 of the Civil Code is to prevent the destruction or incumbrance of a homestead by either spouse acting alone; and it is well settled that a purported conveyance or incumbrance of the homestead by either spouse not made in strict compliance with the requirements of that section is invalid and inoperative for any purpose. Freiermuth v. Steigleman, 130 Cal. 392, 62 Pac. 615, 80 Am. St. Rep. 138. Clearly under the pleaded and admitted facts of the present case the defendant would not be entitled to have the contract in controversy reformed and enforced as against either or both of the plaintiffs; and conversely it must be true that the plaintiffs can have no rights under the contract superior to those accorded by the law to the defendant. It is elementary that a void agreement has no standing in the law, and consequently it can neither be reformed nor enforced.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PRECIADO. (Cr. 351.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 23, 1916.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW § 1104(6) — APPEAL AND ERROR—STATING "GROUNDS" AND "POINTS"—STATUTE.

Under Pen. Code, § 1247, requiring that appellant's application to the trial court for a transcription of the stenographer's notes state in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points on which appellant relies, by stating in his application in general terms the grounds but not the points for his appeal from conviction of embezzlement, appellant complied with the statute sufficiently to entitle his appeal to be heard, since the term "points" was used in the statute as embracing "grounds" as well as "points."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2776; Dec. Dig. § 1104(6).]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ground; Point.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW § 778(7)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTION.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, defended on the ground of insanity, where the trial court instructed that for insanity to be available as a defense defendant must establish it by a preponderance of the evidence, defining a preponderance as meaning the greater weight of the evidence, but in three or four other instructions stated that the defense must be "clearly proved,"

"clearly established," and "satisfactorily established," there was error, as the charge as a whole was likely to influence the jury to require establishment of the defense of insanity by too clear a degree of proof.

3. CRIMINAL LAW § 570(2)—INSANITY—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

The defense of insanity may be established by a mere preponderance of the evidence.

4. CRIMINAL LAW § 1159(5) — APPEAL — REVIEW—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

On appeal from a conviction of crime, the reviewing court, under the settled rule, will not interfere with the verdict, whichever way the jury may have decided the issue of insanity, where expert and nonexpert testimony was introduced for and against the defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3078, 3079; Dec. Dig. § 1159(5).]

5. CRIMINAL LAW § 161—FORMER JEOPARDY.

Once in jeopardy and former acquittal are favored pleas, and the right not to be put in jeopardy the second time is guarded by the common law and the constitution.

6. CRIMINAL LAW § 200(1)—IDENTITY OF OFFENSES—EMBEZZLEMENT.

Defendant tax collector, acquitted of embezzling, on December 1, 1913, funds paid him by H., could not be convicted of embezzling, on November 1, 1913, funds paid him by M., if the money embezzled December 1st included in part both the H. and M. moneys, since, where the offense on trial is a necessary element in, and constitutes an essential part of, another offense, and both are in fact but one transaction, a conviction or acquittal of one is a bar to a prosecution of the other.

7. CRIMINAL LAW § 295—FORMER JEOPARDY — PROOF OF PLEA.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, the information alleging that it was committed November 1, 1913, while defendant tax collector had been acquitted of a like charge as of December 1, 1913, it was error to confine defendant, in the proof in support of his plea of former jeopardy, to the face of the information on which he was acquitted, though the two informations showed two different offenses committed at two different times, the one charging the offense as of November 1, 1913, having been purposely amended to that date from December 1, 1913, since defendant had a right to show that the taking of the money in both instances was one and the same transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 674-678; Dec. Dig. § 295.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Charles F. Preciado was convicted of embezzlement, and from the judgment, and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

See, also, 158 Pac. 1063.

Lee D. Windrem, of Port Richmond, R. R. Fowler, of Turlock, and Joseph Barcroft and H. I. Maxim, both of Madera, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was informed against by the district attorney of the county of Madera for the crime of embezzlement. He was tried and convicted, and thereafter moved for a new trial which was denied. He thereupon appealed from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] 1. The Attorney General has made a motion to dismiss the appeal principally upon the ground that defendant in his application for an appeal under section 1247, Penal Code, failed to file or present to the trial judge an application containing a statement of the grounds and points on which he relies. The contention is that defendant should have stated in his application not only the grounds of his appeal, but should also have specified the points on which he relied; that the statute is mandatory in its requirement that the application contain a statement of "grounds and points." Section 1247 provides that:

Upon an appeal taken from any judgment or order of the superior court, in any criminal action, where such appeal is allowed, "the defendant * * * must, within five days, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed and the judgment or order may be enforced as if no appeal had been taken."

The section also provides that the court shall, within two days after such application is made, direct the phonographic reporter who reported the case to transcribe such portion of his notes as in the opinion of the court "may be necessary to fairly and fully present the points relied upon by the appellant." It will be observed that while the terms "grounds and points" are conjunctively stated in the earlier part of the section, the direction as to the portion of the reporter's notes necessary to have transcribed is that the transcription shall be such as "to fairly present the points relied upon," and further along in the section it is made the duty of the court "after such application is made," to direct the reporter to transcribe such portion of his notes as may be necessary to present "the points relied upon by the appellant." The term "points" as above shown, it seems to us, was used as embracing "grounds" as well as "points" and, as there used, indicates that the Legislature did not intend that an appellant should lose his appeal as "wholly ineffectual" unless in his application he specifically and separately states therein that his reasons for the appeal are to be deemed both the "grounds" and "points" upon which "appellant relies."

The application was entitled: "Settlement of Grounds on Appeal under Sec. 1247, P. C." Then follows title and cause. The application recites the proceedings, the trial, verdict, motion for new trial, order denying motion, judgment and notice of appeal from the judgment and order. It then states: "That said appeal is taken upon the following general grounds," and the grounds (briefly stated) were as follows: (1) Once in jeopardy; (2) errors in rulings with reference to the allowance of challenges for cause; (3) misconduct of district attorney; (4) errors of the court in its rulings upon evidence; (5) errors of the court in the interrogation of witnesses; (6) the verdict is contrary to law; (7) the verdict is contrary to evidence. The application specifically mentioned portions of the record called for and also for "the entire transcript of the testimony taken in said action."

With this application before the court, it made an order directing the phonographic reporter "to transcribe the following portions of the testimony and proceedings given and had in the above-entitled cause." Then follow in the order the portions of the testimony and proceedings specifically called for in the application, including "all the testimony given at the trial, and all objections, rulings and exceptions, made and taken at the trial." This order was complied with and the entire record is now here for review and appears to be in authentic form.

The statute only requires that the application state "in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies." The grounds stated in the present case were specific enough to indicate upon what errors defendant would rely, and he designated the portions of the reporter's notes which were deemed "necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon." Section 1248 of the Penal Code provides that: "If the appeal is irregular in any substantial particular, but not otherwise, the Appellate Court may, * * * order it to be dismissed."

It was said in Estate of Nelson, 128 Cal. 242, 60 Pac. 772:

"The right of appeal is conferred by the Constitution, and statutes and rules of procedure for its exercise are to be liberally construed; and no appeal will be dismissed on technical grounds, where there has been no violation or disregard of any express rule of procedure."

Unless we can say that the failure of defendant to state in his application that the "grounds," therein set forth were also the "points" on which he relied, is a fatal "violation or disregard" of the provisions of section 1247, the motion, in our opinion, must be denied. We cannot so hold. We fail to appreciate respondent's argument that there is, in contemplation of the statute, a substantial distinction intended in the use of the terms

"grounds" and "points." By stating "in general terms the grounds" we think the defendant complied with the statute sufficiently to entitle his appeal to be heard.

[2-4] 2. The principal defense made in the case was that defendant, at the time of the taking of the money, was not responsible because he was incapable of understanding the nature and quality of the act on account of his then insanity. The court gave the following instructions:

"You are instructed that in prosecution for crimes the defense of insanity is often interposed and thereby becomes a subject of paramount importance in criminal jurisprudence. A due regard for the ends of justice and the welfare of society no less than mercy to the accused requires that it should be thoroughly and carefully weighed. It is a plea sometimes resorted to in cases where aggravated crimes have been committed under circumstances which afford full proof of the overt acts and render hopeless all other means of evading punishment. While, therefore, it ought to be viewed as a not less full and complete than it is a humane defense when satisfactorily established, yet it should be examined into with great care lest an ingenious counterfeiter of the malady furnish protection to guilt.

"Insanity as used in this sense means such a diseased and deranged condition of the mental faculties as to render a person incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to the act with which he is charged, and to establish a defense on the ground of insanity it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act the party accused was laboring under such a defect of reasoning from disease of the mind as to not know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing wrong.

"Hence you are instructed that in order for insanity to be available as a defense in this case the defendant herein must establish by a preponderance of evidence that he was so diseased and deranged in mind as to render him incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, and it must appear from such preponderance of evidence that he was so incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to the particular offense charged in the information, and it must appear further by such preponderance of evidence that he was in such a mental condition as to be incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to the act with which he is charged in the information upon the particular date so charged and designated in the information.

"You are instructed that the law of this state does not recognize the defense of insanity based upon claims that a defendant committed the crime while laboring under an uncontrollable or irresistible influence, nor does it recognize that form of insanity commonly known as emotional insanity beginning on the eve of the criminal act and ending with its consummation. Such forms of insanity have no legal standing in this state as a defense to crime. It is necessary that insanity, in order to be a defense, it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act the party accused was laboring under such a defect of reason and from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong."

In People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 392, the defense was insanity, and among the instructions was the following:

"I charge you that when insanity is relied upon as a defense, the burden of proof is with the defendant, and the proof must be such in amount that if the single issue of sanity or insanity of the defendant should be submitted to the jury in a civil case, they would find that he was insane, or, in other words, that insanity must be clearly established by satisfactory proof; it is not sufficient that you should entertain a reasonable doubt as to his sanity, but the proof must be satisfactory and the fact of insanity clearly established." Italics the court's.

The court referred to the rule as previously well settled that "insanity, in order to constitute a defense in a criminal action, need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but that it might be established 'by mere preponderating evidence.'" Referring to the instruction, the court said:

"Is not the expression 'clearly established by satisfactory proof' the full equivalent of 'established by satisfactory proof beyond a reasonable doubt'? How can a fact be said to be clearly established so long as there is a reasonable doubt whether it has been established at all. There can be no 'reasonable doubt' of a fact after it has been clearly established by satisfactory proof."

After giving the definition of "clearly" according to Webster and after stating the definition of reasonable doubt as defined by Chief Justice Shaw, the court, said:

"A juror would have no excuse for saying that he did not 'feel an abiding conviction to a moral certainty' of the truth of a fact which had been 'clearly established by satisfactory proof.' Such proof, if any could, would convince and direct the understanding, and satisfy the reason and judgment of a conscientious juror. Under the instruction given it was the duty of the jury to require that the defense of insanity should at least be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. This was error."

In People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 138, 78 Pac. 470, the instruction was, as the court stated, "almost in the exact language of the one condemned in People v. Wreden." Said the court, after quoting what is above taken from the opinion in that case:

"We have not been referred to a case, nor do we know of one in this court, overruling or modifying the decision in People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 393. On the contrary, in People v. Allender, 117 Cal. 81 [48 Pac. 1014], the court instructed the jury that the burden rested upon the defendant of proving his insanity by a preponderance of evidence merely."

And the court referred to the fact that such had been the rule in this state for a period of 30 years.

The latest discussion of the question by the Supreme Court is found in People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 154 Pac. 468. In that case the trial court instructed the jury correctly as to the rule that a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient where insanity is pleaded, but it gave a further instruction as to what was meant by the term "preponderance of the evidence," as follows:

"Preponderance of the evidence means that degree of evidence which proves to a moral certainty, or, in other words, that degree of proof that produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind, regardless of the number of witnesses from whom it proceeds."

Chief Justice Angellotti, speaking for the court, shows quite clearly that the definition thus given was substantially the same as that of proof beyond a reasonable doubt and therefore violated the rule that insanity may be established by a preponderance of the evidence merely. The court said:

"That such is the effect of the instruction given is shown by what is said in People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 393, and People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 142 [78 Pac. 470], where it is held that an instruction declaring that insanity 'must be clearly established by satisfactory proof' is the full equivalent of one making it incumbent on a defendant to establish insanity beyond a reasonable doubt."

As we understand this reference to the case of People v. Wreden, the court intended to give its approval of what was there said, and because of such approval it followed that the instruction in the Miller Case was error. That is, that in the Wreden Case the instruction called for proof equivalent to the proof called for in the Miller Case, or, in other words, both instructions meant the same thing and both were erroneous.

In the present case the only instruction given defining what is meant by preponderance of the evidence was as follows: "By a preponderance of the evidence is meant the greater weight of the evidence—that which is the more convincing of its truth. It is not necessarily determined by the number of witnesses for or against a proposition." Notwithstanding this definition, the jury were told that the defense of insanity is to be received as "a humane defense when satisfactorily established"; again, in another instruction, "to establish the defense of insanity it must be clearly proved"; again, in another instruction, "It is necessary that insanity, in order to be a defense, it must be clearly proved," etc. How else could the jury have understood the instruction that insanity may be established by a preponderance of the evidence than that this preponderance must be "satisfactorily established" and "clearly proved"?

In the case of Beach v. Clark, 51 Conn. 200, the action was on a promissory note on which defendant was indorser as an accommodation to plaintiff and as security therefor he held certain personal property conveyed to him by plaintiff. The trial court instructed the jury that "if the defendant held the property in question as collateral security, the burden of proof is on him to clearly prove his authority to sell." This was held error, the Supreme Court of Errors saying:

"The use of that word (clearly) required the defendant to assume a heavier burden than the law imposed upon him. The law only required him to prove by a preponderance of proof the material fact on which he relied. The charge required him to do more than that; to prove it clearly, without uncertainty, free from doubt or question. It required him to prove it with substantially the same amount of proof that is required to substantiate a criminal charge; and that is not the law. * * * For this reason there must be a new trial."

In Hall v. Wolff, 61 Iowa, 559, 16 N. W. 710, the action related to the sale of certain personal property. The instruction given was that the sale "should be clearly and fairly proven." Said the court:

"Clearly and fairly proven" imports more than a mere preponderance of evidence. In the case of West v. Druff, 55 Iowa, 335 [7 N. W. 636], an instruction was held to be erroneous which required 'clear and satisfactory evidence' to satisfy the jury of an issuable fact. That instrument (instruction?) cannot be distinguished from the one now under consideration."

In French v. Day, 89 Me. 441, 36 Atl. 909, the action was trespass and the court instructed the jury:

"* * * It is incumbent on the defendants to show, by a clear preponderance of the evidence and by convincing proof, their right to do it in order to prevent a verdict against them."

In discussing the instruction, the court said:

"Preponderance" means to outweigh; to weigh more. A 'clear preponderance' may mean that which may be seen, is discernible, and may be appreciated and understood. In this sense, the expression might be unobjectionable; but it may convey the idea, under emphasis, of certainty, beyond doubt, and very likely would do so to the common mind. At any rate, the expression is equivocal and mischievous. 'Convincing proof' may be said to mean that degree of certainty required to sustain a given postulate. But that view assumes that the hearer knows the rule that governs such case, which jurors are not supposed to know, but of which they should be informed. The two expressions, coupled, must have conveyed to the jury an erroneous basis for their verdict. Exceptions sustained."

In McEvony v. Rowland, 43 Neb. 97, 61 N. W. 124, the instruction required that the transaction "must be clearly established." The court said that:

The party "is not required to satisfy the jury in such case, beyond question, that the sale is an honest one. A preponderance of the evidence is all that is required" (citing Stevens v. Carson, 30 Neb. 544 [46 N. W. 635, 9 L. R. A. 523]). * * * The word 'clearly' means without uncertainty."

Some of the qualifying terms which have been held to import a higher degree of proof than is meant by a preponderance of evidence are stated in 17 Cyc. pp. 763, 764, namely: "an abiding conviction," a "clear conviction," "convinces," "clearly," "fully," "clearly and satisfactorily," etc.

The rule in some other jurisdictions is not the same as our Supreme Court in an early day declared it. But where the rule has been followed that the defense of insanity may be established by a preponderance of the evidence, the appellate courts have held that no higher degree of proof should be required and that it is error to charge the jury by language importing any higher degree of evidence to be necessary to establish such defense.

The Attorney General cites People v. Hoin, 62 Cal. 120, 45 Am. Rep. 651, as an instance where the Supreme Court inferentially approved of the rule that this defense must be clearly proved. In that case the quotation from the opinion of Chief Justice Tindal was used to illustrate what constituted insanity such as would be accepted as a defense, and not the character of proof necessary to establish it. This will at once be seen by reading the instruction which was under discussion. The court was composed of the same members when the case cited was before the court as when the case of People v. Wreden was decided, and it is not to be supposed that if the court had changed its opinion upon so important a rule, it would have failed to mention its decision in the Wreden Case. Whatever may be found in decisions, the rule is firmly established that the defense of insanity may be established by a preponderance of the evidence merely, and that being the rule, trial courts are not allowed to qualify it by requiring a higher degree of proof.

In the instant case nothing appears in the record to lead to a suspicion that the plea of insanity was a subterfuge and put forward as a means of escaping punishment. Expert and non-expert testimony was introduced for and against this defense, sufficient in quantity and forcefulness to have prevented the reviewing court, under the settled rule, from interfering with the verdict whichever way the jury may have decided the issue.

It is contended by the Attorney General that the trial court having so clearly instructed the jury that the defense of insanity may be established by a preponderance of the evidence, the jury could not have been misled by the instruction to which complaint is made. The same contention was urged in People v. Miller, supra, where "the jury," as the Supreme Court points out, "were explicitly and correctly instructed that it was not necessary for defendant to show his insanity beyond all reasonable doubt, but only by a preponderance of evidence, as in civil cases * * * that, in other words, insanity may be established by a preponderance of evidence merely." In the Miller Case the error arose in the definition which the trial court gave to what constitutes preponderance of evidence. In the present case, the error arose from the fact that the learned trial court in three or four different instructions on the subject instructed the jury that the defense must be "clearly proved," "clearly established," "satisfactorily established," and these expressions were so closely related to the instructions as to the preponderance of evidence being sufficient that we do not feel at liberty to say the jury were not influenced by them.

Whether the judgment should be affirmed notwithstanding such error, under the provision of section 4½, article 6 of the Constitution, as was said in the Miller Case: "We are satisfied that the evidence was of such a nature that such a conclusion may not fairly be reached." We do not wish to be understood as holding that there was not sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict or that the insanity of the defendant was not shown by a preponderance of the evidence.

What we mean to say is that upon this issue the record discloses a condition of facts presented by the defendant from which, under the rule of preponderance of the evidence, the jury might reasonably have found in favor of the theory of insanity.

[5-7] 3. A plea of once in jeopardy was interposed, and defendant claims that upon the evidence he was entitled to a verdict of acquittal. It appeared that defendant was put upon his trial for having embezzled certain funds from the county paid to defendant as tax collector by Carrie M. Hammel, such embezzlement having been committed on the 1st day of December, 1913. Upon this charge defendant was acquitted. Thereafter a complaint was filed in the justice's court charging him with the embezzlement of certain funds on the 1st day of December, 1913, paid in to him as tax collector by Seth Mann and Myrtle Mann. On his arraignment, after having been held to answer, he pleaded former acquittal. Later and when he was brought to trial, by leave of court, the district attorney amended the information by changing the date of the alleged embezzlement to November 1, 1913. The trial resulted in a disagreement of the jury, and upon his retrial defendant was convicted, and from that conviction the present appeal is taken. It appeared that defendant received a check for the amount alleged to have been embezzled on October 29, 1913, and that the check was cashed on November 3, 1913. It also appeared that defendant made his verified return in due form of all moneys received by him as such tax collector from October 1st to November 1, 1913. The claim of defendant is that the money received from this check, on November 3, 1913, was not due to the county until after his settlement with the treasurer on the 1st day of December, 1913, and hence falls within the same time as the charge upon which he was tried and acquitted, that is, of having on December 1, 1913, embezzled certain moneys paid in to him as tax collector by Carrie M. Hammel. Section 3753 of the Political Code requires the tax collector, on the first Monday in each month to—

"settle with the auditor for all moneys collected for the state and county, and pay the same to the county treasurer, and on the same day must deliver to and file in the office of the auditor a statement, under oath, showing: (1) An account of all his transactions and receipts since his last settlement; (2) that all money collected by him as tax collector has been paid."

The charge is that defendant embezzled certain money on November 1st, whereas the evidence was that the money alleged to have been embezzled was the proceeds of a check which, while it was received October 29th, was not cashed until November 3d and the proceeds became part of the funds for which defendant was to account at the end of the latter month. It is contended that having been embraced in his return for November, this money was included in the return of the money paid in by Seth Mann and Myrtle Mann for the alleged embezzlement of which he was tried and acquitted; that, hence, the only question is, "Are the two offenses a part of the same criminal act?"

It was held in People v. Meseros, 16 Cal. App. 277, 116 Pac. 679, that:

"Proof of the embezzlement or larceny of checks, in the county of the venue, will not support a charge of embezzlement or larceny of money therein. The contention that checks are money is without support." Syllabus.

Once, in jeopardy and former acquittal are favored pleas (12 Cyc. 364), and "the right not to be put in jeopardy the second time is as sacred as the right of trial by jury, and is guarded with as much care by the common law and by the Constitution" (Black, C. J., in Dinkey v. Commonwealth, 17 Pa. 126, 55 Am. Dec. 542). It seems to be a well-settled rule that where the offense on trial is a necessary element in, and constitutes an essential part of, another offense, and both are in fact but one transaction, a conviction or acquittal of one is a bar to a prosecution of the other. In People v. Stephens, 79 Cal. 428, 21 Pac. 856, 4 L. R. A. 845, the prosecution was for libel and the question was whether there may be as many prosecutions for libel maintained upon a single article published in a single issue of a newspaper as there are false and defamatory statements concerning a single individual in such article. "The second prosecution," said the court, "is for a libel contained in the same article and published in the same issue of the same newspaper as the first. The words alleged to be defamatory are not the same in both informations. If they were, the case would be a plain one. But the publication in both cases was one and the same act. * * * In Regina v. Erlington, 9 Cox. C. C. 86, Cockburn, C. J., said: 'it is a fundamental rule of law that out of the same facts a series of charges shall not be preferred.'" Cases are cited to the rule that "the state cannot split up one crime and prosecute it in parts." See the rule discussed in People v. McDaniels, 137 Cal. 192, 69 Pac. 1006, 59 L. R. A. 578, 92 Am. St. Rep. 81. An elaborate and illuminating note is found in 92 Am. St. Reports, upon the identity of offenses in a plea of former jeopardy. The note is very full upon the "carving" or "splitting" of offenses. The general rule is there stated:

"The instance above given, of the larceny of several articles at one time and place by one act of theft, is one of frequent occurrence. In such a case, by the great weight of authority, there is but one offense. The state may, if it sees fit, prosecute the theft of all the articles at once, or it may select what it wishes and prosecute for the larceny of that part, but it cannot split the single larceny into as many charges as there are articles stolen and make of such charges the basis of successive prosecutions. The second and subsequent prosecutions are, then, for the same offense."

It is unnecessary to cite further authority.

At the trial the defendant, in proof of his plea, offered in evidence the transcript and proceedings at the trial when he was acquitted. The court sustained the objection offered by the district attorney that the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial, remarking: "I think the proper evidence is the indictment or information on file." And as to this—the only evidence allowed by the court except the verdict of acquittal—the court said:

"It appears on the face of the indictment there are two separate and distinct offenses charged, and the acquittal on the former trial on information No. 323 is not the same offense charged in the information No. 341, and the motion to dismiss the information No. 341 and dismiss the case against the defendant is denied."

Of course, the two informations show two different offenses committed at two different times. The second one was amended purposely to so show. But this would not preclude the defendant from showing as matter of fact that both sums of money alleged to have been embezzled were taken at the same time, or rather, it was the duty of the prosecution to show that the embezzlement was committed as alleged in the information.

We think it was error to confine defendant, in the proof in support of his plea, to the face of the information on which he was acquitted. We do not mean to hold that the defendant could not be convicted of embezzling the money received November 3d in payment by Seth and Myrtle Mann, of their taxes, if as a fact, he did appropriate it on that day to his own use. That question does not arise. It is claimed that the money embezzled was shown by a shortage in his accounts at the end of November, and that this shortage arose from his having at that time, December 1st, failed to account for both the Hammel and Mann money, and that in both instances the taking was at the same time out of the combined funds received during that month. Whatever the fact was, defendant had a right to show that the taking of the money in both instances was one and the same transaction. In other words, if the money embezzled on December 1st included in part both the Hammel and Mann moneys, the offense could not be split into two charges and he be convicted of both.

As there must be a new trial, we have thought it proper to consider the point raised on the plea of once in jeopardy. Other errors are claimed, but we do not find it necessary to consider them.

The judgment and order are reversed.

MACK v. EUMMELEN. (Civ. 2002.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 21, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 20, 1916.)

PARTIES — 42—INTERVENTION—TIME.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 387, permitting intervention of an interested party "at any time before trial," a pledgee of stock in litigation, with full knowledge of the pendency of the litigation and of its purposes, may not stand by in silence until the case has been decided and judgment rendered against his representative in interest, and then by intervention compel a retrial of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by A. F. Mack against Henry Eummelen, in which, after judgment, Citizens' Savings Bank filed petition to set aside and vacate the judgment and be admitted as a defendant, with leave to answer. From denial of its motion or petition, the Bank appeals. Affirmed.

Andrews & Lee, of San Diego, for appellant. Doolittle & Morrison, of San Diego, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action it appears that the plaintiff and the defendant Eummelen purchased from one W. H. Bentley 840 shares of stock of a corporation known as the Bentley Ostrich Farm. Eummelen acted for himself and Mack in the negotiations, and represented to Mack that the price was $50,000, of which each of the two purchasers was to pay one-half. Mack paid $25,000. Eummelen paid only $5,000, and each of them received from Bentley 420 shares. The court found facts establishing fraud in the transaction, as charged by the plaintiff, and held the defendant as trustee for the plaintiff of 280 shares of the stock, which had been transferred by Bentley to the defendant. The defendant was ordered to indorse and transfer those 280 shares to the plaintiff, and it was further ordered that in default of his so doing before the 15th day of August, 1913, the judgment should operate as a transfer to plaintiff of all of the defendant's right, title, and interest therein. The facts constituting the fraud were not discovered by the plaintiff until March, 1912. The action was commenced on August 12, 1912, and the judgment was entered on August 4, 1913.

On August 14, 1913, the appellant, Citizens' Savings Bank, filed a petition, asking the superior court to set aside and vacate the judgment and admit petitioner as a defendant, with leave to answer; and in that application and accompanying affidavits it was set forth that on June 20, 1912, Eummelen pledged to the plaintiff, as security for a loan of $24,000, the said 420 shares of stock of the Bentley Ostrich Farm standing in his name; that at the time of filing the petition the bank was still the pledgee of those shares of stock for that indebtedness; that the bank had no notice or knowledge of the pendency or termination of the action until August 11, 1913. Counter affidavits were filed, showing that the president of the bank was acquainted with the fact of the pendency of this action and understood the nature thereof long prior to the time when it came on for trial, and during that period of time discussed the case with the plaintiff; that in that conversation in November, 1912, Mr. Irwin, president of the bank, told the plaintiff that he had the entire matters of Eummelen in his hands, and suggested that the case be settled out of court. It was further stated in plaintiff's affidavit that in January, 1913, he had another conversation with Mr. Irwin, in which that gentleman stated that he had discussed the case with defendant Eummelen, and had advised the latter that he had nothing to fear therein. It is shown in the affidavit of Bentley that on April 21, 1913, which was the day before the trial of this action, Mr. Irwin stated to Bentley that plaintiff had no chance of winning this case. The motion or petition of the bank was presented upon these affidavits, and by order of court was denied. From that order the Citizens' Savings Bank presents this appeal.

Counsel for appellant in their argument have urged sundry errors, which they claim were committed by the court in the trial of the case, and on account of which they think the judgment should be reversed. If the court was justified in overruling the motion to vacate and set aside the judgment for the reasons stated in the petition, it follows that appellant has no rights as a party to the action, and on this appeal it is not necessary to consider any alleged errors committed at the trial. The order denying the application is based upon implied findings in favor of the plaintiff with respect to the issues raised by the petition and covered by the affidavits. We must therefore assume that with full knowledge of the pendency of this action and of its purposes the bank silently stood by until the case had been tried and until judgment had been rendered against the defendant. This being so, the court was justified in denying the petition and in refusing to recognize petitioner's belated assertion of a right to intervene in the action. "At any time before trial, any person, who has an interest in the matter in litigation, or in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both, may intervene in the action or proceeding. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 387. The law does not contemplate that a person thus interested may willfully omit to intervene, and then compel a retrial of the case because it has gone against his interests. Hibernia, etc., Society v. Churchill, 128 Cal. 633, 61 Pac. 278, 79 Am. St. Rep. 73.

The order is affirmed.

COLLATERAL AGREEMENT AS TO NOTE.

Where a stock subscription contract was executed in duplicate, the subscriber retaining one copy on which the corporation's agent indorsed an agreement to return the subscriber's note for his subscription if he were dissatisfied, and the corporation, within that time, before any stock was issued to him, refused to return the note upon being requested, the note was not enforceable against the subscriber by another party with notice of these facts, notwithstanding the agent had not indorsed the agreement on the original subscription contract, filed with the company, the corporation having been fully organized before this subscription was made, and it not appearing that there was any later subscriber who could have been defrauded by reliance upon this subscription, or that there was any subsequent creditor of the corporation who relied on it in dealing with the corporation, or that this subscriber connived at or contemplated any secrecy in making the collateral agreement permitting cancellation, or that he knew the corporation's agent failed to indorse the agreement upon the original subscription retained for the corporation files, whatever secrecy there was about the agreement being imparted to it by the corporation through its agent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by the Tidewater Southern Railway Company against Carey M. Vance. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for appellant. Johnston & Jones, of Fresno, and W. B. Good, of Selma, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action brought to recover the sum of $625 alleged to be due upon a promissory note executed and delivered by the defendant to the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company and by it assigned and transferred to the plaintiff herein.

The facts of the case are undisputed. On December 14, 1911, the defendant executed a subscription for 500 shares of the capital stock of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, for which he agreed to pay $625 on or before ten months after date, giving his promissory note for that amount. The authorized agent of the corporation who solicited and received the subscription had two copies thereof, one marked "Original" and the other "Duplicate," both of which were signed by the defendant and the agent on behalf of the corporation, the original being retained by him for the company and the duplicate being delivered to the defendant. On the back of the duplicate the following memorandum was written:

"Dec. 4, '11. Ten months after date if holder of this contract is for any reason dissatisfied we agree to return note or cash equivalent. H. C. Coffin, Tidewater & Southern Railroad Co."

This writing was not indorsed on the back of the original subscription retained by the agent for the company. Within ten months of the date of his subscription the defendant requested the return of his note, which request the corporation refused to comply with, but on the contrary transferred the note to the plaintiff herein, who brought this suit.

The defendant pleaded the foregoing facts by way of defense to the action, and upon proof of the same judgment went in his favor. Wherefore the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The only material point, involved in this appeal relates to the validity of the agreement indorsed upon the defendant's duplicate copy of his subscription which purported to entitle him to recall his note. The appellant contends that this collateral agreement not having been indorsed upon the original stock agreement and filed with the company, and thus brought to the knowledge of other stockholders and subscribers for stock and to the creditors of the corporation, is void. In support of this contention the appellant relies chiefly upon the case of Quartz Glass Mfg. Co. v. Joyce, 27 Cal. App. 523, 150 Pac. 648. In that case, however, the question involved was the validity of a stock subscription agreement by the terms of which the promissory note given for the purchase price of the stock was to be paid out of dividends to be thereafter declared by the corporation. The court held that this practically amounted to a gift of the stock in violation of the provision of section 359 of the Civil Code, and that the said agreement of the parties having that effect was therefore void. It is true that the court in that case also adverted to the quite well recognized rule that secret collateral agreements as to stock subscriptions by which the subscriber gains an advantage over other subscribers are void for the reason that such secret advantages are in the nature of a fraud upon subsequent subscribers and upon persons who afterward become creditors of the corporation. The authorities cited in that case and amplified by the appellant herein refer in the main to subscriptions for the stock of corporations prior to the incorporation of the company or during the initial stages of its life when sales of its stock are being promoted, and when subsequent subscribers have relied upon the integrity upon their face of prior subscriptions. This, however, is not the situation presented in the instant case. The Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company had been fully organized before the respondent's subscription to its stock was made, and it does not appear that there was any later subscriber who could have been defrauded by his reliance upon the respondent's subscription; nor does it appear that there was any subsequent creditor of said corporation who could or did rely thereon in dealing with said corporation; nor is it shown that there was any secrecy contemplated or connived at by the respondent in the making of the collateral agreement by which he was permitted within ten months thereafter to cancel his subscription by recalling his note; nor that he had any knowledge of the fact that the authorized agent of the corporation failed to also indorse such agreement upon the original subscription which said agent retained on behalf of the corporation. Whatever secrecy there was in respect to this agreement was imparted entirely by the corporation itself through the act or neglect of its authorized agent; and this being so, and no rights of subsequent subscribers or creditors being involved in the case, it would be a manifest fraud upon the defendant to permit the corporation to take advantage of its own wrong by repudiating its agreement while enforcing the defendant's note which was evidently given only because of the reservation in said agreement permitting its recall.

This case is in many respects similar to the case of Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013, wherein the court made use of the following apt language applicable to the instant case:

"The right to return the stock and to receive the sum agreed to be paid upon such return was a material and indivisible part of the consideration upon which the plaintiff agreed to become a stockholder. As between the parties, it would be manifestly unjust to permit the corporation to retain the money paid by plaintiff, and at the same time to repudiate the promise which it gave in exchange for the money. The obligation to pay, upon a return of the shares, the sum agreed to be paid, is not to be viewed as a new undertaking, arising after the plaintiff has assumed the relation of stockholder. * * * The sale to plaintiff was conditional. He never became a stockholder except subject to the qualification that he might return his shares upon the stipulated terms." Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., supra.

The case at bar presents an even stronger instance for the application of the rule above laid down, for the respondent herein never in fact became a stockholder of the corporation, since no stock was to be issued to him until his note was paid.

The judgment is affirmed.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 730 v. INGLIN.
(Civ. 1542.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Sept. 20, 1916.)

1. EVIDENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 543(3)—OPINION—QUALIFICATION OF WITNESS TO TESTIFY AS TO REAL ESTATE VALUES.

A witness, by declaring he had for many years been engaged in buying and selling real estate for himself and others, and that he had seen and was acquainted with the land in controversy, sufficiently qualified himself to testify upon the question of its value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2357; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 543(3).]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN $\hookrightarrow$ 134—COMPENSATION—"ACTUAL VALUE" OF LAND.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, providing that the owner is entitled to the "actual value" of land sought to be condemned at the date of the issuance of summons in condemnation action, the owner is entitled to the market value of the land for the most valuable uses of which it is capable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 356; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 134.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Actual Value.]

3. EVIDENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 142(1)—VALUE OF REAL ESTATE—SALES OF OTHER LAND SIMILARLY SITUATED.

Under such statute, the prices at which other lands of like quality and adaptation and similarly situated may have been sold cannot reasonably be accepted as a just criterion for measuring and finally ascertaining the actual value of the land sought to be taken, since an owner of such other tract may have been obliged to make a forced sale, or may have made a poor bargain through want of good judgment or other causes.

4. EVIDENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 558(7, 8)—OPINIONS—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE—VALUE OF PROPERTY—OTHER SALES.

Cross-examination of a witness as to value of land by questioning him as to the fact of other sales of lands in the same district and the prices at which they were made is proper, not to fix the value of land in dispute, but to test his knowledge and impeach his opinion.

5. EVIDENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 558(12)—OPINIONS—EXAMINATION OF WITNESS—VALUE OF REAL ESTATE—SALES OF OTHER LANDS.

Cross-examination of a witness as to value, by questioning him as to other sales of lands, does not justify redirect examination as to sales of other lands and prices paid thereon, since redirect examination often amounts, in effect, to examination in chief, and the reason of the rule permitting such inquiry on cross-examination ceases with the cross-examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2379; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 558(12).]

6. EVIDENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 555—OPINIONS—EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

While witnesses may, upon their examination in chief, give the reasons upon which they base their opinions, they should never be allowed to go into details of particular sales or transactions.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 1052(6)—HARMLESS ERROR—INCOMPETENT TESTIMONY AS TO VALUE OF LAND.

In condemnation proceeding, error in admitting incompetent evidence that the value of land condemned was $50 an acre was not prejudicial, where the verdict assessed its value at $265.52 an acre, since the jury obviously did not accept the incompetent testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4176; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1052(6).]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 926(1) — REVIEW — PRESUMPTIONS—OPINION EVIDENCE.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 1051(1) — HARMLESS ERROR—INCOMPETENT EVIDENCE.

Where there was a pronounced conflict on the question whether the remainder of defendant's land would be damaged by the severance of the land condemned, several competent witnesses testifying that it would not be damaged, admission of incompetent evidence to the same effect was not prejudicial to defendant.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 1068(5) — HARMLESS ERROR—REFUSING INSTRUCTION—EFFECT OF VERDICT.

Refusal of requested instruction by defendant owner in condemnation proceedings to disregard testimony as to value of land sought to be condemned because based on prices paid for other lands was not prejudicial, where the verdict assessed the value at five times the value so testified to.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 1170(7) — REVERSAL — MISCARRIAGE OF JUSTICE.

Under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4 $\frac{1}{2}$, forbidding reversal for error not resulting in miscarriage of justice, a judgment in condemnation proceeding was not reversible for error in admitting or refusing to strike out testimony, valuing the land sought to be taken at \$50 an acre, based on prices paid for other lands, where the verdict assessed the value of the land at \$265.52 an acre, and there was other competent evidence fixing the value at \$50 an acre.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Reclamation District No. 730 against M. Inglin. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hudson Grant, of Woodland, and George Clark, of San Francisco, for appellant. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is in eminent domain, and the appeal is by the defendant from the judgment in condemnation entered upon the jury's verdict.

The plaintiff is a reclamation district, entirely situated in Yolo county, organized as such under the laws of this state, the object for which it was organized being, as its name naturally implies, "to reclaim from overflow, flood and seepage waters all the lands lying within the boundaries of said district."

The defendant is the owner of a tract of land situated within the boundaries of said district, and it is alleged in the complaint that a certain specifically described strip of said land, consisting of 9.8 acres, is necessary as a "right of way * * * to excavate, build, construct, repair and maintain canals, drains, levees, embankments, and other works necessary for the reclamation of the lands in said district, and also to obtain material for the construction, maintenance and repair thereof, and for the purpose of reclaiming the lands within said district from overflow and seepage waters." The strip of land sought to be taken by this action, and which was by the verdict and the judgment condemned for the purposes above indicated, constitutes a portion of the entire tract of land, situated in said district, owned by the defendant. The answer alleges that upon the strip of land sought to be condemned are located the defendant's house, barn, and fences, and also a large, carefully constructed levee, and that all of said improvements "are to be taken or damaged by said plaintiff," that the value of the house, barn, and fences is the sum of $9,655.65, the value of the land itself is in excess of the sum of $3,430.00, and that the value of the said levee is the sum of $2,725.65. It is further alleged that the said house, barn, and fences cannot be used by defendant, if left upon said right of way, and that to make any convenient use of the same, upon the taking of said right of way and the construction of said proposed improvements, it will be necessary to move said buildings and fences from said land, and that the placing and setting of the buildings on new foundations and the rebuilding of said fences, will be at an expense and to the damage of the defendant in the sum of $1,000; that the total damages suffered by the defendant by reason of the taking of said right of way and the construction of said proposed improvements, exclusive of the damage that will be suffered by the land not taken, "of which the part taken is a part, is the sum of $8,680.65"; that the damage which will accrue to the portion of the land not sought to be condemned will, by reason of the severance therefrom of the portion condemned and the construction of the improvements in the manner proposed by the plaintiff, amount to the sum of $1,000. The jury assessed and fixed the aggregate damages suffered by the defendant by reason of the taking of the strip of land at the sum of $2,862.95, the several items of said damages being found as follows:

Value of the land taken.....	$2,422 95
Cost of removal and relocation of structures upon said land.....	400 00
Cost of removal of hay from barn....	40 00

The jury found that no damage whatever will accrue to the land not condemned by reason of the severance therefrom of the strip taken.

The points urged by the defendant against the legal integrity of the judgment involve alleged errors of the trial court in permitting certain testimony to be given, and in disallowing a certain instruction proposed by him, and bearing upon the testimony referred to.

The witnesses for the defendant estimated the value of the land sought to be condemned, variously, at $400, $375, $350, $325, and $300 per acre. The plaintiff's witnesses expressed the opinion that it was worth no more than $50 per acre. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff testified that the particular strip involved here could be used, if it remained the property of the defendant, for the purposes of a levee only; that "it is useless for anything else."

The testimony to which objection was made by the defendant at the trial was that of W. S. Kendall, one of the trustees of the plaintiff. On direct examination, he stated it to be his opinion that the market value of the strip of land involved in this action was $50 per acre. On cross-examination, he was asked whether he knew that several other tracts of land situated in said district, belonging to other parties, and which were adapted and had been devoted to the raising of alfalfa, had been sold at prices ranging from $130 to $150 per acre in near proximity to the time at which the summons in this action was issued. His replies to the questions so propounded were that he had heard of such sales. On redirect, counsel for the plaintiff thus questioned the witness:

"Mr. Huston: Explain to the jury why you placed the valuation of $50 an acre on this tract of land?

"Witness: Because it is what everybody in the district got."

This answer was, on motion of the defendant, stricken out. Thereupon counsel for the plaintiff, naming six different owners of land in said district, asked the witness if he knew of the sales by said owners of their said lands, to which an affirmative reply was returned.

"Mr. Huston: What did you hear was the sale price of these several tracts of land?

"Witness: Fifty dollars an acre."

The witness then proceeded to say, on redirect, that the lands sold by the other parties named were, in all respects, similar in quality and in productive capacity to the land of the defendant, and from which the strip in question was proposed to be taken. All this testimony was duly and regularly objected to by the defendant, and the objections overruled. On cross-examination, the witness was questioned:

"Are you judging of the value of the Inglin lands by what these lands will produce? A. No, sir. Q. Are you endeavoring to fix the value on these lands simply by the standard of valuation which prevailed in the transfers to the district which were mentioned and enumerated by Mr. H. L. Huston in his questions to you? A. Yes."

Upon the conclusion of the witness' testimony, and before he left the witness stand, counsel for the defendant moved to strike out all of said testimony on the ground that the basis of the witness' estimate of the value of the land in dispute was the prices at which other lands in the district had been sold, and that such prices do not constitute the legal criterion for estimating or determining value in a case of this character. The motion was denied.

[1-3] Although the witness, we think, sufficiently qualified himself to give testimony upon the question of value by declaring that he had, for many years, been engaged in buying and selling real estate for himself and others, and that he had seen and was acquainted with the land in controversy, it is very clear that his testimony plainly, and indeed conclusively, showed that his opinion upon the value of the land in question was based entirely upon what other lands in said district of a similar character as to quality had been sold for to said district. The law provides that the owner is entitled to the actual value of the land sought to be condemned at the date of the issuance of summons in the action to condemn (section 1249, Code Civ. Proc.), and the standard adopted by the witness is not the proper one for the estimation, and, finally, the ascertainment of such value. The owner of the land is entitled to the actual market value of the land for the most valuable use, or uses, to which it is adapted or may be put, and the prices at which other lands of like quality and adaptation and similarly situated may have been sold cannot reasonably be accepted as a just criterion for measuring and, finally, ascertaining the actual value of the land sought to be taken. The reasons for this are obvious and hardly need be stated, although, it may be suggested that, in looking for such reasons, it may readily be conceived how a person might, through force of circumstances beyond his control, sell his land at a price far below its actual value, or how he might make such a sale through improvidence or for want of good judgment.

[4-6] It is true that counsel for the defendant, in the cross-examination of Kendall, first brought out the fact of other sales of lands in the district and the prices at which they were made. As cross-examination, the questions and answers were proper, not, however, for the purpose of fixing the value of the land in dispute, but only "for the purpose of testing the witness' knowledge and impeaching his opinion." Estate of Ross, 171 Cal. 64, 66, 151 Pac. 1138. See, also, Central Pac. R. Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 262; Clark v. Willett, 35 Cal. 534, 544; Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 544, 34 Pac. 224; Spring Valley W. W. v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 528, 532, 28 Pac. 681; De Freitas v. Suisun City, 170 Cal. 263, 149 Pac. 553. But such cross-examination does not justify the plaintiff on redirect examination, which often amounts in practical effect to an examination in chief, to take up the question of sales of other lands and thus show by the witness the prices paid by purchasers of such other lands; for the reason of the rule, permitting the fact of the sales of other lands to be gone into on cross-examination, ceases with the cross-examination. While in all cases witnesses may, upon their examination in chief, give the reasons upon which they base their opinions, they should never be allowed to go into details of particular sales or transactions. 2 Lewis on Em. Domain (3d Ed.) § 654. It follows, of course, that the court not only erred in allowing the question of sales of other lands and the prices paid for such lands to be gone into on the re-direct examination of the witness Kendall, but erred in refusing to grant the motion to strike out the testimony of said witness; it having been made clearly to appear from said testimony that the witness had based his opinion upon the question of value wholly upon incompetent matters. San Diego Land, etc., Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 63, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604; Peirson v. Boston Elevated Railway, 191 Mass. 223, 233, 234, 77 N. E. 769.

[7] But we think the errors thus considered were not prejudicial, for it is obvious from the verdict that the jury did not accept the testimony or opinion of the witness Kendall, upon the question of the value of the property proposed to be taken. As seen, the strip to condemn which this action was brought consisted of a fraction of over nine acres of the defendant's land, the total value of which, together with the improvements, the jury assessed at $2,422.95, or, approximately, if not precisely, at $265.52 per acre.

[8, 9] But it seems to be the theory of counsel for the defendant that but for the testimony of Kendall the jury might have found that the defendant suffered some damage from deterioration in the value of his land by reason of the severance therefrom of the strip in question. No such assumption is justified on the record as it is presented here. We have already stated that other witnesses testified that the land of the defendant was not damaged by reason of the severance of the strip in dispute therefrom. These same witnesses further testified that the land in question was of no greater value than $50 per acre. There is a mere brief recital in the transcript of the testimony of these witnesses, and the record before us does not disclose the basis of their estimate of the value of the land in controversy, or the reasons, if any they gave, for the opinion that the actual value of said land does not exceed the sum of $50 per acre. We must therefore assume that the testimony of the witnesses referred to was in all respects competent, and that they adopted a proper criterion for estimating the value of the land. There is therefore a pronounced conflict in the evidence, both upon the question of value and the question whether the remainder of the defendant's land would be damaged by reason of the severance therefrom of the strip in dispute.

Thus viewing the record as it appears before us, in so far as it concerns the evidence, it is plainly manifest that the jury were afforded a very wide latitude within which to exercise their judgment as to the actual value of the land sought to be taken, viz. from the sum of $50 to the sum of $400 per acre, and there is nothing appearing upon the face of the record which would warrant us in declaring that the actual value of the land was in excess of the amount at which it was fixed by the jury.

[10] For the same reason for which we hold the errors in admitting the above-considered testimony to be without prejudice to the rights of the defendant, the action of the court in refusing to give a certain one of the instructions proffered by the defendant, while erroneous, was without prejudice. The substance of the said instruction was:

"During the progress of this case some reference has been made in the testimony and in the argument to prices paid to others than defendant for the land constituting a part of the right of way for the river front levee of reclamation district No. 730. You are instructed that the prices which may have been paid for rights of way to other persons for the levee along the river front constitute no test for the fixing of the value of the defendant's lands in this cause. * * * And you will, accordingly, disregard, in determining the value of the defendant's land, any reference, either in the testimony or in the argument, to payments made to others for rights of way."

[11] As before declared, it is obvious that the jury were not governed, in the determination of the question of value, by the testimony of those witnesses who expressed the opinion that the value of the land in dispute did not exceed the sum of $50 per acre, although, as suggested, so far as the record here shows, they would have been justified in predicating their verdict upon the testimony so given, other than that by the witness Kendall. The total value fixed by the jury, however, as is obvious, was over five times the sum of $50 per acre, or, approximately, $34.40 less than $300, the minimum amount at which the value of the land was estimated by the defendant's witnesses.

There was neither prejudice to the defendant nor a miscarriage of justice by reason of the errors complained of (Const. § 4½, art. 6; Vallejo & N. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238), and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GISH. (Cr. 349.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Sept. 2, 1916.) Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge. C. H. Gish was convicted of an offense, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed, and record stricken from the files. E. S. Bell, of Napa, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The record in the above-entitled cause has been filed in this court. It contains, however, no notice of appeal, either from the judgment or the order denying the motion for a new trial. Neither has there been any appearance of appellant in this court. We may say, though, that we have read the record, and there appears to be no doubt of defendant's guilt, or that he had a fair trial. The purported appeal is dismissed, and the record stricken from the files.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Florance A. Stough, deceased. Over objections by Oliver J. Stough and others, J. E. Fishburn was appointed executor, and the objectors appeal. On motion to stay proceedings. Motion for stay granted during pendency of appeal.

Wheaton A. Gray, of Los Angeles, and John H. McCorkle and Arthur J. Casebeer, both of San Diego, for appellant Stough.

Ward, Ward & Ward, of San Diego, for appellant Southern Trust & Savings Bank. Ralph E. Jenney, for appellant Bank of Commerce & Trust Co. Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Florance A. Stough died testate in the county of San Diego. J. E. Fishburn, one of the persons named in the will as executor, filed a petition for the admission of the will to probate, and for the issuance to himself of letters testamentary. Objections to the appointment of Fishburn were filed by Oliver J. Stough, who asked that letters of administration with the will annexed be issued to either Southern Trust & Savings Bank, or Bank of Commerce & Trust Company, and each of said corporations filed a petition, asking that such letters be issued to it. The court below made its order, appointing Fishburn executor of the will, overruling the objections of Stough, and denying the petitions of the respective banks for appointment as administrator. This order was made on the 2d day of August, 1916, and Oliver J. Stough and the two banks filed a notice of appeal therefrom on August 4, 1916. Notwithstanding the taking of the appeal, the respondent J. E. Fishburn has proceeded with the administration of the estate under said order of appointment. On September 5, 1916, his bond as executor was approved by the court, on September 19, 1916, he took and filed his oath as executor, and on September 21, 1916, letters testamentary were issued to him. On September 28, 1916, he commenced an action, as executor, against Oliver J. Stough and others, seeking to quiet the title of the estate to certain real property.

The matter now before us is an application for a stay of proceedings, restraining the court below from taking any further steps in the matter of the appointment of an executor, and restraining Fishburn from acting as such executor until the determination of the appeal.

[1, 2] The appeal in question was taken under the new and alternative method provided by sections 941a, 941b, and 941c of the Code of Civil Procedure, enacted in 1907. These sections authorize the taking of an appeal by the filing, with the clerk of the court, of a notice stating that "the person giving the same does thereby appeal to the Supreme Court or District Court of Appeal, as the case may be, from the judgment, order or decree," or from a specific part thereof. To an appeal taken under this method neither a service of the notice nor an undertaking is necessary. Under the law existing theretofore an appeal was "ineffectual for any purpose" unless within five days after service of notice of appeal an undertaking in the sum of $300 were filed, or a deposit of that amount made with the clerk, or such undertaking were waived. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 940, 941.

Sections 942 and 945 prescribe the various cases in which an undertaking must be given to stay execution of judgment. Section 949 provides that in cases not covered by the sections just referred to, "the perfecting of an appeal by giving the undertaking or making the deposit mentioned in section 941 stays proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from."

An order appointing an executor or administrator is one of such character that its effect would have been stayed by the taking of an appeal and the filing of a $300 bond under sections 940 and 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In re Woods, 94 Cal. 567, 29 Pac. 1108. No stay bond would have been required. After the perfecting of the appeal and the filing of the $300 undertaking, the executor or administrator would have had no authority, during the pendency of the appeal, to take any steps by virtue of his appointment. In re Woods, supra.

The filing of a notice of appeal under the alternative method, in cases where a stay bond is not required by sections 942 to 945, is operative to the same extent as the filing and service of notice, followed by the giving of the $300 undertaking, under the old method. Section 941c provides that appeals perfected pursuant to the provisions of the foregoing section (941b) "shall have the same force and effect as appeals taken pursuant to the provisions of sections 939, 940, and 941 of this Code." It is argued by the respondents that the "taking" of an appeal, under the old method, was accomplished by the filing and service of a notice of appeal (section 940), and that the "perfecting" of the appeal, by the subsequent giving of an undertaking, is the act that works a stay of proceedings. Section 941c gives to appeals under the new method the force and effect of appeals taken under the old. This language, it is claimed, does not carry into the new appeals the effect of the undertaking which was given to "perfect" an appeal already "taken." But this, we think, is an unduly narrow interpretation of the later enactments, and one out of harmony with their true purpose. Section 941c imports into appeals taken under the preceding section (941b) the force and effect of appeals taken "pursuant to sections 939, 940, and 941 of this Code." Under section 940, the appeal is not effectual without the undertaking. Section 941 deals with the undertaking (or deposit in lieu of it) and with that subject alone. When, therefore, section 941c speaks of appeals taken pursuant to the provisions of sections 939, 940, and 941, it refers to appeals supported by the necessary undertaking. It is the "force and effect" of such appeals that is imported into appeals taken by the new method. The purpose of the provisions creating the alternative method was to simplify the procedure on appeal, and to do away with the difficulties and uncertainties that had frequently arisen over questions of the proper service of notice of appeal and the sufficiency of the undertaking required by sections 940 and 941. Experience had shown that the $300 undertaking exacted of an appellant was of little or no real benefit to the respondent. The new method was designed to enable appellants to dispense with this undertaking altogether. It was never contemplated that an appeal perfected under the new method should be less effectual or operative for any purpose than the appeal for which it was an alternative.

The question just discussed has, on several occasions, come before the court in bank, and the ruling has uniformly been the one here made. In each instance, however, the decision was made informally, from the bench, and we take this opportunity of expressing the views of the court in writing.

It follows that all of the proceedings had in the court below after the filing of the notice of appeal, and looking to the conferring of the powers of an executor upon Fishburn, and all steps taken by said Fishburn as executor were without authority and void.

The motion for a stay of proceedings is granted, and the respondent Fishburn is restrained from doing any act as executor of the will of said decedent during the pendency of the appeal.

LONDON & LANCASHIRE GUARANTEE & ACCIDENT CO. OF CANADA v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 7675.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §375(1) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—RELATION OF PARTIES.

Where the manager of a ranch applied to the foreman of a railroad section gang for assistance in putting out a fire, an injury to one of the men before he returned to his work for the railroad was not received while in the employ of the railway, within the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §375(1).]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨362—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—"USUAL COURSE OF BUSINESS."

A railway section hand, procured in an emergency by the manager of a ranch to assist in putting out a fire, was not engaged in the "usual course of business" of the ranch within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14, excluding from its benefits any person whose employment is both casual and not in the usual course of the business of his employer.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨373—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—"OUT OF AND IN THE COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT."

Where one was employed to fight fire on a ranch in an emergency, and after the work had ended stopped with the other men for a brief period, and was injured by stepping into a squirrel hole, his injuries did not arise "out of and in the course of his employment" within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 12a, providing for compensation in such cases.

In Bank. Application by the London & Lancashire Guarantee & Accident Company of Canada for writ of review to the Industrial Accident Commission of California and others to review an award of the commission. Award annulled.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Certiorari to review an award of the accident commission. The estate of Luigi Marre, deceased, was the owner of a ranch, containing some 8,000 acres, in San Luis Obispo county, and was operating it through G. O. Marre, the administrator of the estate. The line of the Pacific Coast Railway Company runs along one side of the property. On November 23, 1914, a fire started on the Marre ranch, and was spreading through the brush and grass growing thereon. G. O. Marre, the administrator, gathered a group of men to fight the fire. He applied for help to the foreman of a section gang working on the Pacific Coast Railway, and the foreman sent a number of the section hands. Among these was the applicant Elia Mazzini. Mazzini went to work under Marre's direction, and was engaged in fighting the fire from 6 o'clock p. m. until midnight, by which time the fire was under control. The work had ended, and the men collected in a group preparatory to walking to their homes. They stopped for a brief period, and partook of drinks furnished by Marre. They were, at the time, still upon the Marre ranch. During this stop, Mazzini walked backward a short distance, and in so doing fell, breaking his leg. The commission found that his fall was due to his stepping into a squirrel hole.

Mazzini was paid at the rate of $1 an hour for the six hours during which he had worked. This payment was made by the estate of Marre.

[1] Mazzini filed his application for compensation, bringing in both the railway company and the Marre estate as parties defendant. The commission concluded that Mazzini's injury was not received while he was in the employ of the railway company, and dismissed the proceedings as to that company and its insurance carrier. In this the commission was clearly right. It did, however, find the facts necessary to impose a liability upon the estate of Marre, and made an award against the petitioner herein, the insurance carrier for said estate. It may be added that the estate of Marre had elected, in accordance with section 87 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279), to come under the compensation provisions of the act, which, by reason of the agricultural character of the industry, would not otherwise have affected it. The petitioner attacks the award on two grounds. Both, we think, are well taken.

[2] 1. The statute excludes from its benefits "any person whose employment is both casual and not in the usual course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer." Section 14. Plainly Mazzini's employment was casual, and the commission so found. Was it in the "usual course of the business" of the employer? The estate of Marre is conducting a ranch. Its "business" is that of farming. A fire on the ranch would endanger the property used in the business, and hamper the prosecution of that business. The owner would, of course, be interested in preventing the spread of fire on his property. But we do not think that it can fairly be said that the stopping of fires is, for this reason within the usual course of the business of a farmer. A man conducting any business is concerned about the preservation and protection of the property employed in the business. It would hardly be said, however, that the fighting of a fire which threatens the place in which a commercial or manufacturing enterprise is conducted is within the usual course of said business. The phrase "course of business of the employer" is found in the English Compensation Act. In cases arising under that act the expression is held to cover the normal operations which form part of the ordinary business carried on, and not to include incidental and occasional operations having for their purpose the preservation of the premises or the appliances used in the business. Thus in Spiers v. Elderslie Steamship Co., Ltd. (2 Brit. Workmen's Comp. Cases, 205), it was held that scaling the boiler of a ship was not within the course of the trade or business of the shipowner. The same principle was applied in Hayes v. S. J. Thompson Co., 6 B. W. C. C. 130, where the overhauling of a barge was held not to be in the course of the business of the barge owner. The English statute defines the term "workman" as one employed "in the course of or for the purposes of the trade or business." Another section of the same act uses the words "for the purposes of the employer's trade or business." Certain English Cases, relied on by the respondents, are based upon this form of expression, which is not found in our act. But even under the broader language just quoted, one of the learned judges who decided the case of Hill v. Begg, 1 B. W. C. C. 320, said:

"I am not prepared to extend the burden of the act to householders who simply call in a man, not part of their regular establishments, to do a particular job as and when necessity arises."

Similarly, in Rennie v. Reed, 1 B. W. C. C. 324, where the workman claiming compensation has been called in about once a month to clean the windows of a doctor's home, in which he had his office, it was held that he was not employed for the purposes of the employer's trade or business.

Beyond all this, the employment must, under our statute, not only be in the course of the business of the employer, but in the usual course of such business. To say that the fighting of an accidental fire, which may occur only at intervals of years, is within the definition of the statute is to take all meaning and effect from the word "usual." The occasion calling for the employment of the applicant was accidental and unforeseen. It was not necessarily incidental to the conduct of the business. The employment was the product of an emergency, and its every characteristic marked it as the direct opposite of an employment in the usual course of the employer's business. See Maryland Cas. Co. v. Millsbury, 158 Pac. 1031.

[3] 2. We also agree with petitioner's contention that Mazzini's injuries did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. Section 12a, Workmen's Compensation Act. Mazzini was employed to fight the fire. He worked at this employment for six hours at the rate of $1 per hour, and was paid for this time. He was injured after his work had ended, when he had left the precise place of his labors and was ready to go to his home. As a general rule, it may be stated that:

"There are excluded from the benefits of the act all those accidental injuries which occur while the employé is going to or returning from his work." Ocean Accident & Guarantee Co. v. Industrial Accident Com. (S. F. No. 7575), 159 Pac. 1041, decided September 8, 1916.

There is nothing to take the present case out of the principle just stated. The respondent suggests that there is some evidence that the men fighting the fire had been directed to "watch the fire in case it get away again." But the commission did not accept this testimony; its finding being "that the said accident happened a few minutes after the actual work of fighting said fire had been concluded." The fact that Mazzini was still upon the premises of the Marre estate does not, in and of itself, justify a different conclusion. Hills v. Blair, 182 Mich. 20, 148 N. W. 243; Gilmour v. Dorman, Long & Co., Ltd., 4 B. W. C. C. 279.

The award is annulled.

BURIAN v. LOS ANGELES CAFÉ CO.

(L. A. 3714.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨260(1) — ACTION FOR INJURY—CONSTRUCTION OF COMPLAINT—INJURY IN "COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT" — "LINE OF DUTY."

In a waiter's action for injury from carrying a heavy box of silverware, based on his employer's negligence, the complaint, alleging that such work was outside the scope of his employment, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 452, requiring pleadings to be liberally construed, would be construed as alleging that he was given a task not within the legitimate range of his duties but imposed upon him under circumstances moving him to undertake it, so as to bring the case within Roseberry Act (St. 1911, p. 796) § 1 (1), excluding defense of assumption of risk as to injuries to a servant while engaged in the "line of his duty" or the "course of his employment."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 844; Dec. Dig. ⇨260(1).

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment; Line of Duty.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨204(1) — INJURY IN "COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT"—"LINE OF DUTY."

Roseberry Act, § 1(1), abolishing the defense of assumption of risk as to a servant injured while engaged in the line of his duties or the course of his employment, only denies the right to invoke the act to one who during the hours of his employment is engaged in some undertaking not a part of his duty under his employment, so that, notwithstanding the carriage of a heavy box of silverware was outside of a waiter's duties, still in performing it he was engaged in the "line of his duty" and an injury therefrom was an injury in the "course of his employment."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 544; Dec. Dig. ⇨204(1).]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨204(1)—INJURY IN COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT—STATUTE.

Under the Roseberry Act, providing that where a recovery is sought upon the ground of want of ordinary care the servant's assumption of risk shall be no defense, assumption of the risk presupposes a failure on the part of the employer to perform some duty which he owes to the employé, some negligence of the employer, and the employer is not liable for every risk arising from the employment.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚡206—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—LIFTING.

A waiter about 20 years of age, injured while carrying a box of silverware weighing 150 pounds from a café to a mercantile establishment, was not entitled to recover damages from his employer for an injury received in consequence thereof, since he was the best judge of his strength and lifting capacity, and the risk of overtaxing it rested upon him.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Max Burian, an infant, by Adele Tusch, his guardian, against the Los Angeles Café Company. Judgment for defendant upon general demurrer to the complaint, and, from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Olin Wellborn, Jr., and Alfred H. McAdoo, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Davis & Rush, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff, by his guardian ad litem, sued defendant to recover damages for injuries which he sustained while in defendant's employ. He charged that he was a waiter in the Bristol Café in Los Angeles, owned and operated by defendant. As such waiter he was earning, and was capable of earning, $200 a month. He was directed by his employer to carry a box containing silver dinner knives to a mercantile establishment known as Hamburger's. The package weighed about 150 pounds. The taking and carrying of this box from the Bristol Café to Hamburger's "was outside of the scope of the employment of plaintiff, but that plaintiff did not refuse to obey such order and direction for fear of losing his said position as a waiter in the employ of defendant; that plaintiff was wholly inexperienced in the carrying of heavy weights, and, while apprehensive as to his ability to carry safely the said box and its contents, nevertheless obeyed said negligent order given by defendant as above set forth. Plaintiff further alleges that defendant's officers, agents, and servants negligently failed to warn plaintiff of the danger or of any danger in carrying or attempting to carry the said box and its contents." While so carrying this box, by reason of its great weight plaintiff's left knee gave way under it and was dislocated. As a result of this injury, plaintiff "has and will have for the balance of his life a permanently weakened right knee and right knee joint." It has "wholly incapacitated him from engaging in his said business or trade of waiter and from engaging in any trade or business that would require the carrying by him of objects of much weight." Plaintiff was a minor "inexperienced in the carrying of heavy weights." and defendant was negligent in failing to warn him of the danger attendant upon carrying this box and in failing to furnish him "adequate or any help or assistance in the carrying of said box."

[1, 2] To this complaint a general demurrer was interposed and sustained. Upon behalf of plaintiff it was in his argument stated that the action is based on the negligence or want of ordinary care of the employer, and that notwithstanding that the employé, under the directions of the employer, undertook to carry the box, there is not open to the employer the defense of the assumption of risk, by virtue of section 1 of the Roseberry Act which was then in force. Stats. 1911, p. 796. That statute declares in terms that where a recovery is sought "upon the ground of want of ordinary or reasonable care of the employer * * * it shall not be a defense: (1) That the employé either expressly or impliedly assumed the risk of the hazard complained of." The trial court in sustaining the demurrer adopted and expressed the view that plaintiff by his own complaint put himself without the protection of this act, the court's reasoning here adopted by respondent being that the act applies only to an employé "while engaged in the line of his duty or the course of his employment as such," and that the complaint herein explicitly and repeatedly declares that the task upon which appellant was engaged at the time that he met with injury "was outside of the scope of the employment of plaintiff"; consequently that plaintiff having pleaded that he was employed as a waiter, and having pleaded that he met with injury in the performance of a task outside of that employment, he had debarred himself from the protection of the act. In this, however, the court adopted too narrow a view. Pleadings are no longer to be strictly construed against the pleader, but are to be liberally construed with a view to promoting justice. Code Civ. Proc. 452. Manifestly what the pleader meant to declare was that he was set to a task not within the legitimate range of his duties as a waiter, but still a task the performance of which was imposed upon him by his employer under circumstances moving him to the undertaking of it. Nor yet does the Roseberry Act by its language deny the right to invoke its remedial provisions under such a state of facts. When that act limits its protection to an employé who shall sustain injury "while engaged in the line of his duty or the course of his employment as such," it means no more than to deny the right to invoke the act to one who, during the hours of his employment, is engaged in some undertaking which is not a part of his duty under his employment, as where an employé is occupied in affairs of his own, or as where he undertakes to do something not within the course of his duty, and thus becomes a mere volunteer. Such cases are numerous and of varied character. It is sufficient to cite Georgia Pac. Ry. Co. v. Propst, 85 Ala. 203, 4 South. 711; Southern Ry. Co. v. Guyton, 122 Ala. 231, 25 South. 34; Mellor v. Manufacturing Co., 150 Mass. 362, 23 N. E. 100, 5 L. R. A. 792. Therefore we hold that, notwithstanding the task which appellant was called upon to perform was outside of the duties of his vocation and employment as a waiter, nevertheless in performing it he was engaged in the line of his duty and was injured in the course of his employment.

[3] This, however, but brings us to the fundamental question in the case. The assumption of a risk necessarily presupposes a failure upon the part of the employer to perform some duty which he owes to his employé. In other words, it presupposes, and to be of avail must be based on, the negligence of the employer. For it is not every risk against injury arising from which the employer is liable to his employé. Every human being lives under ceaseless risk, under perpetual peril to life and limb. Accidents of astounding character are ever occurring. It is not against all of these that an employer is an insurer of his employé. Many of them form in no real sense a risk of the employment. To render an employer liable for the resultant injury occasioned by any one of them, he must have failed in some duty to the employé. This is indicated by the language of the Roseberry Act where provisions are applicable to cases charging the employer with "want of ordinary or reasonable care." If he has not so failed, the injury falls into one of two categories, for neither class of which is the employer responsible. The injury will have resulted either from the fault of the employé alone, or will have been the result of inevitable casualty arising through no fault of either employer or employé.

[4] The negligence here charged consists of this: That the employer asked this minor to carry a box weighing about 150 pounds, without giving him assistance, or without warning him of the danger of attempting so to do. If this is a sufficient charge of negligence, the demurrer was improperly sustained. If there be one thing that every male human being from boyhood up knows himself better than does any one else, it is his physical strength and the limits thereof. Nature herself sets her danger signals whenever that physical strength is in danger of being overtaxed. So it is the general rule that:

"A servant is not entitled to recover damages from his master for injuries received in consequence of straining and overtaxing himself in lifting heavy objects in his master's service, since the servant is the best judge of his own lifting capacity, and the risk of not overtaxing it rests upon him." 4 Thomp. Comm. on Negligence, p. 860, § 4; Ferguson v. Phoenix Mills, 106 Tenn. 236, 61 S. W. 53; Stenvog v. Minn. Trans. Co., 108 Minn. 199, 121 N. W. 903, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 362, 17 Ann. Cas. 240; Worlds v. Georgia Ry. Co., 99 Ga. 283, 25 S. E. 646.

Nor does this principle suffer modification where the injury is sustained by a minor; for, as has been said, it will be an exceptional case where a minor is so young, so unintelligent, and so incompetent as not to appreciate his own physical limitations and the dangers of overstraining them. Such are the adjudications, as in Texas & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Sherman (Tex. Civ. App.) 87 S. W. 887, where it is said:

"It is not contended that an adult could have recovered under like circumstances, but appellee contends that, because the injured party was a minor and ignorant of the weight of the iron, the duty was imposed on defendant to advise him of its weight, and to warn him of the danger of trying to lift something that was too heavy for his strength. It seems to us that there can be no difference between the duty of a company to an adult who did not know the weight of the iron, and a minor who lacked such knowledge. For surely the most prudent man would presume that a 17 year old minor, doing a man's work and getting a man's wages, would have sense enough not to injure himself by his own exertions, and acting on that presumption, would not think to warn him of such danger."

See, also, Leitner v. Grieb, 104 Mo. App. 173, 77 S. W. 764.

It is true that in these cases, and the many others which could be cited, the question has been discussed after proof establishing the age of the minor; whereas, in this case the question is raised upon demurrer and the pleading is merely of minority. But aside from the declaration of the respondent that the proof was unquestioned that at the time of the injury the minor was over 20 years of age, there are facts pleaded in the complaint and equally conclusive upon the proposition that he had reached years and had attained experience fully sufficient to justify in this particular his being placed in the category of an adult. Thus by the pleading he was a waiter, earning and capable of earning $200 a month. No immature child can do this. A waiter's work is a man's work and of itself necessarily involves the lifting and carrying of burdens and the moving of weights. As to this particular weight it is pleaded that plaintiff was "apprehensive" of his ability to carry it. Enough, therefore, is established by the complaint to show that the things, which it is charged that the defendant did and failed to do, no more amounted to negligence in the case of this minor than in the case of an adult. This case, therefore, is in no essential similar to Foley v. Cal. Horse-shoe Co., 115 Cal. 184, 47 Pac. 42, 56 Am. Rep. 87, relied on by appellant. There the minor was set to an unusual task in and about machinery, and it was held that his conduct was not to be measured by the rules applicable to the conduct of an adult under such circumstances, both because of the minor's tender years, of his inexperience in the particular task to which he was set, and of the doubtful proposition to be resolved by the jury as to whether he had a full appreciation of the increased dangers and risks of the strange employment. In the case at bar this plaintiff, touching the task which was set before him, under the circumstances of the case and under all the authorities, is chargeable with the knowledge of an adult.

The judgment and ordered appealed from are therefore affirmed.

CRANE v. STANSBURY et al. (L. A. 3789.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 9, 1916.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT $\S$ 166(3)—ACTION FOR FEES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover an attorney's fees for services to defendants, wherein the complaint sought a recovery of a certain amount upon an account stated, upon an express contract and upon a quantum meruit, evidence held to sustain a verdict for plaintiff for the amount sought to be recovered, with interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 370; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 166(3).]

2. INTEREST $\S$ 18(3)—ACCOUNT STATED.

Upon establishing an account stated, interest would follow the principal sum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 34; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 18(3); Account Stated, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 58-60.]

3. INTEREST $\S$ 45—EXPRESS CONTRACT.

On establishing a count upon an express contract for the payment of attorney's fees, where the amount became due and payable when the controversies were settled by compromise, the sum from that date would bear interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 94; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 45.]

4. ACCOUNT STATED $\S$ 1—CONTRACT FOR SERVICES OF ATTORNEY.

Where the relations between attorney and client under an express contract covered several years, and the attorney made disbursements and received payments on account, so that there was in fact an open account subject to adjustment and settlement, or where the attorney was entitled to recover only upon a quantum meruit, the matter is a proper subject of an account rendered and stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 1-8; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 1.]

5. ACCOUNT STATED $\S$ 7—EFFECT—QUANTUM MERUIT.

In such case, and even if the attorney was entitled to recover only under a count in quantum meruit, the amount of his recovery thereunder became fixed when the account became a stated account, so that he might recover upon an account rendered and stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 41-49; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 7.]

6. ACCOUNT STATED $\S$ 1—EXPRESS CONTRACT.

Under a special contract for the express payment of a sum named, or under a specialty, the mere rendering of a statement of the amount due, even when acquiescence in the correctness of the statement is shown, will not justify an action upon an account stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 1-8; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 1.]

7. ACCOUNT STATED $\S$ 6(4)—RENDERING OF ACCOUNT—DELAY.

Where an account was rendered, the recipient was bound to make his objections thereto within a reasonable time, and, if he did not do so within six months without satisfactory excuse therefor, there was an unreasonable delay, and his acquiescence would be presumed, and the account would become an account stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 39; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 6(4).]

8. ACCOUNT STATED $\S$ 20(1)—QUESTION FOR JURY—FRAUD AND MISTAKE.

Questions of fraud and mistake in combating the force of an account stated are for the jury, and, where assent is based upon acquiescence arising from a failure to object, the length of time which must pass before an account rendered becomes an account stated is a question of law.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Burton B. Crane against Charles Stansbury and another. Judgment for plaintiff, new trial denied, and defendants appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Thos. O. Toland, Lewis W. Andrews, and Andrews, Toland & Andrews, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Ward Chapman, E. B. Drake, and John E. Biby, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to recover attorney's fees for services rendered by Oscar A. Trippet, plaintiff's assignor, to defendants. The complaint charged in several counts and sought a recovery for $2,160.40, with interest from the 11th day of July, 1911. One count charged upon an account stated, another upon an express contract, a third in quantum meruit. Trial was had before a jury, which rendered its verdict in a sum totaling the amount sued for with interest. From the judgment and order refusing them a new trial, defendants appeal.

[1-3] It is made to appear that in 1904 the city of Los Angeles let a contract to one Edwards for the construction of an outfall sewer from the city to the Pacific ocean many miles distant. The contract price exceeded half a million dollars. As security for its performance, Edwards was required to give and gave a bond in the sum of $282,500. He immediately assigned his contract to Stansbury and Powell, who assumed its obligations and undertook the work. In 1906 they encountered difficulties and ceased work, leaving a large part uncompleted. This abandonment of the contract at once raised serious and difficult questions. The city, in August, 1906, served notice of the rescission of the contract and of its intention to complete the work itself. The city did proceed with the work and completed it in November, 1907. Immediately upon the abandonment and in contemplation of the legal questions which had arisen and the legal actions which might arise, defendants consulted their attorney, Mr. McCutcheon. He in turn suggested the employment of Mr. Trippet to assist him in the consideration of the legal questions, to advise with him as to the course of action to be pursued, and to aid in the prosecution or defense of any actions which might be necessary. Some of the legal propositions thus requiring consideration went to the legality and validity of the contract between the city and the contractors, the justification of the contractors for their abandonment upon the ground of the impracticability of construction by reason of defective or impossible specifications, the right of the city to complete the contract when the contractors were insisting that the city should modify its specifications and permit them to do it, the liability of defendants' sureties upon their undertaking, and the defendants' liability over. The investigation of these matters necessitated great research in the law, and this was very largely done by Mr. Trippet. Actions were instituted, demurrers interposed and argued. The preparation of the litigation for trial it has been sufficiently made to appear rested in comparatively small degree upon the testimony of witnesses. Nine-tenths of the work of this preparation, as one of the attorneys testified, was professional work on legal questions. A very large part of this work Mr. Trippet personally performed. Indeed, there is no conflicting testimony against plaintiff's evidence that the value of Mr. Trippet's services was at least $2,500. This $2,500, less certain small payments made by defendants, was the amount sued for under these different counts.

The testimony of Mr. Trippet was to the effect that after Mr. McCutcheon's death defendants sought to employ him to take charge of these matters. He expressed an unwillingness to do so, but consented to join as counsel with some other reputable attorney or firm of attorneys. Defendant then employed the firm of O'Melveny, Millikin & Stevens. Millikin and Stevens of this firm took personal charge of the matter. Their testimony goes to the continued services of Mr. Trippet and the value of those services throughout the litigation. Messrs. Millikin and Stevens sought a compromise of the controversy and took charge of these negotiations. A compromise was effected. Thereafter, on July 11th, Mr. Trippet presented his account and bill to both Stansbury and Powell. This account contained some 10 or 12 items charged against defendants, payments to other people on account of fees, and other matters, and two specific items, one for $500 retainer fee, and the other for $2,000, the balance of the fee of $2,500 agreed by defendants to be paid. Upon the credit side of this account appeared certain items of cash paid by defendants to Mr. Trippet, some of which covered disbursements made by him, the rest of which was receipted for as on account of his fee, leaving a balance, as has been said, of $2,160.40. This account was unquestionably rendered and received by defendants at the time it bears date. Their own admissions establish this fact. Thereafter, in September, 1911, having heard no word from them, he sent them another statement "of balance due on account as per statement rendered," and he received no response to this. Again in December, 1911, he addressed to them a letter stating that in July he had presented to them his account and had received no remittance; "the balance due is $2,160.40, and I wish you would remit all or a part of it at once." On February 8, 1912, he wrote them another letter to like effect, therein stating that they had paid no attention to any of his letters or statements, and that he therefore requested their immediate attention to it. Following this, upon February 17, 1912, a reply came from these defendants to this effect:

"You surely have forgotten that some time before a compromise was talked of in the out-fall sewer matter you voluntarily withdrew from the case and accepted what you had already received as compensation in full and agreed with us that no further demand for attorney's fees would be made on us."

In this letter is outlined the defense to this action. The jury, with the evidence before it of the character and volume of labor which Mr. Trippet had performed, of the value of that labor fixed by disinterested attorneys in varying sums from $5,000 to $10,000, having before it also the testimony of Mr. Trippet's associates that they were never advised of his withdrawal and never understood that he had withdrawn, and Mr. Trippet's own testimony that he had not withdrawn, and finally confronted with the improbability that an attorney would render services of such value, covering so long a period of time, and then without reason, and after the work had been done, withdraw from the employment after having received but a paltry $350, most naturally decided in favor of plaintiff's contention.

The main defense having thus been disposed of by the jury, appellants fall back upon certain minor contentions, most of which do not merit notice, some of which call for passing consideration. Thus the principal sum sued for, as has been said, was $2,160.40. The jury's award was for $2,441.85. This, by mathematical calculation, is found to include interest upon the principal sum. It is said that the demand was not a liquidated demand, that one of the counts charged in quantum meruit, that the value of the services was thus to be determined, and that an allowance of interest was therefore improper. Of course, all this presupposes a failure to establish either the count charging upon an account stated, or the count charging upon an express contract. In the former of these cases, if the account stated were established interest would, of course, follow the principal sum. In the second count upon an express contract it is not to be denied that, if that count were established, the $2,160.40 became due and payable when the controversies were settled by a compromise, and that from that date this sum would bear interest.

The evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the verdict either upon the count of an account stated or upon the count of an express contract. We have heretofore sufficiently indicated the evidence supporting the latter of these counts, Mr. Trippet himself testifying to the express contract under which his minimum fee was to be $2,500, and to be a larger sum than that in certain contingencies.

[4-6] So far as concerns the account stated, appellants are in error in their position that the fees of an attorney, under the circumstances here shown, even where the contract is found to be an express contract, may not be the subject-matter of an account rendered and stated. True it is that in the generality of cases, where the contract is a specific contract for the express payment of a named sum, where, in short, it is a specialty, the mere rendering of a statement of an amount due, even when acquiescence or consent is shown to the correctness of the statement, will not justify an action brought upon an account stated and thus set aside the specialty contract. A typical case of this is Jaspar Trust Co. v. Lamkin, 162 Ala. 388, 50 South. 337, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1237, 126 Am. St. Rep. 33. There, the defendant being bound by his promissory notes, the holder of the notes calculated the principal and interest due, and the maker consented to the correctness of the amount, and the court, holding that the specific contract was not superseded, declared:

"The promisor is as firmly bound to pay the amount which is definitely fixed by the note as he could be by any implied promise; also there is no account for them to settle together. Each one with his pencil can ascertain at any moment just what is due, and the mere affirmation of what they both know and are already bound to cannot form a new contract."

But such is not the case here presented. True, by this action plaintiff seeks to recover only for the value of legal services, and it may be conceded that the sum to be paid, under the testimony of Mr. Trippet, was fixed by special contract. Nevertheless the transactions between the attorney and his clients, as is shown, covered a period of years. There were disbursements made by Mr. Trippet on behalf of his clients; there were receipts of moneys from those clients. It was a matter of adjustment—the correctness of the disbursements and the amount and application of the moneys received by Mr. Trippet from his clients. There was in a very real sense an open account, subject to adjustment and settlement. And finally, if it be said that there was no express contract for the payment of a fee, but that Mr. Trippet was entitled to recover only under the count in quantum meruit, nevertheless the amount of his recovery under this count became fixed when the account became a stated account and bore interest from that date.

The bill of an attorney for services, like any other bill, may under proper circumstances and conditions be the subject of an account stated. Lane & Bodly Co. v. Taylor, 80 Ark. 469, 97 S. W. 441, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 924; Case v. Hotchkiss, *42 N. Y. 334; Gruby v. Smith, 13 Ill. App. 43.

[7, 8] The court instructed the jury that when an account was rendered it became the duty of the recipient to make his objections thereto within a reasonable time, and that if he did not do so the account became an account stated and the foundation of an independent cause of action based upon the account stated; also, that silence and nonobjection under the circumstances of this case for six months would constitute an unreasonable time. Exception is taken to these instructions. But the complaints made against them are not well founded. They are unimpeachable in point of law. Defendants were not denied the opportunity to explain their silence. Their explanation has been outlined. It was that they paid no attention to this account, that they thought it was rendered through a bookkeeper's error, and that they relied upon the parol agreement which they had had with Mr. Trippet, whereunder he had withdrawn from the case, accepting what he had received as full compensation for his services. All that need be said upon this proposition is that it is established by the verdict of the jury that it was not believed. All that is left, then, to the case, is that the account was rendered in July, that the defendants were repeatedly reminded of it and took no action upon it, and not until Mr. Trippet's demand took on a peremptory tone did they pay any attention to it. While all questions of fraud and mistake in combating the force of an account stated are questions of fact for the jury, where assent is based upon acquiescence arising from a failure to object, the length of time which must pass before an account rendered becomes, by virtue of the recipient's failure to object, an account stated, is one of law for the court. There is here no controversy over the date of the reception of the account, the determination of which controversy would be a matter for the jury; nor yet over the date when defendants first objected to it, which also would be a matter for the jury; nor finally over the defendants' explanation of its delay, which likewise is a matter for the jury. What the court told the jury in effect was that this delay of six months, if unsatisfactorily explained, was as matter of law unreasonable, and that because of it acquiescence would be presumed and the account would become an account stated. Such, we repeat, is the law. Cusick v. Boyne, 1 Cal. App. 643, 82 Pac. 985; Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 567, 17 Pac. 702; Standard Oil Co. v. Van Etten, 107 U. S. 325, 1 Sup. Ct. 178, 27 L. Ed. 319; Fleischner v. Kubli, 20 Or. 328,

Numerous other objections are made. They have all been considered. For the most part they revolve around the legal principles which we have considered and passed on, and they do not merit specific notice. Certain others are unfairly presented. To illustrate: Testimony was being taken of attorneys Mr. Millikin, Mr. Morton, and Mr. Pruitt. The examination threatened to become unduly prolonged. The following then took place: The court said:

"We are taking up a lot of time. If you want me to testify, I will testify that Mr. Millikin, Mr. Morton, and Mr. Pruitt, the only ones I have seen, are prominent lawyers here; that they have had a great deal of business of different kinds; and that they are leading lawyers of the bar. Shall I be sworn, or will you consider that I have so testified?"

Appellants in their brief complain of this as an error and irregularity which prevented them from having a fair trial. Just how nor why is not shown. Presumptively it could only have been because the court made this statement not under oath. Yet appellants omit to point out that in answer to the question of the court their attorney declared: "I will consider that the witness would so testify if on the stand." Again, complaint is made because the court instructed the jury that but one payment of $250 had been made to Mr. Trippet, for which payment credit was given in his account. Yet by the very admissions of the answer and by the testimony of the defendants themselves no pretense is made that there was ever more than one payment of $250 made to Mr. Trippet.

These are exemplars of numerous like complaints made by appellants. It would serve no profitable purpose to consider them all.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

ROSENBAUM ESTATE CO. v. ROBERT DOLLAR CO. (Civ. 1764.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, Sept. 29, 1916.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT $\hookrightarrow$ 202(3)—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION—"AT THE SAME RENTAL."

In view of Civ. Code, § 1945, providing that, if a lessee of real property remains in possession after expiration of the hiring, the parties are presumed to have renewed the hiring on the same terms, an agreement at the expiration of a lease that the lessee should remain in possession from month to month "at the same rental" does not imply that the rent was thereafter to be payable at the end of each month instead of in advance, as required by the lease, though section 1947 provides, in the absence of contract, that rent is payable at the termination of the respective rent periods.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT $\hookrightarrow$ 196 — RENT — LIABILITY OF LESSEE.

Where the rent of premises was due monthly in advance, and the lessee remained in possession after the end of the month for which it had paid rent, it was liable for rent for the following month, unless warranted in removing by Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942, providing that the lessor of a building intended for occupation by human beings must, in the absence of agreement, keep it in a condition for such occupation, and if repairs are necessary, and are not made after reasonable notice, the lessee may vacate the premises and shall be discharged from further payment of rent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Marcel E. Cerf and E. P. Shortall, Judges.

Action by the Rosenbaum Estate Company against the Robert Dollar Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan H. Frank and Irving H. Frank, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Heller, Powers & Ehrman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial in an action to recover rent.

The defendant had been in possession of certain premises belonging to the plaintiff for five years under a written lease which, among other things, provided that the rent should be $300 a month to be paid in advance on the 1st day of every month. Just prior to the expiration of the written lease the parties orally agreed that the defendant might remain a tenant of the premises "from month to month at the same rental" provided for in the written lease. The defendant accordingly remained in possession of the premises for six months under this new arrangement, paying the rent in advance on the 1st day of each month up to December 31, 1913, and on January 5, 1914, upon two days' notice to the plaintiff that it would vacate the premises, it removed therefrom.

The first contention of the appellant is that the rent during the period that it occupied the premises from month to month was not payable in advance, but at the end of the month, and that this action, having been begun on the 19th of January, 1914, for the rent of the premises for that month, was prematurely brought, and that the finding of the court that the rent was payable in advance is without support in the evidence.

[1-3] We are unable to agree with this view. From the record it appears that the defendant was to remain in possession of the premises from month to month and to pay the same monthly rental as was provided for in the written lease. We think the arrangement contemplated the payment of the rent in advance. An important incident of the rent is the time of its payment; and the phrase "at the same rental," as employed by the parties in this instance, was undoubtedly, in view of their subsequent conduct, intended to cover both the amount of the rent and the time of its payment. Under section 1945 of the Civil Code, if the tenant had simply remained in possession of the premises after the expiration of the written lease, and nothing had been said between the parties, and the landlord had accepted rent, the law would have conclusively presumed that the hiring was on the same terms as the expired lease; and we think it can hardly be said that, where there is an express agreement that the tenant shall remain in possession from month to month at the same rental, the parties contemplated any change in the time of payment of the rent from that which had previously prevailed. Had there been no previous hiring, the appellant's position would be very strong that the time of payment would be as provided for in section 1947 of the Civil Code, viz. at the end of the period of the hiring; but the circumstances of the verbal renting in this case, and the course thereafter pursued, sufficiently attest the understanding of the parties that the tenant was to continue to pay the rent in advance. Where the meaning of a contract is doubtful, the acts of the parties done under it afford one of the most reliable means of arriving at the intention of the parties. Mayberry v. Alhambra, etc., Co., 125 Cal. 446, 54 Pac. 530, 58 Pac. 68; Keith v. Electrical Engineering Co., 136 Cal. 178, 181, 68 Pac. 598. In our opinion, therefore, having remained in possession of the premises after the 31st day of December, 1913, the tenant was liable for rent for the month of January, 1914, unless it was warranted in removing therefrom under the terms of sections 1941 and 1942 of the Civil Code, which provides that the lessor of a building intended for occupation by human beings must, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, put and keep it in a condition for such occupation, and that, if repairs to the premises are necessary, and are not made after reasonable notice, the lessee may vacate the premises, and shall be discharged from further payment of rent, which brings us to the second contention of the appellant, viz. that the neglect of the landlord to make repairs of the character indicated justified the appellant in summarily vacating the premises, and relieved it from the obligation to pay any further rent.

[4] The evidence shows that the basement of the premises (in which was conducted the bookkeeping department of the defendant's business, giving employment to ten persons) was very damp during the greater part of the last two years of the tenancy. It does not appear, however, that the defendant gave to the plaintiff any definite notice to repair. True, according to the evidence introduced by the defendant, the attention of the plaintiff was called to the condition of the basement, and on one occasion repairs were made; but apparently the defendant, realizing that the building stood on filled land over which the waters of San Francisco Bay formerly flowed, and which was subject to seepage, and expecting in the near future to move into a new building, concluded to tolerate the condition of the basement. This view is borne out by an examination of all the evidence in the case, and especially by the circumstance that the defendant, at the termination of the written lease, entered into the present oral lease after it had known for 18 months the condition of the premises about which it now complains. It is true that one of the witnesses for the defendant testified that three days before the vacation of the premises the condition of the basement on account of accumulated seepage had become acute, and could no longer be tolerated; but there was no attempt to show that the condition could not be remedied, or that any notice was given to the plaintiff to repair the defect and make the premises habitable. The only notice then given by the defendant was a letter written on January 3d to the effect that on the 5th day of that month the defendant would vacate, which letter the plaintiff received on the day the defendant moved out.

Complaint is made that the defendant was not permitted to introduce evidence as to the effect upon the health of the defendant's employes of the condition of the basement; but the court permitted proof of such condition, and stated that it would itself draw its conclusion as to its effect upon the health of the occupants. We see no error in this ruling.

Judgment and order affirmed.

KNORP v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 1915.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, Sept. 28, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 27, 1916.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — 74(1)—LACHES — APPLICATION FOR REINSTATEMENT TO POLICE FORCE—STATUTES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, specifying what actions must be brought within three years, section 343, providing that an action for relief not before provided for must be commenced within four years, and section 352, providing that the time of disability by insanity, etc., is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of an action, where a police officer collapsed on account of mental strain, later becoming insane, obtained three months' leave of absence without pay, and tendered his resignation as a member of the force to take effect at a time not specified, which was accepted on the theory that it took effect immediately, so that he was ousted from his position, but did not institute his action for reinstatement for seven years and eight months after the date of the certificate of the medical superintendent of the state hospital discharging him as recovered, limitation of the officer's cause of action began to run on the date of his discharge, and was barred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 413; Dec. Dig. — 74(1).]

2. INSANE PERSONS — 29—RESTORATION TO CAPACITY—JURISDICTION—STATUTES.

Jurisdiction to determine the question of an insane person's mental capacity, in the absence of guardianship proceedings under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1763, 1764, was vested exclusively in the officers of the state hospital for the insane, and plaintiff's discharge from the hospital on the ground of his recovery was an adjudication by competent authority that he was sane at his discharge, and the superior court had no jurisdiction to determine the question of his mental capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. §§ 42, 140, 150; Dec. Dig. — 29.]

3. INSANE PERSONS — 29—RESTORATION TO CAPACITY—JURISDICTION OF HOSPITAL OFFICER—CONFINEMENT.

Where a patient in the state hospital for the insane was granted leave of absence under the care of his brother, he was constructively in the custody and under the control of the state, and it was not essential to the medical superintendent's jurisdiction to discharge him as cured that he should have been actually confined in the hospital when the certificate of discharge was applied for and granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. §§ 42, 140, 150; Dec. Dig. — 29.]

4. INSANE PERSONS — 29—RESTORATION TO CAPACITY—PRIMA FACIE PROOF—CERTIFICATE OF HOSPITAL OFFICER.

The certificate of the medical superintendent of the state hospital for the insane, discharging plaintiff therefrom as recovered, was at least prima facie proof of plaintiff's restoration to capacity upon that date, and, nothing to the contrary appearing, the presumption must prevail that he was then, and since has been sane.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by Edward I. Knorp against the Board of Police Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying plaintiff new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Von Schrader & Cadwalader, of San Francisco, for appellant. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and D. S. O'Brien, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. In this proceeding the plaintiff sought a writ of mandate against the defendants, sitting as the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, commanding them to reinstate the plaintiff as a member of the police department of said city and county. The appeal is from a judgment entered in favor of the defendants, and from an order denying the plaintiff a new trial.

The facts of the case are practically undisputed and, in so far as they are pertinent to a discussion of the paramount point in the case, are, substantially stated, these: On the 6th day of November, 1899, the plaintiff became a member of the police department of said city and county, and was thereafter an active member of the department until June, 1901, when he "collapsed on account of mental strain." The records of the police commission show that on July 2, 1901, the plaintiff's application for leave of absence for three months without pay was granted by the board, and that on September 24, 1901, he tendered his resignation as a member of the police department, which was accepted "to take effect from ———." On November 22, 1901, the plaintiff was adjudged to be insane by the superior court of said city and county, and committed to the care of the Napa state hospital, where he remained as a patient and an inmate until November 16, 1902, when he was released on leave of absence in care of his brother, George H. Knorp. Thereupon plaintiff returned to San Francisco, where he resided with his brother until May 24, 1904, when he in person applied for and procured from the medical superintendent of the Napa state hospital a certificate discharging him from the custody and control of said institution upon the ground of his mental recovery. Thereafter, on October 24, 1911, he petitioned the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for an order restoring him to capacity pursuant to the provisions of section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the court made the order. The trial court in its findings of fact, among other things, found that plaintiff's resignation as a member of the police department was tendered by him and accepted by the board of police commissioners on September 24, 1901, and that his cause of action for reinstatement was, as pleaded in the answer of the defendants, barred by the provisions of sections 338 and 343, Code of Civil Procedure, and the laches of the plaintiff.

[1-4] The latter we think is fully sustained by the evidence. The action was not instituted until March 27, 1912, some seven years and eight months after the date of the medical superintendent's certificate finally discharging the plaintiff from the custody and control of the state as recovered. That date in our opinion must be taken as the time when the plaintiff was restored to capacity, rather than March 26, 1912, the date of the decree of the superior court which purported to judicially determine his restoration to capacity. The plaintiff's petition to be restored to capacity, which was the basis of the decree of the superior court, did not aver that he had been under guardianship by virtue of the provisions of sections 1763 and 1764, Code of Civil Procedure, at the time of his commitment for insanity to the state hospital; and consequently the superior court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the question of the plaintiff's mental capacity. Such jurisdiction, in the absence of guardianship proceedings, was vested exclusively in the officers of the state hospital (Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, 25 Pac. 677, 12 L. R. A. 104); and therefore the plaintiff's discharge from the hospital upon the ground of his recovery was an adjudication by competent authority that he was sane on the day and date of his discharge (Kellogg v. Cochran, supra). The case of Aldrich v. Barton, 153 Cal. 488, 95 Pac. 900, has no application to the facts of the present case. There the patient had been away from the state hospital for many years, claiming all the while, without opposition from the officers of the hospital, to have been discharged and at liberty under a purported order of discharge; and the Supreme Court held that under those circumstances the officers of the state hospital lost the custody and control of the patient, and were therefore ousted of jurisdiction to make a second certificate of discharge. That case recognizes the right of the medical superintendent of a state hospital to release a patient on parole; and that is precisely what was done in the present case. During his leave of absence the plaintiff was constructively in the custody and under the control of the state; and it was not essential to the exercise of jurisdiction to discharge the plaintiff that he should have been actually confined in the state hospital at the time the certificate of discharge was applied for and granted. People v. Geiger, 116 Cal. 440, 48 Pac. 389. The certificate of discharge dated May 24, 1904, was at least prima facie proof of the plaintiff's restoration to capacity upon that date (Aldrich v. Barton, supra); and, nothing appearing to the contrary, the presumption must prevail that he was then and ever since has been sane.

It is not disputed that the plaintiff's purported resignation as a member of the police department was accepted and dealt with by the board of police commissioners upon the theory that it took effect immediately, notwithstanding the fact that the records of the commission show that it was to take effect at a time not specified. In short, it is not disputed that the plaintiff was ousted from his position as a police officer by the board on September 24, 1901, the date of his purported resignation; that being so, his cause of action for reinstatement accrued upon that date; and giving him credit for the time during which he was under the disability of insanity the statute in our opinion commenced to run against his cause of action upon May 24, 1904, the date of his restoration to capacity as shown prima facie by the medical superintendent's certificate of discharge, and consequently his cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. Sections 352, 338, 343, Code Civ. Proc.; Farrell v. Board, etc., 1 Cal. App. 5, 81 Pac. 674; Jones v. Board, etc., 141 Cal. 96, 74 Pac. 696; Dodge v. Board, 1 Cal. App. 608, 82 Pac. 699.

It was not contended upon behalf of the plaintiff in the court below, nor is it contended here, that he did not have knowledge of the fact that his purported resignation was accepted and treated as having gone into effect as of the date of its tender; and his only excuse for not sooner instituting his action is that he could not do so until he had been restored to capacity by the decree of the superior court. But such decree, as has been pointed out, was, under the facts of the present case, neither a necessary nor a valid adjudication of his competency, and consequently will not avail to toll the statute of limitations, nor relieve him from the penalty of his undoubted laches in instituting the action.

We need not concern ourselves with the question as to whether or not the evidence sustains the finding that the plaintiff did in fact tender his resignation, and that the same was accepted and took effect immediately, for the fact still remains that the plaintiff, under and by virtue of his purported resignation and its acceptance, ceased to be a member of the department from the date thereof; and even if it be conceded that he was thereby wrongfully deprived of his office, the finding upon the statute of limitations and the laches of the plaintiff being supported by the evidence, it alone will suffice to support the judgment.

This disposes of all of the points presented in the appeal which we deem worthy of discussion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

NEWHALL LAND & FARMING CO. v.
BURNS et al. (Civ. 1990.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 28, 1916.)

1. CONTRACTS ⇨246 — CONSTRUCTION—TIME AS ESSENCE OF CONTRACT.

Where parties enter into a contract making time of its essence, and thereafter in consideration of payment of a sum of money the time for performance is extended subject to all of the terms and conditions of the former agreement, the provision making time of the essence of the contract is continued in the new agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1131-1138; Dec. Dig. ⇨246.]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨101—FORFEITURE OF CONTRACT—NOTICE.

Under an agreement whereby a deed was placed in escrow to be delivered on payment of a sum of money by defendants, and making time of the essence of the contract, no notice was required to terminate defendants' rights on their default in making the payment within the time prescribed.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨187 — PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—WAIVER OF DEFAULT.

Under an agreement whereby a deed placed in escrow was to be delivered to defendants on payment of a sum of money before a certain date, efforts made by defendants after the date fixed to sell the land and the making of surveys, neither of which were required by the contract, though permitted by plaintiff, did not amount to a waiver of the default in performance.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨97—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—FORFEITURE—CONDITION PRECEDENT.

The deposit of a deed in escrow according to the terms of the contract, under which it was to be delivered on payment to the depository of the sum required, rendered a tender of the deed unnecessary as a condition precedent to forfeiture on failure to pay the money.

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨25, 340—REMEDIES OF PURCHASER—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID.

Where a contract for the sale of land and a deed to the land were placed in escrow to be delivered on payment of a sum of money to the depository, the fact that the contract was never delivered is fatal to the claim of the purchasers not only to any interest in the land but also to recover the sum of money paid when the writings were placed in escrow.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 30, 1003-1007; Dec. Dig. ⇨25, 340.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Newhall Land & Farming Company against Juliette A. Burns and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Campbell & Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendants prosecute this appeal from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff quieting its title to certain lands described in the complaint, and likewise appeal from an order of court denying their motion for a new trial of said action.

Defendants base their claim to an interest in the lands upon two contracts alleged to have been executed by plaintiff, the first of which was dated January 31, 1912, whereby plaintiff, for a consideration of $750,000, to be paid as therein stipulated, agreed to sell and defendant Burns and one R. E. Muncy agreed to purchase the property in question. At the time of the making of this contract there was paid to the plaintiff the sum of $5,000, and the agreement was placed in escrow with the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles, "to be delivered only in the event of the payment of the sum of forty-five thousand dollars ($45,000) on or before May 1, 1912." Burns and Muncy failed to pay this $45,000, and on April 29, 1912, they, with plaintiff, executed an agreement reciting the fact that the contract was not to be delivered except upon the payment of $45,000 on or before May 1, 1912, which payment they were unable to make, and agreed in writing that such contract should be canceled and annulled, and that Burns and Muncy waived all claims to or interest in said agreement and consented to the forfeiture of said sum of $5,000 paid by them to plaintiff.

As found by the court upon ample evidence, no fraud or duress entered into the execution of this latter agreement for the cancellation of the contract and forfeiture of the $5,000 paid thereon; and hence this contract may be eliminated from further consideration.

Thereafter, on May 2, 1912, a contract similar in terms and conditions, between plaintiff and defendant Burns alone, was prepared, wherein plaintiff agreed to sell, and Burns agreed to purchase, the property in question for the sum of $745,000, payable as follows: "Forty-five thousand dollars ($45,000) on or before June 1, 1912, at the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles, with which this agreement is deposited in escrow, to be by said bank delivered to the party of the second part upon receipt of said payment"—the contract further specifying the time for the payment of other stipulated installments of the purchase price covering the whole thereof. This contract provided:

"That time is hereby made the essence of this agreement, and of each and every one of the covenants, terms and conditions hereof. * * * That any neglect, failure, or default in making any one or more of the payments of principal or interest hereinbefore provided for, or in complying with any of the other covenants, terms, or conditions of this agreement, at the time or times and in the manner hereinbefore specified, or at the expiration of any extension thereof in writing made by the party of the first part, or any violation of any of such covenants, terms, or conditions, upon the part of the said party of the second part, shall, at the option of the party of the first part, cause a forfeiture of all of the rights, privileges and interests of the said party of the second part under this agreement."

Burns made default in the payment of the $45,000 so stipulated to be paid on or before June 1, 1912, and upon payment of which the escrow holder was to deliver said contract to her. Whereupon, on June 1, 1912, in consideration of the payment of $750, plaintiff in writing agreed:

"To extend the time for the payment of the sum of forty-five thousand dollars ($45,000) due and payable on this day to July 1, 1912, subject to all of the terms, covenants and conditions of the agreement between the parties hereto bearing date of 2d day of May, 1912, a copy of which is deposited with the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles in escrow to be delivered to the party of the second part upon the payment of said sum of forty-five thousand dollars ($45,000)."

Defendant again made default in the payment of the $45,000, time for the making of which was so extended to July 1, 1912. It appears that after July 1, 1912, there were some negotiations between plaintiff and defendant Burns, as a result of which defendants claim a verbal extension of time to July 15, 1912, was given within which to pay the $45,000. As to this claim, however, upon sufficient evidence, the court found adversely to defendants. Not only does the claim rest upon an oral alteration of the terms of a written contract (if there was one), but there was no consideration for such alleged extension.

[1, 2] The chief contention of appellants is that the written instrument whereby defendants were given until July 1st within which to pay the $45,000 so stipulated in the contract to be paid June 1st, and upon the making of which the contract was to be delivered to defendant Burns, did not in express terms provide that time should be made the essence of said agreement for the extension of time of payment. The original contract, dated May 2, 1912, did in the strongest terms provide that time should be the essence thereof, and the agreement providing for the extension expressly provided that such agreement was "subject to all of the terms, covenants and conditions of the agreement between the parties hereto bearing date of 2d day of May, 1912." The sole purpose of the latter agreement was to extend the time as stated for the payment of the sum of $45,000, and to this extent only was the contract modified. Clearly the effect of the language last quoted was to carry into the agreement for the extension all of the terms and provisions of the contract to which it related. When defendants failed to make the payment within the time so extended, the position of the parties was identically the same as though such contract providing for the extension had never been executed. This being true, and conceding that instead of the contract being placed in escrow to be delivered to Burns only upon payment of $45,000 by July 1st it had been actually delivered to her, a case is presented as to which the language used by the Supreme Court in Glock v. Howard, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, is applicable. Defendants' right to an interest in the land was only such as the contract gave, and it gave no right save and except upon compliance with the conditions contained therein. No notice was required to terminate defendants' rights under the contract (see Commercial Bank v. Weldon, 148 Cal. 601, 84 Pac. 171), but their default on July 1, 1912, in making the payment of $45,000, unexcused and not waived, ipso facto terminated all rights they might have acquired by compliance with such provision (Champion Gold Min. Co. v. Champion Mines, 164 Cal. 205, 128 Pac. 315).

[3] Appellants, however, claim that plaintiff in allowing the defendants to proceed under the contract after the 15th day of July, 1912, made the conditions of the original contract mutual and dependent, by reason of which fact plaintiff waived its right to declare time of the essence of the contract. In support of this contention, appellants cite authorities to the effect that where the contract requires a party to do certain acts in the performance of which he has made default but afterwards performs the acts, which performance is accepted by the other party, such acceptance constitutes a waiver as to time. Howard v. Thompson Lumber Co., 106 Ky. 566, 50 S. W. 1092; Smith v. Sanitary District, 108 Ill. App. 69. The acts done by defendants and as to which plaintiff entered no protest were efforts to sell the land and the alleged making of surveys, acts not called for by the contract, and in the doing of which plaintiff had no interest, since there was no provision in the contract requiring them to sell the land or make surveys. The only acts pursuant to the terms of the contract the performance of which, if accepted by plaintiff, would have constituted a waiver as to time, would have been the performance of the covenants contained in the contract, none of which, as shown by the evidence, was performed by defendants. If after making default defendants had tendered the $45,000 and plaintiff had accepted the same, clearly it would have constituted a waiver under which, notwithstanding the fact said sum had not been paid as stipulated, defendants would have been entitled to delivery of the contract, and the performance of other covenants therein as stipulated would have entitled them to performance on the part of the plaintiff.

[4] It is further claimed that plaintiff, in order to have placed the defendants in default, should have tendered a deed before declaring a forfeiture, in support of which Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. 280, 18

Am. St. Rep. 187, is cited. It appears from the contract that as payments were made to the Citizens' National Bank deeds to specified parts of the property were to be delivered to defendants, one of which deeds, as provided in the contract, to a piece of land designated as "tract A," was to be delivered, together with the contract, upon the payment of the $45,000. This deed was deposited with the Citizens' National Bank in escrow to be delivered by said bank to defendant Burns with the contract upon payment of said sum. Since the deed was signed and left with the bank to be delivered to defendants upon payment of the amount, no further tender was necessary. Hence, assuming a fact not true, that the contract was at the time of its date delivered to defendant Burns, and assuming further that there was a consideration for its execution, nevertheless, since any rights thereunder depended upon her paying the sum of $45,000 on or before July 1st, she, by making default in said payment, lost all right to enforce the contract against plaintiff. Glock v. Howard, etc., Co., and Champion Gold Min. Co. v. Champion Mines, supra.

[5] Moreover, the fact that the contract was never delivered is fatal to the assertion, not only of any claim of interest in the land on the part of defendants, but as well to any right to recover the $5,000 so paid at the time of the making of the first contract January 31, 1912, or the recovery of the $750 paid for an extension of time within which, as provided in the second contract, to pay the $45,000. Defendants allege in their answer that the contract was executed, and this is true in the sense only that it was signed by the plaintiff; but according to its express terms it was not to be delivered, but deposited in escrow until July 1st, when, if Burns paid the $45,000, the escrow holder was instructed to deliver it to defendant. In other words, the effect of the transaction was, at most, for a consideration of $5,000 to give defendants an option to acquire a contract for the purchase of the land upon the terms and conditions contained therein, upon payment of $45,000 by July 1, 1912. They neglected and failed to exercise such option by paying the $45,000 by July 1, 1912, and hence the contract was never delivered.

The appeal is without merit, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Frank Martz and others against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Frank Karr and A. W. Ashburn, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Joseph Scott, A. G. Ritter, and J. B. Joujon-Roche, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This action was brought by the widow and three minor children of Frank Martz to recover damages on account of the death of Martz, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant company. The defendant denied the charges of negligence, and set up the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

At about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 1st day of February, 1912, Frank Martz was traveling in his automobile in a southerly direction on Santa Anita avenue, in the county of Los Angeles, and was approaching a point where that highway is crossed by the tracks of defendant company. At the crossing a collision took place between the automobile and a car of the defendant. Immediately east and west of Santa Anita avenue the railroad occupies a private right of way. It is a double-track railroad which runs east and west across the avenue, but curves toward the south at a point beginning about 100 yards west of the avenue. The curve is such as that at a distance of 1,000 feet west of Santa Anita avenue cars beyond that point are not visible from the avenue. Appellant claims that the evidence is such as to compel the conclusion that no negligence was established on the part of the defendant, and also very earnestly contends that contributory negligence on the part of the deceased was conclusively established. For these reasons it is claimed that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to render a verdict for the defendant.

[1, 2] At the same time when Mr. Martz coming from the north was approaching the railroad, an express car of the defendant was traveling in an easterly direction on defendant's southerly track. Santa Anita avenue is constructed in two roadways separated by a row of eucalyptus trees down the center. On the westerly side of the west roadway of Santa Anita avenue and north of the defendant's right of way there was at the time of the collision a small white building about 32½ feet long, located about 47 feet west of the westerly line of the highway and about 43 feet north of the south track. Along the westerly side of the west roadway was a row of tall eucalyptus trees, about 10 feet apart. A signboard marked, "Railroad Crossing—Look Out for the Cars," had been placed at the intersection of the right of way with the westerly roadway, and the railroad tracks were raised slightly above the level of the roadway upon which Martz was traveling, thereby rendering the tracks plainly visible to one occupying his position. No persons but the motorman and conductor of defendant's car (so far as the evidence shows) saw the deceased at the time of the accident, and they saw him only for an instant immediately preceding the collision. There is no testimony from any observer as to whether the deceased looked or listened for the approach of the car. The motorman testified that his car was traveling 18 or 20 miles an hour, and that the deceased was traveling "as fast as I was going, maybe a little faster." In addition to the foregoing undisputed facts, appellant claims that the evidence shows that the branches of the eucalyptus trees were high above the traveler's head, and did not materially obstruct the traveler's view in looking to the west, and that the tracks with poles and wires were plainly visible to the traveler, and that it is also certain that Martz "made no effort to avoid the approaching train, for the marks of his automobile on the ground showed that he was headed due south and had not swerved in either direction." Appellant admits that there was conflict in the evidence as to whether warning was given by blowing of the whistle on defendant's car, but claims that the negative testimony of plaintiff's witnesses that they heard no whistle blown is not entitled to credit as against the positive testimony of other witnesses who said that they heard the whistle. Appellant further admits that the evidence as to the rate of speed at which defendant's car was traveling varies from 18 to 30 miles an hour. There is evidence tending to show that the branches of the eucalyptus trees were above the traveler's head, but there is also testimony that there was an undergrowth extending upward from the ground, and that the limbs of the trees came down and met this undergrowth; that there were sprouts growing up from the trees which were as much as 5 feet long; that these were suckers from the roots of the trees, and grew out like a bush. Under these conditions it is likely that there would be spaces through which one traveling along the road, as the deceased was traveling before he came to the small building, possibly could have seen an approaching car, and that a large part of the space so occupied by the trees was so obstructed that through the space thus occupied it was impossible to have seen the cars. The question presented to the jury was whether or not a person so traveling and using reasonable care in observing would have seen the approaching car, notwithstanding the obstructions of trees and brush along the highway, and notwithstanding the further obstruction made by poles erected at intervals between the railroad tracks and carrying the power wires. We are not warranted in saying that, as a matter of law, under these conditions, the deceased would have seen the car if he had made a reasonable effort to use his powers of observation before he reached the point where the building entirely obstructed his view in that direction. Therefore as to this fact we must accept the conclusion of the jury. And we are likewise bound by their implied finding that no warning whistle was sounded by the motorman.

Assuming, then, that Martz was not negligent in failing to observe the approaching car while he was farther north than the above-mentioned building, or while he was traveling along the road opposite that building, we must now consider the situation as it existed between the point in the avenue where the building no longer obstructed his view to the west and the south track of the railroad where the collision occurred. The testimony of the witnesses is aided by certain photographs shown in the record. As above stated, the building was 43 feet north of the south railroad track and about 47 feet west of the westerly line of the highway, which would be probably about 60 feet west of that part of the highway in which the automobile was traveling. Under these conditions the railroad tracks west of Santa Anita avenue along which the electric car would approach the crossing would be plainly visible from the automobile during at least the last 60 feet of its approach to the south track. And, as shown by the photographs, the curve of the railroad is such that the approaching railroad car would have been plainly visible if it was anywhere within 1,000 feet of the crossing.

[3-5] The evidence shows that Mr. Martz was 52 years old, in good health, and had been using this automobile nearly a year. On the day of the accident he was driving alone. It appears that he had never driven over this railroad crossing until that day. But, as above shown, the railroad track at the point of crossing and a signboard of warning were in plain view in front of the deceased as he came down the road. This being so, even if (as we must assume to be the fact) he had not seen any approaching car before coming opposite the white building, it was his duty to approach the crossing with reasonable care to have his automobile under control. If we assume that he did this, then, when he came within 60 feet of the southerly railroad track, he was in a safe situation at all events. If there was no approaching car within a distance of 1,000 feet, he would have ample time to cross. For at the rate of 30 miles per hour the railroad car would require at least 23 seconds to reach the point of intersection; whereas the automobile, even at a five-mile rate, would be across in 8 seconds. On the other hand, if the approaching railway car was anywhere within the distance of 1,000 feet, Mr. Martz must have seen it if he made the most ordinary use of his faculties, and this at least he was bound to do. Griffin v. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842. The rule is applicable to electric railroads operated under conditions similar to the operation of steam railroads. Loftus v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 464, 137 Pac. 34. And if the car thus observed by the deceased was approaching at such speed and was then within such distance as to cause reasonable apprehension of danger, it was negligence on the part of the automobile driver to attempt such a crossing. Such attempt would be the voluntary assumption of a risk, and for injuries resulting therefrom, and which the defendant then had no further opportunity to avoid, the law does not intend to provide compensation.

The only other alternative state of facts which seems possible under the evidence is that Mr. Martz came down the avenue and into the zone of danger at a rate of speed which was reckless under the circumstances, and thus heedlessly placed himself where the concurrent negligence of the defendant caused his death. In this case also there is no right of recovery. Where the physical facts shown by undisputed evidence raise the inevitable inference that the person approaching a railroad crossing did not look or listen, or that, having looked and listened, he endeavored to cross immediately in front of a rapidly approaching train that is plainly open to his view, he is as matter of law guilty of contributory negligence.

It seems clear that there is no situation shown upon any possible state of facts consistent with the evidence which can authorize a verdict such as was rendered in this case. The defendant was clearly entitled to a verdict in its favor. Having reached this conclusion, we deem it unnecessary to discuss alleged errors in the instructions given to the jury. With respect to the objections urged against those instructions, we express no opinion.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by F. F. Copp against the Guaranty Oil Company. From judgment for plaintiff, and order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Weaver, McCracken & McKee, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Clair S. Tappan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought upon a promissory note executed by the defendant. Plaintiff had judgment, and a motion made by the defendant for a new trial was denied. The appeal is taken from the judgment and also from the order denying the motion.

The promissory note, which evidenced an indebtedness of $14,100, was dated at Los Angeles, June 14, 1911, and made payable "on or before two years after date." It contained a provision that, if interest payments were not made when due, "then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder." In December, 1911, an installment of interest became due, and it was because of default in the payment of this interest that the plaintiff declared an option to mature the full amount of the note. On the 29th of January, 1912, written notice was given to the defendant company of this election on the part of the plaintiff, and this action was shortly thereafter brought. The payee of the note was W. H. Fuller, who, after the December interest payment became due, indorsed the note to this plaintiff. As collateral security there was delivered to the payee with the note and afterwards transferred to his indorsee 30,000 shares of the Lucky Boy Oil Company stock. In the answer of the defendant issue was raised as to the matter of the note being indorsed to this plaintiff, and it was denied that any default had been committed in the matter of the payment of interest at the time of the alleged election of the plaintiff to declare the whole amount of principal and interest due. In the separate defense, more particular reference to which will be hereinafter made, one of the allegations was that, before the original payee had indorsed the note to plaintiff, tender had been made to such payee of the amount of interest due on the note, together with compound interest, all of which the payee refused to accept. It appeared in evidence that, prior to the time this action was brought, the representative of defendant called upon the attorney for this plaintiff and made request to be allowed to pay the interest, both simple and compound, which had then accrued; that the attorney for plaintiff informed such representative of defendant that he had no authority to accept anything except the full amount of principal and interest. There was a conflict in the testimony as to when this conversation was had. Two witnesses for the defendant testified that it occurred on the 12th day of January, 1912 (this action having been commenced early in March of the same year). There was no dispute in the evidence showing that on the 29th day of January, 1912, a letter was written by the attorney for this plaintiff to the defendant, notifying defendant of the election of the plaintiff to declare the whole amount of the note, both principal and interest, due on account of the default in the payment of the installment of interest which had become due in December, 1911. The attorney for the plaintiff testified that the conversation had with the representatives of defendant, wherein an offer was made to pay overdue interest, occurred after the dispatch and receipt by them of the letter wherein the option was exercised to mature the note.

[1, 2] In the presence of this conflict in the testimony, the findings of the trial court wherein they are adverse to the appellant's contention as to that matter must be sustained. We find in the transcript the record of statements made by the learned trial judge wherein it was suggested as the view of the court that it was immaterial as to whether any tender of interest was made before or after the receipt of the written notice of election to mature the note because, as stated by the judge, when the parties appeared at the office of plaintiff's attorney they were told that the attorney had no authority except to collect the full amount of the note. The trial judge declared that such a statement, made under such circumstances, was sufficient to mature the note and to show an election on the part of the plaintiff so to do, and that any offer then made by the defendant to pay the interest then owing was ineffectual. We are hardly prepared to agree with the trial judge in this view, but we cannot disturb the judgment because of such erroneous conclusion for the reason that the findings as made cover the issues presented and declared that no tender as alleged was ever made. The trial court received all of the evidence touching the matter of this tender, so there was no ruling adverse to appellant by which it was prevented from showing the facts according to its contention. It may have been that, with all of the evidence before him, the trial judge in making up the findings reconsidered the passing conclusion made by him in the course of the trial and determined that the tender, if made, was made as the testimony introduced on the part of plaintiff showed, to wit, after the receipt by the appellant of the letter of January 29th notifying it of the election of plaintiff to collect the entire amount of principal and interest.

There are other matters alleged in the special defense set up in the answer as to all of which the trial judge refused to hear any testimony. Appellant very earnestly contends that such special matters constituted good defenses and that it should have been allowed to make proof of them. We quote the material portion of the answer setting up the matters adverted to:

"That at the time of the making and delivering of said promissory note by the defendant, the said W. H. Fuller agreed as a part of the consideration thereof that he would not negotiate or sell or allow said note to go out of his possession other than to deposit it in the First National Bank of Los Angeles until the same became due and that he would keep the said certificates of stock for the 30,000 shares of stock in the Lucky Boy Oil Company at all times available so that the defendant could use or vote them in any stockholders' meeting of the Lucky Boy Oil Company. That at the time of the making and executing of said note, the said defendant was the owner of a certain large portion of the capital stock of said Lucky Boy Oil Company. That the stock owned by the defendant and the said 30,000 shares owned by the said W. H. Fuller constituted more than a majority of the issued stock of said Lucky Boy Oil Company, and that the defendant purchased said 30,000 shares of stock from said W. H. Fuller for the purpose of giving to it, the defendant, the stock control of said Lucky Boy Oil Company. That at the time of said contract, the said W. H. Fuller well knew such fact and then and there well knew that the said Guaranty Oil Company was purchasing said 30,000 shares of stock for the sole purpose of acquiring a majority of the stock of said Lucky Boy Oil Company. That said Lucky Boy Oil Company is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the territory (now state) of Arizona, and that said W. H. Fuller had been for many years the attorney of said company. That at the time of the making and executing of the note mentioned in the complaint of the plaintiff, the said W. H. Fuller was a member of the board of directors of the defendant company. That at the time the defendant executed and delivered said note and acquired said 30,000 shares of stock, the said W. H. Fuller represented and stated to the defendant that no more stock could be issued from the treasury of the Lucky Boy Oil Company. That said Guaranty Oil Company believed said statement of said W. H. Fuller and relied upon the same, and would not have purchased said stock if it had not believed that said statement was true and correct, and the said representation of the said W. H. Fuller was the inducement which caused said Guaranty Oil Company to purchase said stock and to give said note. That after the said W. H. Fuller had made said representations, this defendant discovered that the same were false and untrue, and that said Lucky Boy Oil Company did have the right and authority to issue and sell other stock out of its treasury other than the issued and outstanding stock at the time of the execution and delivery of said note. That said Guaranty Oil Company did not know that it did not have such right until long after the execution and delivery of said note. That after said transaction, said Lucky Boy Oil Company did issue and sell other stock out of its treasury, whereby the defendant was deprived of the control, or the right to control, the corporate affairs of said Lucky Boy Oil Company. That said defendant attempted by a legal proceeding to have the issue of stock by said Lucky Boy Oil Company canceled and set aside but was unable to procure the same. That thereafter the said W. H. Fuller, in violation of his agreement not to negotiate or sell or allow said note or said stock of said Lucky Boy Oil Company to go out of his hands, as the defendant is informed and believes, and on such information and belief alleges, to make it appear that the said F. F. Copp was a bona fide holder of said note for value, caused said pretended indorsement to be made thereon, assigning and negotiating said note to the said plaintiff, whereas, in truth and in fact, as the defendant is informed and believes, and on such information and belief alleges, to make it appear that the said F. F. Copp was a bona fide holder of said note for value, caused said pretended indorsement to be made thereon, assigning and negotiating said note to the said plaintiff, whereas, in truth and in fact, as the defendant is informed and believes, and on such information and belief alleges, said indorsement was made without any consideration whatever. That it appears on the face of said note that the same is nonnegotiable, and that thereupon the said plaintiff, if she ever acquired any interest or any right to sue upon said note, took it subject to the aforesaid defenses existing between the defendant and said W. H. Fuller."

[3-6] It may be conceded, in discussing the propositions to follow, that any defenses which the maker of the note might have urged against its payee were equally available as against this plaintiff. The note was nonnegotiable in form. Smiley v. Watson et al., 23 Cal. App. 409, 138 Pac. 367. We think, however, that none of the special matters set up in the answer, as we have quoted them, would constitute a defense in this action. As to the alleged agreement on Fuller's part not to negotiate or sell the note or allow it to go out of his possession, and that he would keep the certificates of stock available for use, this should not be construed as an agreement which would hinder him from transferring it after default had been made in the payment of interest. There is no allegation that the 30,000 shares of stock of the Lucky Boy Oil Company were not at all times available for the defendant's use in the stockholders' meetings. As to the alleged representation by Fuller that no more stock could be issued from the treasury of the Lucky Boy Oil Company, it does not appear from the allegations that such statement was more than an opinion of the said Fuller, or that he made the statement with intent to deceive or with the knowledge that it was untrue. It appears in the same allegations of the answer that the defendant itself was the holder of a large number of shares in the Lucky Boy Oil Company, and presumptively as such stockholder it would have knowledge or the means of readily ascertaining the fact as to the condition of any stock that remained in the treasury of the corporation. All of the alleged errors predicated upon the refusal of the court to hear testimony offered by the defendant related to the special matters set up in this answer and, in the view we take of the case, were without prejudice to the appellant. The findings in their general form cover the issues presented, and there is some evidence to be found in the record to sustain the determination of the trial judge as to the facts.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HANDY v. HANDY. (Civ. 1935.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 2, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1916.)

TRIAL $\Leftrightarrow$ 6(1)—NOTICE OF TRIAL—STATUTE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 594, providing that if an issue of fact is to be tried proof must be made that the adverse party has had five days' notice, has no application where defendant was present by counsel when the case was called for trial, and where defendant made no legal showing that notice which he received, although not formal, was insufficient, and with one possible exception the answer filed was frivolous, it was not error to proceed with the trial, where the only reasons given for continuance were that counsel could not find defendant or subpoena a witness living outside the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 13-16; Dec. Dig. $\Leftrightarrow$ 6(1).]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by Maude E. Handy against Rozelvin B. Handy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Cavitt, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. A. Berlin, of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action to foreclose a mortgage on real property given to secure a promissory note for $400, the attack upon the judgment being based upon the fact that the trial court denied a motion of the appealing defendant to postpone the trial of the action.

At the time set for the trial of the action, the appellant, by his counsel, appeared in court, and moved for a continuance of the trial, stating that he had not received the five days' notice prescribed by law; that he had not had time to find the appellant nor subpoena a witness who lived out of the city and county of San Francisco, where the action was pending. No showing for a continuance was made under the provisions of section 595 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it is clear that the motion was based entirely upon the fact that the appellant had not received a full five days' notice of the time fixed for the trial.

Section 594 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"Either party may bring an issue to trial or to a hearing, and in the absence of the adverse party * * * may proceed with his case, and take a dismissal of the action, or a verdict or judgment, as the case may require; provided, however, if the issue to be tried is an issue of fact, proof must first be made to the satisfaction of the court that the adverse party has had five days' notice of such trial."

The Supreme Court, in the case of Sheldon v. Landwehr, 159 Cal. 778, 116 Pac. 44, construing that section, held that it had reference only to proceedings taken against a party in his absence, and that it had no application to a case like the one here, in which both parties were represented and present when the case was called for trial. "Where," says the court, "the party has actually known that the case was set for a certain time, and appears at that time, he is not entitled to a continuance in the absence of a claim showing that he has not had such knowledge long enough to enable him to properly prepare. It is in each case a question for the discretion of the trial court."

In the present case the appellant had filed his answer, he was present in court when the case was called for trial, and he made no legal showing to the effect that the notice which he had received was insufficient to enable him to prepare for trial. In other words, he filed no affidavit setting forth the reasons why he was unable to proceed to trial, or why his witnesses were not present in court, or who they were, or what they would testify to if present. Moreover, with one possible exception the answer of the defendant raised no substantial issue and was frivolous. All the circumstances of the case cast a suspicion on the good faith of the application and induce the belief that it was intended only for delay. We think therefore that the defendant was not entitled to the postponement demanded.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. H. Thompson against the Southern Pacific Company and others. From an adverse judgment and order, the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for appellant. Alfred Daggett and Lamberson, Burke & Lamberson, all of Visalia, and J. A. Chase, of Dinuba, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. It is conceded by respondent that appellant has made a fair statement of the facts, and we may, therefore, substantially adopt the same. The action is for personal injuries to plaintiff, resulting from a collision between an automobile driven by him and a freight train of appellant. The collision occurred July 18, 1912, about 4 o'clock p. m., at a grade crossing of a public highway. The crossing is located about one mile south of Dinuba in the county of Tulare, and the train was, at the time of the accident, in charge of defendant Keith, as engineer, and defendant Rhone, as conductor. Defendant Waller was the fireman. Appellant and its trainmen were jointly charged with negligence.

The amended complaint in substance alleges that bordering the public highway on which the accident occurred on the south, and adjoining the railroad right of way on the west, there was at the time of the accident, and for a long time prior thereto had been, an orchard belonging to one Weddle; that the defendants had negligently permitted to grow up and mature on said right of way where the same crosses the public highway a dense growth of sunflowers and weeds; that the vegetation had grown to such height that a person traveling in a vehicle in an easterly direction along the highway across the railroad right of way could not see the railroad track or a locomotive engine or a train of cars upon it for any distance when looking in a southeasterly direction, until he reached a point near and almost immediately upon the railroad track; that the train of cars which collided with plaintiff's automobile was traveling upon its track from the southeast to the northwest; that at the time of the accident, the plaintiff, who was traveling along said highway in an easterly direction, brought his machine down to a slow gait at a point about 120 yards west of the crossing, moved slowly towards the crossing and looked for an approaching train; that because of the presence of the fruit trees in the Weddle orchard, and the sunflowers and weeds on appellant's right of way, he did not see any engine or cars on the track until he was practically upon the track; that before he got near the track he listened, but could not hear any train approaching the crossing; that when he reached the crossing, defendant and appellant which was operating the train, by and through its codefendants, Keith, Waller, and Rhone, at a high rate of speed and in a careless, reckless, and negligent manner, ran into said automobile and seriously injured plaintiff.

It is alleged that the defendants Keith, Waller, and Rhone did not have control over the train; that they omitted to ring any bell, sound any whistle, or give any warning whatever as the train approached the crossing; that if defendants had sounded the whistle at a distance of 80 rods from the crossing, and had continued to ring the bell or sound the whistle from that point until they reached the crossing, the plaintiff would have known of the approach of the train, and would not have gone upon the track and been injured.

The answer denied all the allegations of the complaint except those in reference to the corporate capacity of appellant and the existence of said orchard, and affirmatively alleged that the train was carefully and properly run; that plaintiff was driving his automobile at a speed of about 30 miles per hour; that the whistle was blown and the bell sounded; that plaintiff, as he approached the crossing, did not look or listen for an approaching train; that if he had done so, he would have known that the train was approaching the crossing and that he was guilty of contributory negligence which directly and proximately caused the injuries. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff against the Southern Pacific Company for $17,946.55, but against plaintiff as to said trainmen, Keith, Waller, and Rhone.

It appears that plaintiff in company with one West Lee left Dinuba about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the day of the accident. In leaving the town, they crossed the railroad approximately one-half or three-fourths of a mile northwest of the crossing where the accident happened, and proceeded in a southerly direction until they came to a county road leading in an easterly direction toward the railway. They traveled along this roadway and in an easterly direction until the automobile collided with the train. As they crossed the railway in leaving the town of Dinuba, the witness Lee looked down along the railroad track in a southeasterly direction toward the town of Monson and saw the smoke of a train beyond the crossing at which the accident occurred. Lee and the plaintiff say that there was a rough place in the county road upon which they were traveling, about 150 yards west of the crossing, near a stone culvert, and that plaintiff brought his automobile down to a slow gait, and thereafter moved slowly toward the railroad crossing. They and their witnesses testified that there was one row of tall sunflowers extending along the south side of the county road and into the railroad right of way, to within a few feet of the railroad track, and that there was another row of tall sunflowers extending southeasterly from the south side of the county road along the fence which separates the railroad right of way from the Weddle orchard. Lee's estimate of the height of these sunflowers was 6 or 7 feet.

The westerly or southwesterly boundary of the railroad right of way from the center line of the railroad track, measured along the center line of the highway, is about 70 feet. Plaintiff testified that as he approached the crossing he looked in a southeasterly direction, and that he listened for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there was a train approaching the crossing, but that he did not see or hear one. As to his knowledge of conditions at the crossing, he testified as follows:

"I knew that trains were passing up and down the road frequently, and I was somewhat familiar with the road. I do not know how often I have been over that road, but I believe I had been over it once that day, and I had had occasion to be over it many times previous to that time, but I went usually another way and didn't go over this crossing. I noticed the sunflowers, or other weeds or wild oats there about ten days before the accident. At that time I particularly noticed the sunflowers and wild oats, and this other vegetation, and that is the reason I approached as cautiously as I could—and I knew they were there on the occasion of making this approach to the railroad track on the 18th day of July."

As to his automobile he testified:

"My automobile was in good condition and repair, both as to brakes and otherwise, and I could stop it within a distance of 3 or 4 feet by applying the brakes. I could have stopped it by the emergency brake, or the foot brake, or by shifting my gearing across to the other side of the disc. I could have set it back so that it would not have moved a foot after that."

[1] As to his conduct while within the railroad's right of way, he was asked this question:

"Now, when you were approaching the crossing, and while you were within the lines of the right of way of the railroad company—still on the county road, of course—did you stop your machine, or look or listen for an approaching train?"

And he answered:

"I did not. I could not have seen it if I did, unless I got out of the machine and walked up to the track."

By this answer he showed very clearly, under the decisions, that he was chargeable with such contributory negligence as to preclude recovery. In other words, he did not exercise that due care for his own safety which the law demanded of him. It was his duty to stop and look and listen, at some point where such conduct would be effective. According to his own testimony, he knew of the obstructions to his view. But if he had not known of them before, he certainly observed them that day when he attempted to see if any train was approaching. Common prudence under such circumstances would dictate that he bring his machine to a full stop before attempting to cross the track. If he had done so, he would undoubtedly have heard the train approaching. But to exercise due care, under the situation as revealed by him, the consensus of the opinion of prudent men would require him, if necessary to ascertain whether his life was in danger, to get out of his machine and go forward a few feet on foot in order that the matter might be placed beyond peradventure. We may say, in passing, that the testimony of plaintiff as to the obstruction of the view seems almost incredible in the light of the whole record, but, accepting his statement as true, his misfortune is attributable to his own carelessness.

In Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651, it was said:

"But the cases arising from injuries suffered at railroad crossings have been so numerous, and upon certain points there has been such absolute accord, that what will constitute ordinary care in such a case has been precisely defined, and, if any element is wanting, the courts will hold as matter of law that the plaintiff has been guilty of negligence."

The rule of conduct at railroad crossings is therein stated, and it has been recognized and enforced in all the subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court.

In Green v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 138 Cal. 1, 70 Pac. 926, it was held that:

"As a general rule, one approaching a railroad track must stop and listen, and the only exception to such rule is that there may be particular instances where the circumstances would not call for such precaution."

And in the consideration of the facts of that case, it was said:

"The fact that they looked to the east as they passed the gate, or opening, farther up the street, as above noted, which was of little benefit to them, is no excuse for not looking or listening at points near the track, where such looking or listening would have been effective."

In Chrissinger v. Southern Pacific Co., 169 Cal. 619, 149 Pac. 175, the rule is stated as follows:

"A person approaching a railroad track, which is itself a warning of danger, must take advantage of every reasonable opportunity to look and listen. Undoubtedly the question of contributory negligence or freedom from it is ordinarily one for the jury, but where, as here, the standard of conduct is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons, and the plaintiff has failed to measure up to that standard under the circumstances shown, he is not entitled to have his case go to the jury."

In Griffin v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. R. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842, after reciting the facts, the Supreme Court said:

"From these facts it is clear that Mr. Griffin neglected the simplest and plainest precautions for the safety of himself and the others in the automobile. It is the duty of a traveler on a highway approaching a railroad crossing to use ordinary care in selecting a time and place to look and listen for coming trains. He should stop for the purpose of making such observations when necessary. It is his duty to use all his faculties, and it is not enough if he merely listens, believing that the people in charge of any approaching engine will ring a bell or sound a whistle. * * * He (Mr. Griffin) had his car under perfect control. The brakes had been tightened that day. He was running at a very low rate of speed, and it would have been easy for him to stop a short distance beyond the fence corner at a place of complete safety and one well suited to observation. Failing to do this amounts to contributory negligence on his part."

It may be said that Mr. Griffin's negligence in that case was no more manifest than that of plaintiff in the case at bar.

It is true, as declared in the opinions, that the rule requiring the traveler to stop is not an absolute one. If the view is entirely unobstructed, the traveler, while going toward a crossing, may see whether a train is approaching in dangerous proximity. Of course, in a case like that it would be idle to require the traveler to stop to find out something that he can ascertain just as well without stopping. He must, however, avail himself of the vision, and if he is exercising ordinary care, he need not stop except to allow an approaching train to pass so as to avoid a collision. But where the view is obstructed, he must place himself in a position where he can use his faculties of observation to advantage. In such case he stops—not primarily to avoid a collision—but to ascertain whether a collision is threatened. Whereas, if the view is unobstructed, if he stops, it is to allow the approaching train to pass.

It appears entirely clear to us that the foregoing is decisive of the controversy, and that it is really unnecessary to notice other points. However, we may briefly call attention to two other grounds of criticism that would demand a reversal of the judgment.

[2] Among the instructions given by the court was the following:

"The plaintiff, in approaching the railroad crossing on the public highway, referred to in the pleadings in this case, had a right to rely upon the performance by those on the locomotive of every act imposed by the law upon them when approaching a crossing. In the legal sense, he was innocent of negligence, unless there was a want of ordinary care and prudence on his part. * * * The degree of caution required is relative to the risk; but no person is bound to assume that another will abandon any reasonable precaution, or violate the obligation imposed upon him by the laws of the land. Plaintiff was authorized to assume that all other persons using the public highway would do so with due care, and it cannot be imputed as negligence that he did not anticipate that the servants or agents in charge of a railroad train on said highway would not perform their duty of ringing a bell or sounding a whistle as the law required. He had the right to assume, until he reached a point where he could look up and down the track, that no train was approaching the crossing, because there was no sound of an engine, bell, or of a whistle."

If the traveler had the right to assume that defendant's employes would observe the law requiring them to ring the bell and sound the whistle when approaching the crossing, he would, of course, have a right to rely upon receiving such information of approaching danger, and would be entirely excusable for neglecting to avail himself of any other source of knowledge. Again, if he had a right to so assume, if no bell as a matter of fact was rung or whistle sounded, he would have a right to assume that no train was in fact approaching, and he would not be chargeable with negligence if he acted upon that assumption and proceeded to cross the track.

In Huston v. Southern California Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 703, 89 Pac. 1093, it is said:

"It is not the law of this state that a person approaching a railroad crossing is authorized to assume that the persons operating a train will not in any way be negligent in that operation. This doctrine has been asserted in some of the states, but is opposed to the law as laid down in the decisions of this state and of the Supreme Court of the United States. Such a rule would abrogate the doctrine of contributory negligence in all such cases."

[3] There is manifestly another fatal error lurking in the last clause of the instruction. Therein the court plainly invaded the province of the jury in a matter of vital importance. It was probably an inadvertence to declare that "there was no sound of an engine, bell, or of a whistle," but the effect was the same, whether the statement was intentionally made or not. If the evidence had all been in favor of respondent's contention, it might be said that such declaration was without prejudice, but on this point there was a sharp conflict in the testimony. The engineer, the two brakemen, and the firemen testified that the whistle was sounded, and that the bell was rung up to the crossing and had been ringing constantly for about two miles, back from the crossing, it is plain therefore, that the question should have been left to the jury without any suggestion or statement as to the fact by the court.

[4] Again, it is plain that the negligence of appellant, if any, which was the proximate cause of the injury, consisted in running the train at a high rate of speed without sounding any warning of its approach. But these acts of commission and omission were the acts of appellant's agents whom we have already mentioned. Appellant did not, of course, actually participate in running the train, but it is liable, if at all, upon the theory that it is responsible for the want of care on the part of its servants. The jury found, however, that said servants were not guilty of any negligence. It would follow that appellant was acquitted of any dereliction in running the train. In Bradley v. Rosenthal, 154 Cal. 425, 97 Pac. 875, 129 Am. St. Rep. 171, it is held that where recovery is sought, based upon the act or omission of an agent, which the principal did not direct, and in which he did not participate, an acquittal of the agent of negligence is an acquittal of the principal because the principal's responsibility is cast upon him by law because of his relationship to his agent.

There is some contention that appellant did actually participate in the accident by reason of permitting the growth of weeds so as to obstruct the view of the track. But from respondent's standpoint upon the assumption that he was exercising ordinary care, it is quite clear from the record that he would have been apprised of the danger if the bell had been properly rung and the whistle sounded. He can justify his cause of action only upon the theory that these precautions were omitted. If he had conceded that these usual warnings were sounded, he would have had no cause with which to go to the jury, as he showed no reason why he would or could not have heard them in time to avoid the collision. Indeed, he alleges in his complaint that he would have heard the warning if it had been given. The presence of the weeds simply emphasized the importance and duty of great care on the part of those in charge of the train, and we repeat that since they were acquitted of negligence, the jury, to be consistent, should have gone a step further and exonerated the appellant. The judgment and order are reversed.

Miller & Miller, of Hanford, for appellant. H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, and H. P. Brown, of Fresno, for respondents.

HART, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment and the order denying it a new trial.

The controversy arises out of a contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants, as copartners, at Kansas City, Mo., on the 8th day of October, 1910. Said contract is made a part of the complaint. The plaintiff is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Nebraska. The defendants, at the time of the making of the contract mentioned, were copartners, doing business in the city of Sacramento under the firm name of Ritchie & Heriot.

The single question presented by this appeal is whether the contract upon which the action is founded was one whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendants agreed to purchase the tire protectors at the prices and upon the conditions therein specified, or was one whereby the plaintiff agreed to ship or make consignments of the tire protectors to the defendants upon the understanding or condition that the protectors to be so shipped or consigned should be paid for only when they were sold by the defendants, or, to put the proposition in another form, it is whether the parties to the contract intended it to operate only to create between them the relation of principal and agents or that of creditor and debtor, or, in other words, whether the delivery of the goods to the defendants was intended by the agreement to constitute an absolute sale thereof. The proposition thus stated calls for a construction of said contract, or, what practically amounts to the same thing, involves the question whether the court's findings, which necessarily involve and exemplify its construction of the contract, derive sufficient support from the evidence. The contract in full reads as follows:

"Agreements made this 8th day of October, 1910, by and between Slama Tire Protector Company, Kansas City, Mo., known as the party of the first part, and Ritchie and Heriot of Sacramento, Cal., known as party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas, party of the first part is engaged in selling tire protectors, known as Slama tire protector, which product is protected by various letters patent of the United States of America; and

"Whereas, the party of the second part is desirous of purchasing and selling said protectors in the states of Washington, Oregon, California, Arizona, and Nevada.

"Whereas, the party of the first part is willing to permit party of the second part to sell said protectors in accordance with terms mentioned herein:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of one dollar by each of the parties hereto, the other in hand paid, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, said parties do covenant and agree to and with each other as follows:

"(1) The parties of the second part agree to purchase from said first party a total of five hundred pair of above-referred protectors for each year of this contract to be taken either on or before expiration of each year of contract, and such quantity that is purchased over the stipulated amount can be applied toward total purchases of next succeeding year's purchases.

"(2) Said second party agrees that they will not sell any of said protectors at less than the established list prices attached herewith, marked Exhibit A, when selling to the consumer, nor allow any of their subagents to violate this agreement.

"(3) The second party agrees to spend the sum of two thousand dollars ($2,000.00) annually during the life of contract towards advertising said protectors in manner they see fit for the benefit of the sale of such protectors, and all expenditures for such advertising to be reported by verified statements to said first party. It is also understood that any amount spent over and above this sum can be applied toward making total of the amount to be spent during the life of this contract.

"(4) The party of the first part agrees to furnish party of the second part such quantities of circular matter with the said second party's name printed thereon at any time they are requested to do so and in such quantities as will be necessary for the second party to properly circularize the territory covered and allotted to said second party.

"(5) The said party of the first part agrees to turn over all inquiries, orders, and business coming from the territory or states specified herein.

"(6) Said first party agrees to supply a sufficient stock of said protectors to meet all reasonable demand to said second party, and a report of stock on hand is to be made the 1st day of each month to said first party by said second party. All goods taken from such stock to be paid for as provided hereinafter. New and unused protectors are only to be considered as stock on hand. All stock on hand to be kept fully insured, and all freight and storage charges to be paid by second party, and in the event of any of said goods being returned for any reason, freight is to be prepaid back to the factory.

"(7) The price to be paid to first party for such protectors as they shall purchase will be list price as per Exhibit A attached herewith, less discount of 30 per cent. therefrom with an additional discount of 5 per cent. for cash, payable the 10th of each month of net cash, if paid at the end of each month. If the said second party shall comply with all the terms and conditions of this contract, and as soon as the total purchases paid for amount to two hundred fifty (250) pair, then the said first party will allow an additional discount of 5 per cent. from all protectors purchased. Should these same conditions be complied with, and the total paid-for purchases amount to five hundred (500) pair, then another 5 per cent. will be allowed, thus making a total discount from the list price in that event amount to 30-5-5 per cent. and the extra 5 per cent. for cash. In the event of the maximum discount being reached, permission is given as a matter of convenience to figure a total net discount of 40 per cent.

"(8) Privilege is given to said second party to call and advertise our product under the name of 'the armour plate tire protector.'

"(9) The life of this contract shall be for a term of five (5) years, but shall not be assignable by the party of the second part."

Annexed to the contract is a schedule containing a list of the prices which the defendants were to pay for the goods consigned to them by the plaintiff under the terms of the agreement, and for not less than which they were to sell them to the public.

The complaint avers:

"That under and pursuant to said contract plaintiff shipped to defendants at Sacramento, Cal., at defendants' instance and request, between the 8th day of October, 1910, and the 1st day of May, 1911, tire protectors of the value $18,700.45, estimated at the price provided for in said contract; that, as plaintiff is informed and believes, and on such information and belief alleges, all of said tire protectors so delivered to defendants as aforesaid have been sold by defendants."

It is alleged that of the sum above mentioned there has been paid by the defendants to the plaintiff the sum of $2,741.75 only, and that there is consequently due the latter from the former the sum of $15,958.70.

A general demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, the defendant Ritchie answered.

The answer admits the making of the contract mentioned in the complaint, admits the shipment to the defendants by the plaintiff of a certain quantity of the protectors, but denies that they were of the value of $18,700.45, averring, however, that they were of the value of $28,333.45, denies that said fire protectors so delivered to the defendants have been sold by said defendants, but admits that of the protectors so delivered to the defendants the latter have sold "about $6,275 worth only," which amount it is alleged has been paid to the plaintiff.

The answer sets up a number of special defenses and counterclaims growing out of alleged breaches of the agreement by the plaintiff, said counterclaims amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $42,000. As to these, however, it may here be remarked that the court found, and appears to have been justified in so finding, that the defendant was entitled to nothing on the counterclaims pleaded by him. They therefore need not be further noticed.

It is further alleged in the answer that, after the contract in question was made, the partnership existing between Ritchie & Heriot at the time of the execution of said instrument was, by the mutual consent of said partners, dissolved, and that the said contract was thereupon assumed by the said Ritchie, "who continued to transact the business theretofore conducted by the said co-partnership."

The court found that the pleaded contract was entered into between the parties as alleged in the complaint; that the plaintiff shipped to the defendants at Sacramento tire protectors of the value of $18,700.45; that the defendants did not sell all the protectors so shipped, but did sell a portion thereof, amounting in value to the sum of $2,741.75; that all of said goods were shipped to and received by the defendants to be paid for when sold, and not otherwise; that no part of the said sum of $18,700.75, the value of the protectors shipped to the defendants, has been paid by the said defendants, except the sum of $2,741.75; "but the court finds that it is not true that there is a balance due from the said defendants to plaintiff in the sum of $15,958.70, or any other sum."

It must be conceded that the contract, upon its face, is rather ambiguous and uncertain as to the nature of the relation which the parties thereto intended thereby to establish between themselves. That the construction placed upon it by the trial court, as evidenced by its findings, is reasonable and sustainable by certain language of the instrument, no one reading the writing will for an instant doubt. On the other hand, language is used from which the conclusion might justly be justified that the intention was that, while the defendants were to enjoy the exclusive right and privilege of selling the tire protectors within the territory designated in the contract, they were nevertheless to be required to purchase the goods outright from the plaintiff on the terms and conditions of the agreement, and that each order or shipment was to constitute an absolute sale.

The preamble to the contract contains the declaration that:

"The party of the first part is willing to permit party of second part to sell said protectors in accordance with the terms mentioned herein."

Among the terms of the contract is a provision that the prices at which the defendants are to sell the article must not be less than the established prices indicated in the schedule attached to the contract exhibiting a list of prices, "nor allow any of their subagents to violate this agreement." This language, viewed by the light of that of the preamble, above referred to, appears to make it very clear that the intention was that the defendants were by the contract to act as mere selling agents of the plaintiff. As counsel for the defendant well suggest:

"The idea of subagents must presuppose an agent. * * * There could be no reason for the expression 'subagent' unless the parties had in mind that the second parties were the agent of the first party in the matter of the distribution of these protectors."

Again, the third paragraph of the contract binds the defendants to the obligation of expending the sum of $2,000 each year during the life of the contract for the purpose of advertising the protectors and to render to the plaintiff a verified statement of expenditures for such purpose. Such a provision is a most unusual one in a contract providing for the absolute or unconditional sale of a commodity. If the contract was intended as one for the absolute sale of the article at the prices specified therein, is it reasonable to suppose that the defendants would have bound themselves for a period of five years to the expenditure of such a large sum each year of the five for such a purpose? Indeed, if it had been intended as such a contract, is it reasonably to be supposed that the plaintiff, having received its price for its goods, would have exacted such an agreement from the purchaser? The burden imposed by said provision as a condition upon which a party might acquire the rights and authority of a selling agent for another would not be per se an unreasonable one; for, as counsel for the defendant suggest, the clause may the more reasonably be construed as involving an agreement on the part of the defendants to expend the amount required for advertising as a bonus for the right and privilege of acting as the selling or distributing agents of the plaintiff within the designated territory. Then there is the clause whereby it is covenanted that the plaintiff will supply the defendants with a sufficient "stock of said protectors to meet all reasonable demands," the defendants to report to the plaintiff on the first day of each month the amount of stock on hand. Said clause further provides that the defendants were to keep the stock on hand fully insured. Such conditions as these are rarely to be found in a contract of sale, but are peculiarly appropriate to a bailment or some other transaction by which it is not intended that the consignee of the goods shall acquire title thereto.

Thus we could proceed and point out other language of the contract which, taken alone or viewed in connection with the provisions of the instrument above referred to, clearly implies that the contract was intended to establish the relation of principal and agents between the parties, and not intended as a contract for the sale of the goods; but it is unnecessary to further examine the contract for this purpose. The instrument is presented herein in full, and there can be no difficulty in observing from its language that the conclusion arrived at by the court below as to its legal nature, scope, and effect involves a reasonable view of the language of the writing.

We do not say that the provisions of the contract above specifically adverted to are wholly inconsistent with the theory that the transaction was intended as a contract of sale. What we do say is that the provisions are perfectly consistent with a contract creating an agency. Indeed, as declared, some of them are very rarely to be found incorporated into a contract for the absolute or unconditional sale of goods. And it should further be noted that the plaintiff appears to have proceeded in this action upon the theory that the transaction involved only a conditional sale of the protectors to the defendants. The complaint alleges, upon the information and belief of the plaintiff, that all of the protectors shipped to the defendants had been sold by the latter. If the transaction was in fact an absolute sale of the goods, why such an allegation in the complaint? What material difference could it make to the plaintiff whether the goods were or were not sold by the defendants, if, in truth, the sale was absolute, and title to the goods passed to the defendants? The averment is obviously wholly inconsistent with the theory of an absolute or unconditional sale.

[1] As suggested, however, it must be admitted that the contract contains some language which, if considered by itself or without reference to or consideration of other language of the instrument, might warrant the construction to which the writing is subjected by the plaintiff, viz. that it involves an agreement for the absolute sale of the tire protectors to the defendants. Indeed, it may justly be assumed to be true that the instrument is so characterized by ambiguity and uncertainty as to the nature of the relation which the parties intended thereby to create between themselves that either of the two constructions of the contract urged by the respective parties might upon reasons equally cogent be sustained. The question therefore then arises, assuming, of course, that no competent testimony extrinsic to the writing itself reflecting light upon the real intention of the parties has been received: Is it, in such a situation, within the proper or legal functions of a court of review to declare that the construction given the writing by the trial court should be rejected and supplanted by the other construction of which the instrument is susceptible? Manifestly no reason can be conceived which would support an affirmative reply to that question. The appeal court could not adopt such a course in such a case without resorting to the exercise of arbitrary power. So, if there were no other evidence in this record but the instrument itself which throws or tends to throw any light on the relation which the parties by the contract intended to establish between themselves, we would feel constrained—indeed, it would be our duty—to uphold the construction given the contract by the trial court, as evidenced by its findings.

[2] But there was introduced and received in the case some evidence extrinsic to the instrument itself which we think tends to support the trial court's construction. After the contract was made and a large stock of protectors had been shipped to the defendants, considerable correspondence by mail was carried on between the parties. Some of these letters were introduced in evidence. Excerpts from a few will be sufficient to indicate that the plaintiff understood the contract to call for a payment for the goods shipped to the defendants only when the latter sold the same. In one of the plaintiff's letters to the defendants the following language was used:

"It is also much to be regretted to note the exceptional dry weather California is experiencing, especially this being your first year with the protectors, and as you say, so much depends upon the weather in your section of the country. No doubt, however, when the rains do start, you will make up for lost time, which is surely hoped for, as you know by my previous letters that this amount of stock we have with you has put us in rather tight financial circumstances and caused us to borrow money from the banks in order to meet our own obligations, which were necessarily increased on account of the anticipated business from you. We really realize your condition on account of the weather, and have enough faith in you to know that, if the business is to be had, you will get it. All we want is that you play the game square, and you will find us easy people to get along with."

In the same letter reference is made to a proposition by the defendants to sell a portion of their territory to a Mr. Kaar for the sum of $1,000, and the plaintiff wrote:

"We were very much interested, however, in noting your proposition to Mr. Kaar, and would like to know just what territory you intended turning over to him for this amount, and also your reason for making a proposition of this kind. We were wondering if you are getting dissatisfied with the proposition, or thought that Salt Lake City was a little out of your territory."

Again, the following letter, under date of February 24, 1911, was addressed by the plaintiff to the defendants:

"We hardly know how to express ourselves in replying to your telegram in which you inform us that you have not sold any protectors for two months, and in this telegram you say there is none to make this month. We, of course, realize the dry weather had something to do with the sales falling off, but when they are reduced from what they were to absolutely nothing we cannot help but think something is wrong, and you in our position would, of course, think likewise. We have treated you absolutely square in all of our dealings with you, and expect the same from you. If it is your intention to discontinue handling our protectors, we wish you would say so at once and return what new unused stock you have on hand by prepaid freight and remit for the balance due us as per our agreement. Stock that has been put to use is not returnable."

It is not necessary to enter herein upon an analytical examination of the above letters to show that their language clearly implies the relation of principal and agent between the parties. The letters sufficiently speak for themselves in that respect.

Other letters passing between the parties were introduced in evidence. In the place of presenting herein extracts therefrom, it is sufficient to say that said letters contained language clearly indicating that both parties to the contract understood the agreement to have been intended, not as a contract for the absolute sale of the goods, but merely to vest in the defendants the authority of agents in the sale of said goods within the several states named.

Many other significant considerations revealed by the correspondence between the parties might be mentioned, all tending to support the theory that the contract was intended as and in fact was a contract of agency, or, at the most, a conditional sale, the protectors consigned to the defendants to be paid for only when the goods consigned to the defendants were sold by them.

In addition to the foregoing considerations, the statements rendered to the defendants by the plaintiff of protectors shipped to the former may be referred to as indicating the view the plaintiff had of the character or nature of the contract. These statements were uniformly marked "consignment," and from this fact it is reasonably inferable that the plaintiff regarded the shipments under the contract as mere consignments and not as a delivery on the sale of the goods.

Our conclusion is from all the facts and circumstances of the transaction involved here, as disclosed by the contract itself and other documentary proofs, that the court's findings are sufficiently supported; that, under the terms of the contract, as it is warrantably construed by the court, there could not be a completed sale until the defendants sold the goods to third parties. Until that occurred, the consignee was under no obligation to pay the listed prices therefor, and could have been compelled to surrender the goods to the consignor upon demand. Vermont Marble Co. v. Brow, 109 Cal. 236, 41 Pac. 1031, 50 Am. St. Rep. 37.

It is true, as the authorities declare:

"The distinction between agency contracts creating bailments and contracts of sale is not always clear, * * * and in some cases a contract may be construed as creating merely an agency as between the parties where, as between the parties and a third person, it might be given the effect of a sale." 6 Corpus Juris, p. 1091.

There is no question of the rights of third persons involved in the transaction with which we are presently concerned.

After all, however, where the contract is uncertain or not clear as to its purpose and effect, the question whether the transaction of which it purports to be the evidence is a sale or a bailment is to be determined from all the circumstances giving rise to it, and on conflicting evidence a question of fact is presented for the jury's determination. 6 Corpus Juris, p. 1087.

But counsel for the plaintiff contend that the "terms of selling these goods were to be determined by the defendant, and that he agreed to pay a fixed price for the goods," and declare that therefore the case here comes within the rule that where the consignee or factor is to sell upon terms fixed by himself, and is bound to pay to the consignor a fixed price, the contract is one of sale. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 520. The contract here, however, expressly provides, as will be observed from a perusal of it, that the "second party agrees that they will not sell any of said protectors at less than the established list prices attached herewith, marked Exhibit A, when selling to the consumer, nor allow any of their subagents to violate this agreement." Thus it is plainly manifest that the defendants were not at liberty under the contract to fix their own minimum prices in selling the goods, but were to be governed in that respect entirely by the prices fixed by the consignor—the plaintiff itself.

We have neither been shown nor found a substantial reason for declaring that the trial court's construction of the contract is erroneous, and the judgment and the order are accordingly affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

CATLIN v. UNION OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 1993, 2017.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California, Oct. 2, 1916.)

1. NEGLIGENCE — 56(1)—"PROXIMATE CAUSE"—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

"Proximate cause" is that cause arising out of a breach of duty which in a natural and continuous sequence produces the damage complained of.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. — 56(1).

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Proximate Cause.]

2. EXPLOSIVES — 9—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES — PROXIMATE CAUSE.

When there is no privity of contract between the first wrongdoer and persons suffering damage, and the negligent act relates to articles which carry no menace, the liability of the first party will go no further than to his immediate co-contractor, although the rule is otherwise as to explosives and poisons, in which case a vendor who misbrands them may be held liable though they pass through a number of intermediate hands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. — 9.]

3. EXPLOSIVES — 9 — INFLAMMABLE OILS — NEGLIGENCE.

Through the negligence of defendant's driver, gasoline and coal oil mixed were delivered to a grocer in place of pure coal oil. The grocer discovered that some of the coal oil was mixed with gasoline, but from tests of smell and evaporation decided that two of the cans filled were free from gasoline. He notified defendant, and the driver agreed to remove the oil on the following business day. In the meantime, the grocer disposed of a can, which he believed was pure coal oil, to a deceased. In filling a lamp, the oil exploded and deceased was killed. Held, that while, in the case of inflammable oils and poisons, the vendor who misbranded them is liable, though they pass through a number of hands, defendant was not liable, for the negligence of the grocer, who was familiar with the danger from gasoline, in disposing of the oil as coal oil though he knew some of that delivered was mixed with gasoline, was an intervening cause which defendant could not be charged with anticipating.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. 62(3).]

4. NEGLIGENCE 62(3)—PROXIMATE CAUSE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

One, but for whose negligence an injury would not have occurred, is liable despite the negligent acts of others, where such subsequent intervening acts might have been anticipated.

5. NEGLIGENCE 136(8) — ACTIONS — JURY QUESTION.

While, ordinarily, the question of negligence is a mixed one of law and fact and should go to the jury, the rule is otherwise where the facts are undisputed and reasonable men could not differ as to the matter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 290-292; Dec. Dig. 136(8).]

6. EVIDENCE 126(1)—ADMISSIBILITY—RES GESTÆ.

In an action for the death of one killed by an explosion of illuminating oil, testimony that deceased, after explaining the way he was burned, stated that there must have been gasoline in the coal oil, is not admissible as part of the res gestæ, being a mere statement of deceased's belief, and not relating to the cause of the accident.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 372; Dec. Dig. 126(1).]

7. EXPLOSIVES 10—ACTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Deceased, who attempted to fill a lamp with coal oil while a flame was near by, cannot, in view of the standard of inflammability of lamp coal oil, be held guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, but the question is one for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. 10.]

8. TRIAL 260(2)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL.

Where the charges given covered the issues correctly, additional charges are properly refused.

9. DEATH 99(1) — DAMAGES — EXCESSIVENESS.

An award of $17,000 damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, a strong man 44 years old, who had an expectancy of 25 years and earned nearly $3 a day, cannot be held excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 125, 126; Dec. Dig. 99(1).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis I. Morrison, Judge.

Action by May Catlin, administratrix of the estate of John Catlin, deceased, against the Union Oil Company of California and William M. Riley and wife. From a judgment against the first-named defendant, and an order denying its motion for new trial, it appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Lewis W. Andrews, Thos. O. Toland, A. V. Andrews, and Andrews, Toland & Andrews, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. J. W. Whitworth and R. T. Lightfoot and E. B. Drake, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the death of John Catlin, alleged to have been caused by the negligent acts of the defendant Union Oil Company and William M. Riley. Mary E. Riley, the wife of William M. Riley, was also sued; but the action was dismissed as to her in the course of the trial. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Union Oil Company for the sum of $17,000, on which judgment was entered. By the verdict it was found that William M. Riley was not liable for damages in any sum. The defendant Union Oil Company appealed from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

In November, 1912, William M. Riley was conducting a grocery store at the town of Sawtelle in Los Angeles county. Among other classes of merchandise, he dealt regularly in fuel oils, including gasoline and kerosene. The oils he stored in a little outbuilding some 30 feet or more away from the store proper. In this outbuilding he had a tank for gasoline and one for coal oil, or kerosene. On about the 15th of November, that being Friday of the week, he gave an order to the Union Oil Company to deliver to him 60 gallons of kerosene. The tank wagon belonging to the oil company made delivery. The kerosene tank had a capacity of 60 gallons. The tank was not empty, but contained 20 gallons of the fluid before the quantity delivered that day was added to it. Hence the driver of the oil wagon was only able to put into the tank 40 gallons of the 60 gallons ordered. There were four or five empty 5-gallon cans inside of the oil room, and into these cans was poured the remaining 20 gallons, which completely filled both the tank and the other receptacles mentioned. Almost immediately after the tank wagon had left his place, Riley, according to his testimony, took one of the 5-gallon cans which had been filled as described, and delivered it to a customer; for another customer, either that evening or the following morning, he drew a gallon from the tank which had been filled; and for a third customer he made delivery of another gallon, evidently from the same supply. Complaint was very soon made by the patron who had received the 5-gallon can that there was something the matter with the oil, and also complaint came from one of the persons who had received a single gallon. On Saturday morning, being the next day after the delivery of the oil, Riley got back all of the oil about which complaint had been made that he was able to secure, including the 5-gallon can which he had delivered to the first customer. He testified that one of the single gallons of oil returned he poured back into the large tank; that he then had the four 5-gallon cans of oil which had been filled by the tank wagon, and of the contents of these he proceeded to make tests. Riley had for a number of years, both in the East and in California, had experience in the handling of both kerosene and gasoline as a dealer. He testified that in making his tests he dipped splinters of wood into the cans, noted the smell of the fluid, and also the rapidity with which it evaporated from the sticks; that by this means, and also by noting the odor of the fluid, he made up his mind that two of the 5-gallon cans contained gasoline and two contained coal oil; that he made a further test of the fluid in the two cans which he had concluded was gasoline by taking a small quantity thereof and placing it upon a stove where, when it was subjected to heat, it flashed up quickly. He made no further tests of the contents of the other two cans, being satisfied that these cans contained coal oil. On cross-examination he testified that had the oil been mixed he did not know whether he would have been able to determine from the tests he made if it was gasoline or kerosene. He testified further that he took the two cans which he had determined contained gasoline, labeled them with a label showing their true contents, and placed them upon the large gasoline tank. Then, as he testified, he delivered one of the 5-gallon cans believed to be coal oil to the patron by whom the five gallons of gasoline had been returned; that there then remained on the floor of the oil room one 5-gallon can of coal oil which had been a part of the delivery made on the preceding day; that the same evening (Saturday), at about dark or dusk, one of the children of Catlin came and wanted kerosene oil; that he (Riley) informed the child that because of insurance regulations he could not handle illuminating oil after dark, and that, as the child insisted that the family had no oil, he told her if she would bring a small can the following morning (Sunday), as he made no deliveries on that day, he would give her sufficient to last until Monday, when he would deliver the remainder of the five gallons; that on Sunday morning one of the Catlin children returned with a gallon can which he (Riley) filled from the 5-gallon can sitting on the floor of the oil room; and that the next morning he delivered the four gallons remaining in the can at the Catlin home, where he poured the oil into an empty can customarily used for that purpose.

John Catlin, the deceased, at the time of his death was 44 years of age, in good health, weighing about 185 pounds. As his wife testified, he was a "strong" man and had had no illness or needed the attention of a physician. He had been married to the plaintiff, his wife, for 23 years, and there survived him besides the widow, four children, aged, respectively: Bessie, 19; Pauline, 17; Howard, 13; Fred, 11. He had been a miner, but at the date of the accident his regular employment was that of a carpenter's helper, at which work he earned $2.75 per day. His life expectancy was 25 years. On Tuesday evening following the receipt of the oil delivered by Riley, being at work laying some cement in his cellar, he had occasion to make use of an oil lamp. He was already carrying in a miner's cap on his head a small lamp such as miners customarily use. This small lamp was lighted and remained so until after the explosion which produced the injuries from which Catlin later died. Catlin went to the rear of the house in or about a screen porch in order to fill the larger oil lamp which he intended to use, and apparently started to pour what he assumed was coal oil or kerosene from the large can into the lamp, when the explosion occurred. Mrs. Catlin, as she testified, heard the noise of an explosion, and almost immediately her husband ran to the front of the house, covered with fire, and rolled in the grass, calling for help. She tried to smother the flames with bedclothing and, with the help of a neighbor, the fire was finally extinguished. One witness, a Mr. Tucker, who assisted in extinguishing the fire burning on the person of Catlin, testified that when he reached Catlin the latter said:

"Oh, Mr. Tucker! Put this fire out on me. I am burning up. Do something for me quick. I was filling the lamp and it exploded, and before I could throw the can it exploded also. Put the fire out. I am burning up. I have handled gasoline and coal oil all my life. I am an old miner. Why should anything of this kind happen to me? I am sure that it was gasoline."

On cross-examination this witness added that while on the way to the hospital the injured man had said that he had filled lamps before "when they were lit" and had never had one act that way. Catlin in his injured condition was removed immediately to a hospital, where he died two days later. It appeared without dispute that the driver of the appellant company, instead of delivering 60 gallons of coal oil as directed, delivered in part coal oil and in part gasoline, and that the mistake came about in this way: The tank wagon from which deliveries were made was divided into three compartments, one in front, one in the middle, and one at the rear. These compartments were entirely separated one from the other, and connected with each at the rear of the wagon was a stopcock or faucet. That customarily gasoline was carried in the forward tank and kerosene in the two rear ones; that on the day when the delivery to Riley was made the driver started to load his wagon and had commenced to fill the forward tank with gasoline. That, desiring to attend to his team, he asked one of the other employes, an agent of appellant, to complete the filling of the forward tank and to put kerosene into the two rear ones. These latter he knew to be empty at the time. That this employe, after completing the filling of the forward tank with gasoline, filled the middle one with kerosene as directed, but, through some error of understanding or judgment, put gasoline into the rear compartment. The driver testified that, in delivering oil in quantities as large as that ordered by Riley, he customarily used two 5-gallon measures having handles on them, and drew from two faucets at the same time; that he followed this custom in making the delivery to Riley and drew from the faucets connecting with the two rear compartments, filling his two measures thus at the same time, emptying them and refilling them until the desired quantity had been secured. Riley, the grocer, testified that he was familiar with this practice and noted that the driver followed it on the Friday when he received the delivery of the oil. The driver explained that in consequence of this practice of drawing two measures at a time, and as each measure when filled would completely fill a 5-gallon can, the four cans filled with the last 20 gallons of oil desired by Riley should have contained unmixed fluid; that is, two should have contained gasoline and two kerosene. This conclusion would be in accordance with the tests made by Riley.

There is some discrepancy between the testimony of Riley and the testimony of the driver of the wagon, wherein the driver stated that, when he returned on Monday to take away the oil, he found one 5-gallon can full of coal oil still standing near the door of the oil house. Riley had testified that he had placed two of the 5-gallon cans on top of the gasoline tank and marked them with the word "gasoline," and that, of the two remaining which he had determined to be kerosene, he had delivered one to the first patron who had returned the gasoline, and had taken the other to fill the Catlin order. Riley testified that there was in another portion of the oil room at that time perhaps 5 gallons of coal oil which he had received at a prior date and which was not included in the Friday delivery of mixed oil. Fred Catlin, the 11 year old son of the deceased, who had obtained the gallon of oil from Riley on Sunday morning, testified that when he called for the oil Riley first went to the 50-gallon tank and said, "I think this is mixed"; that Riley then went to a 5-gallon can and drew therefrom the gallon of oil and handed it to him, saying, "I guess this is coal oil." The lamps used by the Catlins were ordinary glass lamps with no aperture separate from the wick holder through which oil might be introduced into the bowl. To complete the narrative of facts it is necessary to refer to an occurrence which took place on Saturday before any of the oil tested by Riley was resold. When the first oil put out by Riley on Friday and Saturday morning had come back to him with the report that something was wrong with it, he made his tests of the oil in the 5-gallon cans as has been hereinbefore described. He then phoned to the branch office of the Union Oil Company through which he did business, and, after getting the ear of the driver who had delivered to him the oil, told this driver that a mistake had been made, that his oil had been mixed on him.

Riley testified that he told the driver to come and take back the oil Sunday morning. He testified: "They told me they would come on Sunday, but did not come until Monday." The driver of the wagon admitted receiving notification from Riley that the oil was mixed; that at the time of the conversation over the telephone he had stated to Riley that it was impossible that a mistake had been made, but that if such was the case the wagon had been loaded up "wrong" on him. He testified that he believed he said he would take the oil back; further, that he was not convinced that a mistake had been made until he went for the oil on Monday morning. He denied having promised to return on Sunday morning, and said that he could not have done so because Riley did not keep his store open on Sunday. There was testimony from which the jury was authorized to draw the conclusion that, had the oil delivered to Catlin been kerosene and not gasoline, the ignition of the oil and vapor and consequent explosion would not have occurred. In short, there was sufficient proof, in a circumstantial way at least, upon which the jury was authorized to make the deduction which is implied from the verdict, to wit, that the oil delivered to Catlin was much more inflammable and explosive in its character than kerosene, and that it was in fact gasoline.

[1-4] Appellant first urges that there is a defect in the foundation of plaintiff's case which requires that the judgment be reversed. This contention is referred to the evidence which, it is urged, fails to show that the negligence of appellant was the proximate cause which produced the death of plaintiff's intestate. No contention is made but that the mistake of appellant's agents in delivering both gasoline and kerosene in the place of kerosene to Riley, the grocer, was negligence for which the corporation might in some circumstances be held responsible in damages. It is, however, insisted that, whatever negligence was first committed by appellant in delivering mixed oil, this negligence ceased to be of active effect in the line of causation when Riley, the grocer, discovered that he had received gasoline and kerosene mixed. It is argued that, when Riley notified the driver that the oil was mixed and it was understood that the driver would return and take it back, all responsibility of appellant ended; that the subsequent acts of Riley in selling the oil were the acts of an independent, responsible person which interrupted the chain of causation and furnished in law the last efficient cause of the damage. "Proximate cause" has been defined many times in the decisions and by text-writers to be that cause arising out of a breach of duty which in a natural and continuous sequence produces the damage complained of. The original negligent act may be separated from the untoward event by great periods of time and many other connecting acts, negligent or nonnegligent. The latter may be acts of third persons not in any representative sense the agents of the first wrongdoer. There is a qualification, however, to the last-named condition, and that is this: When there is no privity of contract between the first wrongdoer and the person suffering damage and the negligent act falls within the class concerning things which carry no menace or threat of probable damage to third persons, the liability of the first party will extend no further than to his immediate co-contractor. This rule applies generally to cases where breach of contract has been committed in the furnishing of merchandise, or building of tools, machines, et cetera, which in their very nature are not calculated to produce damage when of imperfect construction or composition. The mislabeling of poisons, inflammable oils, explosives, and like dangerous substances is so fraught with possibilities of danger to purchasers as to charge the first vendor with a responsibility for damages, even though the mismarked substance has passed through the hands of a number of intermediate vendors. Elkins, Bly & Co. v. McKean, 79 Pa. 493; Riggs v. Standard Oil Co. (C. C.) 130 Fed. 199; Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co., 104 Mass. 64; Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455. The interrupting event which will disturb the train of causation may be the negligent act of a responsible person.

"If the negligent acts of two or more persons, all being culpable and responsible in law for their acts, do not occur in point of time, and the negligence of one only exposes the injured person to risk of injury in case the other should also be negligent, the liability of the person first in fault will depend upon the question whether the negligent act of the other was one which a man of ordinary experience and sagacity, acquainted with all of the circumstances, could reasonably anticipate or not. If such a person could have anticipated that the intervening act of negligence might, in a natural and ordinary sequence, follow the original act of negligence, the person first in fault is not released from liability by reason of the intervening negligence of another. If it could not have been thus anticipated, then the intervening negligent person alone is responsible." 1 Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (6th Ed.) § 34.

Thus it has been held that where a defendant had negligently constructed a fence and, some panels having fallen out, these panels were picked up by a third party and placed against the fence in an insecure position from which they again fell, injuring a child, the defendant was held to have furnished the proximate cause of the injury, notwithstanding that had the panels been allowed to remain where they had first fallen no injury would likely have resulted; the court saying:

"When there is danger of a particular injury which actually occurs, we must surely say that it is the usual, ordinary, natural, and probable result of the act of exposing the person or thing injured to the danger." Fishburn v. Burlington & N. W. Ry. Co., 127 Iowa, 483, 103 N. W. 481.

The case last cited contains a collection of authorities treating of proximate cause and its relation to other acts intervening before the injury and contributing to the cause. No difficulty is encountered in giving a definition to the phrase "proximate cause." The difficulty in many cases is to determine which among several concurring causes is the active, efficient, and producing agency in working the damage. In following the train of causation to the end of a prolonged chain of acts involving perhaps negligence on the part of third persons, the test as to the original wrongdoer's liability depends upon whether as a reasonable man in all the circumstances of the case he could or should have anticipated that the damage complained of might probably occur. As said by Justice Strong in Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256:

"The primary cause may be the proximate cause of a disaster, though it may operate through successive instruments, as an article at the end of a chain may be moved by a force applied to the other end, that force being the proximate cause of the movement, or as in the oft cited case of the squib thrown in the market place. * * * The question always is: Was there an unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury, a continuous operation? Did the facts constitute a continuous succession of events, so linked together as to make a natural whole, or was there some new and independent cause intervening between the wrong and the injury? * * * The inquiry must therefore always be whether there was any intermediate cause disconnected from the primary fault, and self-operating, which produced the injury."

In some of the cases first cited in this opinion, where oils and medicines had been sold in a manner not indicating their true character or bearing some mistake in label, it seems to be intimated that the original vendor who caused the mistake to be first made will be held liable, unless some of the intermediate sellers have been guilty on their part of negligence in dispensing the oil or drug. Such is the court's intimation in Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co., Elkins, Bly & Co. v. McKean, and Thomas v. Winchester, supra. The facts in this case show that Riley, the grocer, had had long experience in the handling of kerosene and gasoline, and that he was a dealer in such merchandise. Appellant suggests and insists that the legal situation illustrated by the evidence here is no different than had appellant's driver, immediately after delivering the oil to Riley, notified him that a mistake had been made and that gasoline and kerosene had been mixed and that the company would take back the oil. In the latter case it is argued, and the conclusion suggested seems logical, that had Riley determined then to dispose of some of the mixed oil, relying upon his own judgment or knowledge in the matter of determining its true character, the responsibility for any damage which might result would not attach to the appellant corporation, but that, for any mistake made by the groceryman which might result in damage to his patrons, Riley alone could be held accountable. There is no doubt at all but that Riley would have had the right to depend upon the implied representation made by the company that the oil was of the particular kind ordered by him, where he was not put upon notice of the fact that kerosene had been mixed with the more inflammable liquid. On Saturday, after the several lots of oil had been returned to Riley and had been found to contain gasoline and Riley had proceeded to make his own tests, he then had the conversation with the agent of appellant, and the agreement clearly implied from what is admitted to have been then stated was that the company would take the oil back. Riley, as an experienced handler of oils, knew of the highly inflammable quality of gasoline, and it could hardly be said that the appellant, in order to absolve itself from liability, should have specifically advised him not to sell any of the liquid. Riley himself admitted that he would not have been sure in his own mind from the tests made of the two 5-gallon cans which he supposed contained coal oil, of the exact character of that oil providing it had been mixed with gasoline and had not been entirely one or the other. He testified that he made fire tests of the liquid from the two cans which he concluded contained gasoline, but that he contented himself with noticing the odor and the rapidity with which the liquid from the other two cans evaporated.

We cannot on the admitted facts distinguish this case from a case where the oil had been sold as claimed and upon notification from Riley to the company of the state of affairs the company had immediately dispatched their wagon to take the oil back, and that while the wagon was waiting outside for that purpose Riley tested up some of the oil and sold it with the same disastrous consequences which did ensue. It was not incumbent upon appellant to have taken more steps than it did to prevent the independent action of Riley. Its responsible duty to third persons had ended. We have already pointed out that Riley was a dealer in both gasoline and coal oil and he had had many years' experience in handling those commodities. He himself testified that he had received and sold gasoline and kerosene for about ten years. In the view we take of the case, the intervening act of Riley was that of a culpable, responsible person, and that it interrupted the chain of causation and furnished the direct and proximate cause of the damage. In the case where poison was mislabeled as a harmless drug (Thomas v. Winchester, supra), it seems quite clear that, had the retail druggist who received from the defendant and later dispensed the poison had notice of the fact that the drug had been mislabeled and notice of its true character, his act in dispensing it, even though after the making of some tests, would be an act for which the original vendor would not be liable. As the court there said:

"The wrong done by the defendant was in putting the poison, mislabeled, into the hands of Aspinwall, as an article of merchandise, to be sold and afterwards used as the extract of dandelion, by some person then unknown."

[5] But it is said by respondent that, under the facts and circumstances shown in evidence, it became a question solely for the jury to resolve as to whether there had been any negligence on the part of the plaintiff. It is true that questions, involving alleged negligent action which turn upon the proposition as to what should be expected of an ordinarily reasonable man under the circumstances, present mixed questions of law and fact which generally should go to the jury under proper instructions as to the law, leaving the deductions of fact to be made by the verdict. This is always the case where the evidence is conflicting. However, it has been uniformly held that, where the facts are undisputed and clearly settled and the dictates of common prudence point to only one reasonable conclusion, the question is then one of law for the court, and a verdict may be either directed or a nonsuit granted. 1 Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (6th Ed.) § 56. Our Supreme Court has repeatedly applied this rule. Glascok v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 73 Cal. 137, 14 Pac. 518; Baddeley v. Shea, 114 Cal. 1, 45 Pac. 990, 33 L. R. A. 747, 55 Am. St. Rep. 56; and a number of other cases which it is unnecessary to cite. We think in this case that it must be said that there should be no difference of opinion in the mind of any reasonable man, but that the appellant was shown to have exercised reasonable caution, when its driver informed Riley, the dealer, that he would take the oil back upon being informed by Riley that the fluid was mixed. No assurances were made to Riley designed to dissuade him from his conviction that the oil had been mixed, but the transaction or sale to him was agreed in effect to be rescinded. Riley himself had had abundant proof that the fluid delivered was not unmixed kerosene.

[6] It is contended that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in refusing to strike out portions of statements made by the deceased Catlin. As has been narrated, Catlin immediately after the explosion, and while he was upon the grass in front of his house covered with fire, made a statement to the witness Tucker as to how the accident occurred, and then said, "I am sure that it was gasoline." He made another statement to which attention has not heretofore been called, to witness Siemsen, who arrived on the ground a few moments after Tucker came. In that statement, after some words had passed between the two men, the deceased said to Siemsen that "there must have been something in that coal oil." Both of these statements appellant moved the court to strike out on the ground that they were not a part of the res gestæ, that they were self-serving and expressive of the opinion and conclusion of the witness. It may be assumed that the statements made by the deceased were sufficiently contemporaneous with the occurrence as to admit them in proof as part of the res gestæ (Elkins, Bly & Co. v. McKean, supra), but it does seem quite clear that the particular sentences objected to could not have been competent in any case; they were not statements expressive of how the accident occurred, for the witness had already described what had happened, but presented purely the opinion and conclusion of the deceased as to the fluid which he was using being gasoline. The matter of the establishment of the fact as to the character of the fluid involved was one of the crucial issues in the case and one as to which there was a conflict in the evidence. This statement coming from the deceased may have had deciding weight in settling the important question, and that consideration therefore clearly illustrates the prejudice suffered by appellant. For a discussion of what constitutes proper testimony where statements of the actors are claimed to be a part of the res gestæ, we refer to Heckle v. Southern Pacific Co., 123 Cal. 441, 56 Pac. 56; Williams v. Southern Pacific Co., 133 Cal. 550, 65 Pac. 1100.

[7] As to the claim made that Catlin, as a matter of law under the facts shown in evidence, was guilty of contributory negligence, we think that contention should not be sustained. While it may appear to the ordinary mind as a heedless act for a man to fill a lamp with an open flame on his cap, at the same time it must be borne in mind that there was evidence given by a witness who was shown to have some expert knowledge on the subject that such a thing might be done with reasonable safety and without great danger of the oil or vapor being ignited, if the fluid used was coal oil of ordinary lamp quality. Under this state of the evidence, it was for the jury to settle the question as to whether the deceased acted with reasonable caution in the circumstances. The case of Riggs v. Standard Oil Co. (C. C.) 130 Fed. 199, cited by appellant, presented different facts. In the decision the district judge held that the pouring of oil by the person injured into a fire box of a stove in which were live coals was contributory negligence which would prevent a recovery, even though the oil furnished was not of the high flash test required. The injured person in that case actually brought the oil in contact with fire. Hence it was clear that, of whatever higher test the oil might have been, nothing could have prevented its ignition; the conclusion of negligence was irresistible. It is contended that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions offered on the part of appellant. It was error not to instruct the jury in accordance with the conclusions expressed in the foregoing as to the conditions under which the first negligence of the appellant ceased to be of contributing influence in the chain of causation. Appellant was entitled to an instruction, as we view the case, that as a matter of law, under the facts shown, responsibility, if any, was that of Riley, the immediate vendor of Catlin.

[8] In other respects the charge as given by the trial judge appears to have contained in the main a correct exposition of the law. Those instructions furnishing more explicit advice on the subject of contributory negligence might well have been given, but we think it was not error to have refused them.

[9] As to the alleged excessive amount of the verdict, we would not feel justified in reversing the cause for that reason. Morgan v. Southern Pacific Co., 95 Cal. 508, 30 Pac. 601; McGrory v. Pacific Electric Co., 22 Cal. App. 671, 136 Pac. 303.

The judgment and order are reversed.

COVEY v. NATIONAL UNION FIRE INS.
CO. OF PITTSBURGH. (Civ. 1490.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Sept. 30, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 27, 1916.)

1. INSURANCE — 323(3)—FIRE INSURANCE—
VACANCY OF PREMISES—HOW DETERMINED.

In determining whether premises become vacant so as to avoid the policy of insurance, consideration is given to their character and use to which they are being put.

2. INSURANCE — 323(3)—FIRE INSURANCE—
VACANCY OF PREMISES—HOW DETERMINED.

In cases of tenancy, it is reasonable to assume that the assured and insurer contemplated that some space of time might necessarily elapse after the tenant's family had moved from the premises before the tenant could remove all his household goods or possession could be given to the landlord or to another tenant.

3. INSURANCE — 323(3)—FIRE INSURANCE—
VACANCY OF PREMISES—HOW DETERMINED—
"UNOCCUPIED"—"VACANT."

Since the circumstances existing at the time must necessarily be factors in determining whether the insured building is "unoccupied" or "vacant," such terms may be treated as synonymous.

4. INSURANCE ⚡323(3)—FIRE INSURANCE—VACANCY OF PREMISES—EVIDENCE.

While no fixed and unbending rule exists as to whether an insured building is vacant so as to avoid the policy, yet where a tenant had removed all but a few of his articles, which he intended to return and get, and still held the key, such facts were not conclusive against his occupancy.

5. INSURANCE ⚡555—LOSS—PROOF—NOTICE OF DISAGREEMENT—TIME FOR MAILING.

Under a fire policy requiring the insurer to give notice to the insured within 20 days after filing proof of loss of its disagreement as to the amount claimed, the mailing of such notice on the twentieth day is too late, but it must have been received by the insured within 20 days.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1367-1373, 1382-1390; Dec. Dig. ⚡555.]

6. INSURANCE ⚡568—FIRE INSURANCE—NOTICE OF DISAGREEMENT—TIME FOR MAILING—DEMAND FOR APPRAISEMENT.

Under a fire policy requiring demand for appraisal to be made by the insurer within 90 days after submission of proof of loss, a notice mailed within 90 days but received by the insured on the ninety-first day is too late.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1424; Dec. Dig. ⚡568.]

7. INSURANCE ⚡576(3)—FIRE INSURANCE—APPRAISEMENT OF LOSS—TIME OF DEMAND.

Where an insurer failed to give timely notice demanding appraisal and the insured then sued on the policy, the existence of which insurer recognized by again demanding appraisal, the insured was not estopped from claiming that the demand was not made in time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; James G. Estep, Judge.

Action by David E. Covey against the National Union Fire Insurance Company of Pittsburgh. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals by the alternative method. Affirmed.

Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, for appellant. Braynard & Kimball, of Redding, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiff had judgment for $800 as damages for loss by fire against which defendant had issued its policy of insurance. Defendant appeals from the judgment under the alternative method.

The following were stipulated as facts in the case: The policy took effect July 13, 1913, and was for one year. The insured building was destroyed by fire October 1, 1913, about the hour of 2 a. m. Notice of the fire was received by defendant October 21, 1913, and on November 19, 1913, proof of loss was filed with defendant. By letter dated December 8, 1913, defendant wrote plaintiff notifying him of its "total disagreement of the amount claimed" by plaintiff and that defendant

"admits a loss of $290.91 on the property described in above-mentioned policy." This letter was mailed at San Francisco on December 9, 1913, and was received by plaintiff on December 12, 1913. On December 31, 1913, plaintiff brought an action on said policy for $800, in all respects the same as the present action. The first action was dismissed April 4, 1914, and the present action was commenced on April 8, 1914. On February 16, 1914, defendant mailed to plaintiff "a demand for arbitration" by letter dated at San Francisco, on that day and directed to plaintiff at "Millville, Shasta county, California," notifying him that defendant "failed to agree as to the amount of loss caused by fire of October 1, 1913, to the building described in * * * Policy No. 5116 * * * as admitted in our notice to you dated December 8, 1913," and stated that "this company demands an appraisal of the loss * * * and names L. N. Bursen a competent and disinterested appraiser," and calls upon plaintiff to appoint an appraiser and so notify defendant:

"This notice was received at Millville by Mr. Covey February 20, 1914. No appraiser was ever appointed by Mr. Covey, and no notice was ever taken of this demand."

The policy in question was what is known as the standard California form. Certain of its provisions are more or less applicable to the case in hand and will be given in the order found in the policy, omitting intermediate provisions, as follows:

"$800. On the two-story frame building and its adjoining and connecting additions * * * and all permanent fixtures therein and attached thereto, property of assured, while occupied only as a private dwelling, situate (as per diagram) on the north side of Main street in Whitmore, Shasta county, California. * * *

"This policy is made and accented subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions and those hereinafter stated, which are hereby specifically referred to, and made part of this policy, together with such provisions, agreements or conditions as may be indorsed thereon or added thereto, etc. * * *

"Unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, this company shall not be liable for loss or damage occurring * * * (f) while a building herein described whether intended for occupation by owner or tenant, is vacant or unoccupied beyond the period of ten consecutive days.

"This company shall be deemed to have assented to the amount of the loss claimed by the insured in his preliminary proof of loss, unless within twenty days after the receipt thereof * * * the company shall notify the insured in writing of its partial or total disagreement with the amount of loss claimed by him and shall notify him in writing of the amount of the loss, if any, the company admits on each of the different articles or properties set forth in the preliminary proof or amendments thereto.

"If the insured and this company fail to agree, in whole or in part, as to the amount of loss within ten days after such notification, this company shall forthwith demand in writing an appraisal of the loss or part of loss as to which there is a disagreement and shall name a competent and disinterested appraiser, and the insured within five days after the receipt of such demand and name, shall appoint a disinterested appraiser and notify the company thereof in writing, and the two so chosen shall, before commencing the appraisal, select a competent and disinterested umpire. * * *

"A loss hereunder shall be payable in thirty days after the amount thereof has been ascertained either by agreement or by appraisal, but if such ascertainment is not had or made within sixty days after the receipt by the company of the preliminary proof of loss, then the loss shall be payable in ninety days after such receipt."

1. It is contended by appellant that the findings, to the effect that the insured building was totally destroyed by fire "while occupied as a private dwelling," is not supported by the evidence. The premises were under lease by plaintiff to one Moses C. Tribble, who testified that he had been living in the house with his family for "something over a year" as a "dwelling house"; that on September 28, 1913, he commenced to move his family and household effects; that he did not "move all his household effects or personal property from the house before it was destroyed by fire"; that he did not sleep in the house after the night of September 27th. He was asked what remained at the place after he removed his wife and was there on the night of the 30th of September.

"A. I know there was stuff there left in my care. The stuff didn't belong to me, left in my care. Had some household things, junk there that would naturally accumulate with farming, and so it was there, and what there was I could not say. I would not confine myself down. Q. Was there any furniture there? A. No, sir. * * * Q. And then all there was left there was some chickens running around the yard and this accumulation of things? A. Yes, sir."

He testified that he was at the premises about 4 o'clock in the evening of September 30th.

"I had some chickens there, and I was trying to catch these chickens and get them and take them and move them up to the place where I was moving to. Q. Did you at any time notify Mr. Covey that you were about to move from the premises? A. Well, I think, yes. I think I told Mr. Covey that I intended to move, but as to the exact day that I told Mr. Covey, I could not say. Q. As to the time when you would move? A. Yes, because it was on account of the health of my wife. She was down with rheumatism, and I didn't know really when I could move. Q. Yes. Who had the key to the dwelling at the time of the fire? A. The key was in my possession."

Plaintiff testified that he was at the premises on September 30th the day before the fire.

"Q. Was there anybody upon the premises at that time? A. Yes, sir, Mr. Tribble was there. * * * Q. Was he a tenant of the property? A. Yes, sir. Q. Your tenant? A. Yes, sir. Q. And what were the conditions there with reference to whether or not the property was occupied at the time that you were there? A. It was occupied, yes; the man had his stuff there, was hauling some of his stuff off, and catching his chickens and one thing and another. His poultry was there. * * * Q. Do you know whether any of his household goods were still upon the property? A. Yes, we went through the house and seen some boxes and household things there. Don't know what he had boxed up, something another. * * * Q. Had Mr. Tribble at that time turned over the key to the premises? A. No, sir."

On cross-examination he testified that Tribble told him he was moving off.

"Q. But Mr. Tribble told you, did he not, that he was going to move out that day? A. No, sir; didn't say he was going to move that day. Q. Never said so? A. He said he was moving out. Q. As a matter of fact, he did move out that day? A. I don't know. No, sir; I don't think so."

He testified that Tribble had been in possession of the premises for "something over a year"; that he was paying $75 per year and had paid his rent in full; that he learned that Tribble was going to move away "somewhere near the 30th, about that day I think is the first I can remember." It was admitted that the "building was totally destroyed."

We think the situation at the time the fire occurred, to wit, 2 a. m., October 1st, briefly stated was as follows: Plaintiff's tenant was not in actual physical possession of the premises, but had the right of possession and was still in the act of moving his effects therefrom; that he was the recognized tenant and retained possession of the keys to the building and that he had not surrendered possession to his landlord; that his intention was to reside elsewhere and to that end had removed his family and most of his household goods, but his intention was to return to get what remained of his personal property.

[1] The court found:

"It is not true that at the time of the destruction by fire of said premises, to wit, on the 1st day of October, 1913, said premises described therein and so insured by said policy of fire insurance, were not occupied only as a private dwelling and it is not true that said premises" at said time were, "wholly or at all vacant and unoccupied, or vacant or unoccupied."

The contention of appellant is that this finding is unsupported by the evidence. The cases are numerous in which the terms "occupied," "vacant," "occupied and vacant," "occupied or vacant," are defined and are by no means harmonious. All agree that existing conditions when the policy is issued have much to do with arriving at the intention of the parties. A different construction is given to these terms in case of loss by fire where the premises were by the insurer known to have been occupied by a tenant when insured, as was the case here, from that given where the insured was the owner and the occupant. Also, consideration is given to the character of the premises and the use to which they are being put. In the case of Omaha Fire Ins. Co. v. Sinnott, 54 Neb. 522, 74 N. W. 955, the policy provided that the insured house was and should continue to be occupied, and it was claimed that this warranty was broken by reason of the house becoming unoccupied and continuing to be vacant before the fire. Said the court:

"The evidence most favorable to this contention was, in effect, that while the policy was in force, to wit, about July 11, 1894, the owner of the insured property notified her tenant to vacate it; that immediately thereafter the tenant began to remove his furniture to another house, to which he went with his family. When the fire took place, however, he had not yet removed his cook stove and some other personal property. Under these conditions, we cannot say that the jury improperly concluded, from a consideration of the evidence, that the house was not unoccupied at the time of the fire."

[2] In cases of tenancy, it is reasonable to assume that the parties contemplated that some space of time might necessarily elapse after the tenant's family had moved from the premises before the tenant could remove all his household goods or possession could be given to the landlord or to another tenant. In the case of Norman v. Insurance Co., 74 Mo. App. 456, a distinction is drawn between the terms "vacant" and "unoccupied." In that case the tenant had, on the evening of October 5th, taken his family to a neighborhood house and had removed a part of his furniture, leaving a part in the building, but retaining the keys and possession until he should have time the next day to remove the remainder of his household effects. During the night of the 5th and 6th at about 1 o'clock in the morning, the building and contents were destroyed by fire. The court held the company liable notwithstanding the provision of the policy that "as soon as buildings become vacant the insurance shall be void," and that the building was not vacant.

Weidert v. State Insurance Co., 19 Or. 261, 24 Pac. 242, 20 Am. St. Rep. 809, was a case where one McNett, a tenant, moved into the premises in April and lived there until June 15th or 20th, when he moved away, but a hired man or some member of the family "was there at the house every day to see if things were all right; * * * that they * * * went down there to see that nothing was destroyed." The fire occurred on the night of July 9th. The court held that, conceding to the fullest extent all the facts that this evidence tends to prove, no occupancy of the premises was shown after McNett moved out. The provision of the policy involved was as follows: " * * * Or if any change shall take place in the title, possession, or occupancy" without immediate notice to the company and its consent obtained, "this policy shall * * * be null and void." Several cases are cited in the opinion supporting the view there taken, but, as in the principal case, the occupant seems to have moved away from the premises and was using the former dwelling as a sort of place of storage for some portion of his household effects.

In Norman v. Insurance Co., supra, the court said:

"Removal was in fieri, not complete. If the tenant had, on the evening of October 5th, taken his family to a neighbor's house, leaving his household goods packed and ready for moving the next day, could it with any show of reason be said that the building was vacant? Surely not. Neither could it be said to be vacant if the tenant had taken away a portion and left a portion for removal the following day. The house would not in either event be vacant, though unoccupied."

The court seems to have held to the strict meaning of "vacant," a distinction which we do not think is unbending or may be arbitrarily applied.

[3] The circumstances existing at the time must necessarily be factors in determining whether or not the building is unoccupied or vacant. These terms may therefore be treated as synonymous in their meaning. This was shown in Herrman v. Adriatic Ins. Co., 85 N. Y. 162, 39 Am. Rep. 644, a case in which it was held as a general proposition that:

"For a dwelling house to be in a state of occupation, there must be in it the presence of human beings as at their customary place of abode, not absolutely and uninterruptedly continuous, but that must be the place of usual return and habitual stoppage."

Cummins v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 5 Hun (N. Y.) 554, was a case where the policy provided that, if the dwelling house became vacated by the removal of the owner or occupant, the "policy shall be null and void, until the written consent of the company at the home office is obtained." It was held that the provision "vacated by the removal of the owner or occupant," means an abandonment of the house as an actual place of residence, permanently or temporarily. A mere temporary absence of the family from the house for a night or a day would not be such a removal."

In Bennett v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 50 Conn. 426, the insured building was occupied by a tenant, and the policy provided that, if the dwelling should "cease to be occupied as such, * * * the policy shall cease and be of no effect." The proof showed that the house was occupied about a month and a half in the spring of 1880, that it was thereafter again occupied, and that the tenant moved out about 6 o'clock in the evening on the day preceding the fire, and the house remained unoccupied until it was destroyed by fire about 2 o'clock the next morning. "This," said the court, "was clearly a violation of this condition of the policy." That case is easily distinguishable from the present case. There was a complete abandonment of the dwelling, the tenant leaving nothing in the house and having surrendered possession completely and having no occasion to return for any purpose. It was not a temporary absence, but an actual giving up of the premises. The length of time the building was unoccupied was therefore an immaterial factor.

A tenant moved out of an insured dwelling on Tuesday, and on Wednesday morning the owner took possession, and, with his servants, began cleaning it and moving in goods, and were continuously so engaged during the working hours of each day until Friday evening; intending that the family should be fully domiciled there Saturday, but meanwhile lodging and taking their meals elsewhere. On Friday night the house was burned; and it was held that the policy had not become void on the ground of vacancy or nonoccupancy. Eddy v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 70 Iowa, 472, 30 N. W. 808, 59 Am. Rep. 444. "There is no case to which our attention has been called," said the court, "which holds that a house is vacant or unoccupied by the mere fact of the physical absence of the occupants for a day or night." The case of Shackleton v. Sun Fire Office, 55 Mich. 288, 21 N. W. 343, 54 Am. Rep. 379, is cited in the opinion. In that case the tenant vacated the house June 19th, and the owner took possession, put her furniture in the building, but, for what seemed to be good reasons, she did not take her meals nor lodge in the house and it was destroyed by fire on July 4th. It was held that the house was not vacant or unoccupied, within the meaning of the contract. Said the court:

"Nothing, apparently, was wanting to complete personal possession, except that she lodged and took her meals at her father's, a few rods off. Those facts were not conclusive against her occupancy."

[4] We can see no reason why the rule should be different where a tenant is moving into a house than where he is moving out. In both cases he is in possession of the house and has some or all of his goods there, but for sufficient reasons he finds it necessary temporarily to lodge elsewhere while moving in or moving out, as the case may be. No fixed and unbending rule seems to be deducible from the adjudicated cases. The courts take into consideration all the circumstances and attribute such intention to the parties in entering into the contract as would appear consonant with reason. As was said in the Michigan case last above referred to, the facts in this case "are not conclusive against the tenant's occupancy."

[5] 2. The court found that defendant did not serve its notice of disagreement or demand for appraisal within the time required by the policy and that plaintiff complied with and performed all of its terms on his part. This finding is challenged. The policy provided that the company "shall be deemed to have waived assent to the amount of the loss claimed by the insured in his preliminary proof of loss, unless within twenty days after the receipt thereof * * * the company shall notify the insured in writing," etc. (see provision supra). Defendant at San Francisco mailed a letter to plaintiff residing at Whitmore, Shasta county, on the twentieth day after the receipt of proof of loss, which letter was received by plaintiff two days later. Defendant contends that:

"The mailing of the notice of disagreement within the 20 days is sufficient under the terms of the policy even though it is not received until after the expiration of the twenty days."

Respondent contends that where, as here, the loss was total and so conceded, there was no occasion for arbitration and appellant was not prejudiced by the ruling of the court. However this may be, we think defendant failed to give the notice contemplated by the policy. In Winchester v. North British, etc., Co., 160 Cal. 1, 116 Pac. 63, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 404, the defendant made demand for the appointment of appraisers, but the notice did not reach plaintiff's attorney in fact until after the expiration of sixty days. It was held that "the failure to serve such notice upon the insured within 60 days after service of proof of loss amounted to a waiver." The policy read: "The sum for which the company is liable pursuant to the policy shall be payable sixty days after due notice," etc. The question there was as to the time when the action could be brought. The language of the present policy is "unless within twenty days after the receipt" of proofs of loss, the company "shall notify the insured," etc.

It appears from the transcript in the Winchester Case that due proof of loss was made on May 14, 1908, and on July 8th, within 60 days after proof of loss, defendant duly posted a letter addressed to plaintiff's attorney in fact, giving notice of its disagreement, etc. The court found that said demand "was received by plaintiff's attorney in fact on the 18th day of July, 1908, and more than 60 days after the service of said proof of loss." In the present case the notice was received two days too late; in the Winchester Case four days too late. We think the Winchester Case decisive of the point.

[6, 7] 3. Defendant was equally in default in sending its demand for an appraisal. Proof of loss was filed with defendant on November 19, 1913. On February 16, 1914, defendant mailed a letter at San Francisco, directed to plaintiff at Millville, Shasta county, notifying plaintiff that it demanded an appraisal of the loss. This notice was received by plaintiff on February 20, 1914, which the court found "was more than ninety days after the said preliminary proof of loss was received by said defendant." The policy provided:

"If for any reason not attributable to the insured or to the appraiser appointed by him, an appraisal is not had and completed within ninety days after said preliminary proof of loss is received by this company, the insured is not to be prejudiced by the failure to make an appraisal and may prove the amount of his loss in an action brought without such appraisal."

Not having received notice in time, plaintiff was not compelled to submit to an appraisal of the loss, and the case stands as though no appraisal was had. Defendant recognized the policy as still in force after the action was first commenced by demanding an appraisal, and we do not think plaintiff is now estopped from claiming that the demand for arbitration was not made in time.

Defendant admitted a liability of $290.91 in its letter of December 8, 1913, and also in its answer. The principal question of fact was as to the actual loss, defendant claiming that it did not exceed the above amount. Other questions are matters largely of technical law. The loss was total and there was evidence sufficient to support the finding that:

"The actual cash of plaintiff's interest in said dwelling house was at the time of said loss on the 1st day of October, 1913, more than the said sum of $800."

The judgment is affirmed.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — 285 — DUE PROCESS OF LAW—CURATIVE ACTS.

In a proceeding to subject property to the burden of a tax or assessment, no curative act can deprive a property owner of the right to resist a pretended sale, where the assessment, if enforced, would deprive him of his property without due process of law, or otherwise infringe his constitutional rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 897-903; Dec. Dig. — 285.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—CURATIVE ACTS—"JURISDICTIONAL."

Bridgford Act (St. 1897, p. 276) § 68, authorizes the board of directors of an irrigation district to bring an action in the superior court to determine the validity of any bonds issued, or assessments levied, while section 69 provides that if no such proceedings shall have been brought, then at any time within 30 days after the levy of any assessment or issue of any bonds, any district assessment payer may sue to determine the validity of any such assessment, while section 72 declares that no contest of anything or matter shall be made other than within the time and manner specified. Held, that the statutes prescribe a particular method of contesting irrigation assessments, and while a wholly defective assessment cannot be cured, a property owner cannot, unless he sues within the 30-day period, attack an assessment for mere noncompliance with those provisions which the Legislature need not have required in the first place, this being true as to jurisdictional steps relating to procedure which need not have been required, the term "jurisdictional" not only referring to the power to levy the assessments, but to the procedure.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Jurisdiction.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 227—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—CURATIVE ACTS.

The failure of the board of directors of an irrigation district to enter in full in the minutes a call for a special meeting in accordance with Bridgford Act, § 14, is a mere irregularity, and failure of property owners to sue on such ground within the 30 days prescribed by section 69 operates as a waiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 318; Dec. Dig. — 227.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 227—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—SPECIAL MEETINGS.

Under Bridgford Act, § 14, declaring that special meetings must be ordered by a majority of the board, and that the order must be entered of record, and 5 days' notice given to each member not joining in the order, it is sufficient, all members joining, to record in the minutes of the board an order for a special meeting for the purpose of setting the rate of taxes for the yearly assessment of an irrigation district; it being unnecessary that the record set forth the matter with particularity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 318; Dec. Dig. — 227.]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 227—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—SPECIAL MEETINGS.

As the section does not prescribe when the order shall be entered, it is sufficient that the entry be made in the minutes of the meeting held pursuant thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 318; Dec. Dig. — 227.]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS—IRREGULARITY.

Under Bridgford Act, § 59, as amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1111), providing for special elections for submission to voters in irrigation districts of special assessments, and that an assessment of not to exceed 2 per cent. of the value of the assessable property may be levied in any one year by resolution of at least four-fifths of the members of the board of directors, the amount not to exceed $75,000, the board of directors of an irrigation district has jurisdiction to levy a special assessment, and though the mode of levy was irregular, such irregularities are waived under section 69, where property owners did not sue within the 30 days allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. — 231.]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS—OFFER TO DO EQUITY.

Where assessments levied by an irrigation district were valid, property owners, objecting to the mode of enforcement, who did not offer to pay the amounts legally due, have no standing in a court of equity; for a person must do equity to be entitled to equitable assistance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. — 231.]

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS.

Where under Bridgford Act, § 69, irregularities in an assessment by the board of directors of an irrigation district were waived, evidence of such irregularities was properly excluded in a suit to enjoin the assessment as invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. — 231.]

9. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 231—REVIEW—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURT BELOW.

In a suit to enjoin an assessment by an irrigation district, where it was contended that the lands of plaintiffs were not described upon the assessment book as required, but the record did not show the book was offered in evidence, or that plaintiffs' questions relative to such book indicated they were seeking to show the insufficiency of the descriptions, the exclusion of questions as to the book cannot be complained of on appeal; the matter not having been raised and disposed of below.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; F. J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the Imperial Land Company, a corporation, and others against the Imperial Irrigation District and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Valentine & Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellants; Haines & Haines, of San Diego, and R. D. McPherrin, of Imperial, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiffs, owners of land within the boundaries of Imperial irrigation district, brought this action against the district and its officers to obtain an injunction restraining the sale of the property of plaintiffs for nonpayment of an assessment attempted to be levied by the district for the year 1912, and for a decree annulling said assessment. Judgment went for the defendants, and plaintiffs appeal from such judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Imperial irrigation district was organized in December, 1911, under the act approved March 31, 1897 (commonly known as the Bridgford Act), and amendments thereto. Stats. 1897, p. 254. The assessment herein attacked was levied on August 2, 1912, and was an assessment of seven mills ($.007) upon each dollar of assessed value of real property within the district. The present action was commenced on August 16, 1913, something more than a year after the levy of the assessment.

[1, 2] The plaintiffs and appellants rely upon various asserted defects in the proceedings both before and after the levy of the assessment. With respect to everything taking place up to the date of the assessment (August 2, 1912), the defendants set up in their answer the limitations contained in sections 68, 69, 70, 71, and 72 of the statute. Section 68 authorizes the board of directors of the district to bring an action in the superior court to determine the validity of any bonds issued or assessments levied. Section 69 provides that if no such proceeding shall have been brought, then "at any time within thirty days after the levy of any assessment or issue of any bonds under the provisions of this act, any district assessment payer may bring an action in the superior court of the county where the office of the board of directors is located, to determine the validity of any such assessment or such bonds." Section 70 provides for the consolidation of contests; section 71, for the manner of disposing of such contests. Section 72 declares that:

"No contest of anything or matter herein provided shall be made other than within the time and manner herein specified. * * *

The court below, after finding that this action was commenced more than 30 days after the date of the levy of the assessment, drew as one of its conclusions of law:

"That said suit is barred as to all attack upon said assessment by the provisions of sections 69, 70, 71, and 72 of the Irrigation District Act."

Sections 69 and 72 create a particular action as the sole mode by which a landowner may attack the validity of an assessment, and enact a period of limitation for such action. These provisions are not analogous to those of the street law giving an appeal to the city council. Stats. 1885, p. 147. The decision of the council is made conclusive only upon "errors, informalities, and irregularities which said city council might have remedied and avoided." Where the contract is void in its inception, the owner is not therefore required to appeal to the council. Manning v. Den, 90 Cal. 610, 27 Pac. 435; McBean v. Redick, 96 Cal. 191, 31 Pac. 7; Chase v. Treas., 122 Cal. 540, 55 Pac. 414. But the proceeding authorized by the Bridgford Act is brought in a court of general jurisdiction, which has full power to pass upon any question touching the substantial rights of the parties, and the grounds of attack which may be made upon the levy in such proceeding are in no way limited. It may be that the provisions under discussion would not bar an action directed against the pretended levy of an assessment by a body which had no legal existence or had no power, by any kind of proceeding, to levy the assessment. But we think they must certainly be operative to foreclose an attack based upon mere irregularities, or upon the failure to comply with statutory requirements which the Legislature might in the first instance, have failed to enact. In this respect, the effect of the statute is at least as strong as is the provision of the Street Bond Act (Stats. 1893, p. 33), declaring that the bonds issued under the act shall be conclusive evidence of all proceedings previous to the making of the certified list of all assessments unpaid. This provision received careful consideration at the hands of this court in Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81. See, also, Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 568, 89 Pac. 352; Board of Ed. v. Hyatt, 152 Cal. 519, 93 Pac. 117; Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 292, 116 Pac. 750; Schaffer v. Smith, 169 Cal. 771, 147 Pac. 976. The conclusion reached was, as above indicated, that a curative act, or a clause making bonds conclusive evidence of the regularity of prior proceedings, was operative so far as to cure a failure to comply with any step which the Legislature might originally have omitted from the requirements of the statute. In any proceeding designed to subject the property of an individual to the burden of tax or assessment, certain elements are essential to constitute compliance with the mandates of the state or federal Constitutions. It is agreed on all hands that no curative act can deprive a property owner of the right to resist a pretended assessment which, if enforced, would deprive him of his property without due process of law or otherwise infringe his constitutional rights. But short of this, there is no more reason for denying to the statute before us than to that involved in Chase v. Trout, supra, the effect of foreclosing any attack based upon the failure to pursue regularly or at all those steps which the Legislature was not bound to make a part of the statutory procedure. As is pointed out in Chase v. Trout, supra, the applicability of curative statutes is not to be determined solely by inquiring whether the steps omitted or defectively performed were "jurisdictional." The term "jurisdictional" has been used in various senses. The power to levy an assessment or impose a liability on private property is derived solely from the statute, and must be exercised in the manner laid down in the statute. In this sense, the jurisdiction of the board extends only to its right to act in the manner prescribed by the Legislature. But with respect to any steps which are not constitutionally necessary, the Legislature may, in the very act which requires these "jurisdictional" steps to be taken, declare that unless objection is made at a certain time or in a certain way, a failure to take these steps shall not affect the validity of the proceeding. This is the plain meaning of the holding in Chase v. Trout, supra, and we do not doubt that it is equally applicable here.

The objections urged by the appellant to the assessment all fall within the character of irregularities not affecting the constitutional rights of the assessment payer, and therefore not beyond the remedial power of a curative clause or a statutory limitation like that contained in the Bridgford Act.

[3-5] 1. The assessment was levied at a special meeting. Section 14 of the act provides that special meetings—
"must be ordered by a majority of the board. The order must be entered of record, and five days notice thereof must, by the secretary, be given to each member not joining in the order."

It also provides that the order must specify the business to be transacted. The complaint alleges that the call or order for said meeting was not entered upon the minutes of the board, and the purpose of the said call was not specified therein. The answer, while not as specific and direct as it might have been, did, we think, contain a sufficient traverse of the material portions of these allegations. It appeared that the minutes of the special meeting of August 2, 1912, stated that said meeting was called by order of all the board to set the rate of taxes for the assessment of 1912-1913. We think this was a sufficient compliance with the requirement that "the order must be entered of record." The record, i. e., the minutes of the board, contain an entry of the fact that all the members of the board had ordered a special meeting at a given time for the purpose of setting "the rate of taxes for the assessment of 1912-1913." It is true that the order made by the directors was not entered in hæc verba in the record, but the substance thereof was so recorded and this, we think, was sufficient. There is no claim that the directors did not, in fact, unite in making an order for a special meeting for the purposes named. This was sufficient to vest in the board the power to levy an assessment authorized by the statute. The failure to enter the call in full in the minutes is at most a mere irregularity, which would be cured by the failure of an assessment payer to bring his action within 30 days. We find nothing in the statute which requires that the order for meeting shall be entered of record "five days before the meeting." All that is required is that the order shall be entered, and that 5 days' notice shall be given to members not joining in the order. No notice was required here, since all the members joined in the order. The statute does not prescribe the time when the order must be entered, and it would seem that the appropriate place for such entry would be in the minutes of the meeting held pursuant to the order.

[6] 2. It is claimed that the board had no authority to levy an assessment except by resolution specifying the amount of money proposed to be raised and the purpose for which it is intended to be used. Section 39 of the act provides for the levy of an assessment sufficient to raise interest on outstanding bonds, sums due or to become due on account of rentals or charges for lands or water rights acquired by the district or to pay contracts or obligations which have been reduced to judgment. The complaint alleges, and it is not denied, that the district had not, on August 2, 1912, any obligations falling within these classes. The assessment was not therefore authorized by section 39. But section 59 authorizes the board to call a special election for submission of the question whether or not a special assessment shall be levied "for the purpose of raising money to be applied to any of the purposes provided in this act." Among such purposes are the necessary expenses of conducting the district, including the payment of salaries of officers and employés. Section 59, as originally enacted, made an election a prerequisite to the levy of any assessment thereunder. In 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1111) the section was amended by the adoption of the following proviso:

"Provided, however, that an assessment of not to exceed two per centum of the value of the assessable property within the district may be levied in any one year without such vote by the adoption of a resolution by at least four-fifths of the members of the board of directors, such amount not, however, to exceed the sum of seventy-five thousand ($75,000) dollars."

It is under this proviso that the district asserts the right to levy the assessment in question. The language quoted clearly authorizes the levy of an assessment for the general purposes of the district. It is argued by the appellant that section 59, read in conjunction with other provisions of the act, provides that any resolution, levying such assessment, must be preceded by an estimate and determination of the amount of money necessary to be raised, and must specify the amount of money proposed to be raised and the purpose for which it is intended to be used. We need not determine whether the act should be construed in the manner thus claimed. Certainly these requirements, if they be requirements of the act, are matters which might have been omitted by the Legislature without infringing constitutional rights. The failure to observe them, therefore, constitutes an irregularity which, under the views hereinabove expressed, cannot be availed of by an assessment payer who has failed to bring his action within the period of 30 days limited by section 69 of the act.

The same answer applies to the suggestion of appellants that the assessment was levied (according to the recital of the minutes) by a mere motion rather than by a resolution. Assuming that there is any substantial difference between a motion and a resolution, this point is no longer available to the appellants.

Without specifying other objections to the levy of the assessment, it may be said that they are all of such character as to be cured by the sections fixing a specific procedure and a period of limitation for attacks upon assessments.

[7] Other objections based on proceedings had after the levy of the assessment are also urged by the appellants. The complaint contained no offer to pay the amount justly due. "It is now firmly settled by our decisions that where a property owner applies for equitable relief against the public authorities, as, for example, to restrain proceedings for the collection or enforcement of taxes assessed against it, or to enjoin the execution of a tax deed, or to cancel a lien or charge for taxes, of record against his land, and it appears that all or some part of the tax charged is justly and equitably due from the plaintiff, or chargeable upon the land, he must, as a condition of obtaining such relief, first pay or offer to pay the amount justly due, or he must be required to do so before the relief to which he shows himself entitled is given." Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 370, 123 Pac. 258, 259 (L. R. A. 1915C, 492); Couts v. Cornell, 147 Cal. 560, 82 Pac. 194, 109 Am. St. Rep. 168; Trippet v. State, 149 Cal. 530, 86 Pac. 1084, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1210; San Diego, etc., Co. v. Cornell, 150 Cal. 637, 89 Pac. 603; Johnson v. Canty, 162 Cal. 391, 123 Pac. 263. The principle has been applied to an action to enjoin a sale of land for delinquent assessments of an irrigation district organized under the Wright Act, in force prior to the enactment of the statute here involved. Quint v. Hoffman, 103 Cal. 507, 37 Pac. 514, 777. There being, as we have seen, a valid assessment upon the lands of appellants, the rule is properly applied to prevent any attack upon subsequent proceedings looking to the collection of the assessment.

[8, 9] The appellants complain of various rulings of the court sustaining objections to offers of evidence. With one possible exception, all of the evidence thus rejected related to irregularities in proceedings leading up to the levy of the assessment. Under the views already expressed regarding the effect of a failure by the assessment payer to bring his action within the time limited by section 69, the rulings were proper. The single point which may be excluded from this general statement is the assignment that the court erred in excluding evidence offered to show that the lands of the plaintiff were not described upon the assessment book as required by section 35 of the act. The complaint alleged and the answer denied that there had been no such description. But the record does not show that the assessment book was offered in evidence, or that the appellant's counsel in asking questions relative to such book gave any intimation that he was seeking to show the insufficiency of the descriptions. The point now urged was not brought to the attention of the court below, and there was no ruling of which the appellant may complain here.

It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to consider in detail the other points urged by the appellant. All of them are disposed of by what has been said.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENT BOOKS.

Where the various pages of the assessment book of a drainage district contained columns for the entry of different matters required, and the columns designed to show the values of property assessed were in each case headed by a dollar mark, and in each column were inserted figures showing the value of the property, there was a sufficient compliance with Bridgford Act (St. 1897, p. 266) § 35, requiring the book to show the cash value of property assessed; it being immaterial that dollar marks preceded other columns which contained entries not relating to values.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. ⇨231.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENT BOOKS.

Under Bridgford Act, § 38, providing that within 10 days after the close of a meeting of the board of directors for equalization of irrigation assessments, the secretary shall have the total values as finally equalized by the board extended in columns and added, it is unnecessary that the assessment books show that the extension and addition were made within the required time, and when such fact is shown by parol evidence, the assessment is good.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. ⇨231.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS.

Where a resolution of the board of directors of a drainage district recited that it was necessary for the lawful purposes of the district that the sum of $28,935 be raised by special assessment for the general fund, property owners could not complain that the board did not estimate or determine that the amount specified was the sum required to be raised by special assessment.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ☞ 1061(2)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where plaintiffs, suing to enjoin enforcement of an assessment by an irrigation district, were not entitled to relief, they were not prejudiced by a judgment of dismissal, instead of one on the merits.

5. PLEADING ☞ 279(4) — SUPPLEMENTAL PLEADING—EFFECT OF.

Facts to be alleged in a supplemental pleading must relate to and be material to the original case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 838, 839; Dec. Dig. ☞ 279(4).]

6. PLEADING ☞ 279(4) — SUPPLEMENTAL PLEADING—EFFECT OF.

As a supplemental pleading is proper only in aid of the case made by the original complaint, relief cannot be granted upon such pleading, where the proof shows that the plaintiff had no cause of action when its original complaint was filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 838, 839; Dec. Dig. ☞ 279(4).]

7. PLEADING ☞ 279(3)—SUPPLEMENTAL COMPLAINT — IRRIGATION DISTRICTS — ASSESSMENT AGAINST ENFORCEMENT.

In an action under Bridgford Act, § 69, to determine the validity of an assessment levied by the board of directors of an irrigation district, plaintiffs filed a supplemental complaint, questioning the assessment on the ground that after the filing of the original complaint, a petition for an election pursuant to section 59, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1111, providing that where after the levy of an assessment and petition signed by the qualified voters in the district equal in number to 15 per cent of the votes cast at the last general election, such assessment shall not be levied without the election authorized, was filed, which petition was, by the board, rejected. Held, that as the supplemental complaint referred to matters not arising until after the filing of the original complaint, and as the election provided for is only in the nature of a referendum election, which does not invalidate the assessment, relief could not be granted on the supplemental complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 837½; Dec. Dig. ☞ 279(3).]

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ☞ 231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS — ASSESSMENT — ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

Where notwithstanding a sufficient petition under Bridgford Act, § 59, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1111, providing that an assessment by the board of directors of an irrigation district shall not be collected without an election, if a petition therefor is signed by voters equal in number to 15 per cent. of the votes cast at the last general election, the board of directors proceed to collect the assessment without election, property owners may maintain an action to restrain enforcement of the assessment.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Robert M. Clark, Judge.

Action by the Imperial Land Company, a corporation, and others, against the Imperial Irrigation District, a corporation, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Valentine & Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Haines & Haines, of San Diego, and M. W. Conkling, of El Centro, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought by various landowners in the Imperial irrigation district to contest the validity of an assessment levied by the board of directors of the district. We have just filed an opinion in a case bearing the same title 160 Pac. 113 (L. A. No. 3765). In that action, the assessment attacked was one levied for the year 1912, and our decision turned, in part, upon the fact that the complaint had not been filed within the period limited by section 68 of the Bridgford Act (St. 1897, p. 276). The assessment here in question was levied on September 24, 1913, and the action to determine its validity was begun on October 23, 1913, less than 30 days after the levy. On January 9, 1914, the plaintiffs filed a supplemental complaint, in which they alleged the filing of a petition for an election pursuant to the terms of section 59 of the act. That section provides for an election by which the qualified electors of the district shall determine whether or not a special assessment shall be levied "for the purpose of raising money to be applied to any of the purposes provided in this act." This grant of power to call such election is followed by a proviso (St. 1911, p. 1111), authorizing the board to levy in any year an assessment not exceeding 2 per centum of the value of the assessable property within the district, and not exceeding $75,000, without the vote of the electors; "provided, further, that if a petition signed by qualified voters in the district equal in number to fifteen per centum of the votes cast at the last preceding general election in such district, shall, within thirty days after the board shall by resolution have provided for the levying of such assessment, be filed with such board petitioning that an election relative to the levying of such assessment be held, such assessment shall not be levied without the election provided * * * in this section." The supplemental complaint, after setting forth the filing of a sufficient petition within the 30 days, alleged that the board of directors had refused to call an election, and was proceeding to enforce the assessment without submitting the question to the vote of the electors. The answer to the original complaint put in issue the allegations designed to show irregularities in the levying of the assessment itself. The answer to the supplemental complaint, while admitting the filing of a petition, denied that it had been signed by the requisite number of voters, and alleged that the board had determined that it was "not satisfied * * * that said petition is signed by qualified voters in the district equal in number to 15 per cent of the votes cast at the last preceding general election. * * *" In response to the issues raised by the original complaint and the answer thereto, the findings were that the assessment had been levied in compliance with the requirements of the law. On the supplemental pleadings, the court found in accordance with the allegations of the answer. The conclusions of law were that "the original complaint herein should be dismissed on the merits," and that the declarations and action of the board of directors with reference to the petition for election "are conclusive in this action and are not open to collateral attack herein." The judgment was that the complainants take nothing, that the temporary injunction theretofore issued be dissolved, and that the defendants recover their costs. The appellants appeal from the judgment and attack the propriety of the determinations made by the court below with reference both to the original and the supplemental pleadings.

[1] We are satisfied that the court below correctly determined that there was no merit in the attacks upon the assessment, made by the original complaint. Certain irregularities were alleged and denied, and the court found against the averments of the complaint in each instance. We cannot accede to the claim that these findings are without support in the evidence. It is claimed that the assessment book did not comply with section 35 of the Bridgford Act, in that it did not state the cash value of the real estate assessed. It appears, however, that the various pages of the assessment book contained columns for the entry of the different matters required, and that the columns designed to show the values of the properties assessed were, in each case, headed by a dollar mark. The mark thus appearing at the head of the column was applicable to all of the figures appearing in that column. It was not necessary to repeat the symbol before each valuation on the page. Knobloch v. Associated Oil Co., 170 Cal. 144, 148 Pac. 938. An entirely different situation was presented in Fox v. Townsend, 152 Cal. 51, 91 Pac. 1004, 1007, and the earlier decisions there cited. In those cases the assessment roll did not contain a dollar mark connected in any way with the figures of valuation. The appellants attempt to make a point of the fact that the dollar mark was also printed at places where it had no purpose or significance, as, for example, at the head of the column for "total number of acres to be assessed." But the circumstance that the sign was unnecessarily or uselessly appended in some instances furnishes no reason for denying it its true significance in the places where it properly belonged.

Without going into unnecessary detail, it will suffice to say that an inspection of the portions of the assessment book copied in the transcript demonstrates that there is no substantial force in plaintiffs' contention that the evidence does not sustain the finding that the assessment book shows "the total value of all property assessed" and "the total value of all property after equalization by the board of directors of said district." The figures appearing in the last volume of the assessment book disclose these totals, and they are entered in such manner that there can be no fair ground for doubt or uncertainty regarding their meaning.

[2] It is claimed that the assessment book does not show on its face that the total valuation, as finally equalized by the board, had been extended into columns and added by the secretary within 10 days after the close of the session of the board of equalization. Section 38 of the act. But the act does not require that the books shall show that the extension and addition were made within the required time, and there was uncontradicted oral testimony that the requisite acts had been so done.

[3] The next objection is that the evidence does not sustain the finding that the board of directors estimated or determined that the sum of $28,935 was the sum required to be raised by special assessment. It is sufficient in answer to this point, to quote the following language from the resolution adopted by the board on September 24, 1913:

"Be it resolved by the board of directors of said Imperial irrigation district, that it is necessary for the lawful purposes of said district for its fiscal year 1913-1914, that the sum of $28,935 be raised by special assessment for the general fund."

The statute does not require that any more detailed estimate shall be spread upon the record.

[4] The foregoing discussion disposes of every substantial point bearing upon the validity of the assessment as originally levied. The appellants complain of the conclusion of law that the "original complaint should be dismissed," claiming that judgment upon the merits should have been ordered. We cannot see that the appellants are prejudiced by a dismissal in place of a judgment against them on the merits. However, a judgment of the latter kind was, in fact, entered.

[5-8] The plaintiffs having, then, failed to establish a case for relief under their original complaint, were they entitled to prevail under the supplemental pleadings? The court below proceeded upon the theory that the determination of the board with respect to the insufficiency of the signatures to the petition for election concluded the plaintiffs, and prevented them from showing that a sufficient petition to require an election had in fact been presented. In the view we take of the case, we are not called upon to determine whether this position can be supported. An analogous question was fully considered by this court in Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 288, 116 Pac. 750. It may well be that the doctrine of that case would require a holding that the determination of the board regarding the sufficiency of the signatures to the petition for an election under section 59 is not conclusive, but that the question is open for examination and review in any judicial proceeding in which the validity of the board's action is properly called in question. But the propriety of the action of the board in refusing to call an election was not a proper subject of inquiry in the present action. It was not a matter which could be brought into litigation by supplemental pleadings. The action was brought under section 69 of the Bridgford Act to determine the validity of an assessment levied by the board. The case of the plaintiffs was based upon the theory and contention that the assessment so levied was invalid. The election authorized by section 59 of the act is not an attack upon the validity of the original levy. It presupposes such validity, but seeks to subject the action of the board to a referendum; i. e., to the veto power of the electors of the district. The original complaint was one to determine the validity of the assessment; that is to say, to obtain an adjudication that the assessment was invalid. The supplemental complaint sought an adjudication, not that the assessment was invalid, but that it should be suspended until the holding of an election which should result in authorizing or prohibiting the enforcement of the assessment. It follows, therefore, that the supplemental complaint is not consistent with or in aid of the original complaint, but is the assertion of a new and independent cause of action. It is well settled by our decisions that the facts to be alleged in a supplemental pleading must relate to and be material to the original case. Gleason v. Gleason, 54 Cal. 135; Brown v. W. M. Co., 127 Cal. 630, 60 Pac. 424; Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 121, 135 Pac. 37, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1011.

Furthermore, since a supplemental pleading is proper only in aid of the case made by the original complaint, relief cannot be granted upon a supplemental complaint, where the proof shows that the plaintiff had no cause of action when his original complaint was filed. "If a party has no cause of action at the time of the institution of his action, he cannot maintain it by filing a supplemental complaint founded on matters which have subsequently occurred." Wittenbrock v. Bellmer, 57 Cal. 12; Gordon v. San Diego, 108 Cal. 264, 41 Pac. 301; Hill v. Den, 121 Cal. 42, 53 Pac. 642. Here as we have seen, the plaintiffs had no cause of action when their complaint was filed. The findings of the court against their allegations of irregularity were fully supported by the evidence. They could not therefore make a new case by supplemental complaint.

For these reasons the court could not have granted the plaintiffs relief upon their supplemental complaint, and they are not injured by the court's action thereon, even though such action may have been based upon an erroneous reason.

We do not doubt that the action of the board in attempting to collect an assessment, notwithstanding the filing of a sufficient petition for an election under section 59, would justify an action by the assessment payer to restrain the enforcement of the assessment until the holding of the election. Whether such action can be regarded as a proceeding, under section 69, "to determine the validity of such assessment," as is suggested in Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irrigation District, 26 Cal. App. 529, 147 Pac. 593, it is not necessary here to decide. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that, if the failure to call an election gives to the landholder the right to proceed under section 59 of the act, such right is entirely distinct from the right, asserted by a complaint filed before the presentation of the petition for election, to assail the validity of the original levy.

The judgment is affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR 790(2) — QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW—MOOT CASES.

An appeal from an order granting an injunction pendente lite, restraining the enforcement of an assessment levied by defendant irrigation district, will be dismissed, where judgment on the merits for defendant was affirmed on appeal; the question having become moot.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by the Imperial Land Company, a corporation, and others, against the Imperial Irrigation District and others. From an order granting an injunction pendente lite, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

A. Haines and Haines & Haines, all of San Diego, for appellants. Valentine & Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal by defendants from an order granting an injunction pendente lite. The injunction restrained the enforcement of an assessment levied by the board of directors of the Imperial irrigation district. The trial of the action resulted in a judgment in favor of the defendants, and we have this day filed an opinion affirming such judgment. Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irr. Dist. (L. R. No. 4196) 160 Pac. 116.

The judgment on the merits, which now becomes final, ended the life of the temporary injunction. The defendants have accordingly secured every substantial benefit which they could obtain by a reversal of the order which they seek to review by the present appeal. The rights of the parties would not be affected in any way by either an affirmation or a reversal of such order. In this state of facts, the questions presented are merely moot or academic, and the court will not exercise its appellate jurisdiction for their decision. Foster v. Smith, 115 Cal. 611, 47 Pac. 591; Bradley v. Voorsanger, 143 Cal. 214, 76 Pac. 1031.

The appeal is dismissed.

The right to make contracts like other personal and property rights, is subject to reasonable regulation designed to promote the general convenience, prosperity, and welfare.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT § 69—PAYMENT OF WAGES—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Act June 5, 1915, amending Act March 1, 1911 (St. 1915, p. 1215), making it an offense to issue in payment of wages any order, check, memorandum, or other acknowledgment of indebtedness, unless it is negotiable and payable on demand without discount, or to issue in payment of wages any script, or other thing redeemable in merchandise or otherwise than in money, as applied to ordinary transactions between employers and employes of the kind within its terms, is valid and constitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 78-81; Dec. Dig. § 69.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT § 84—PAYMENT OF WAGES—CRIMINAL OFFENSES.

An affidavit charging that on a date named accused did willfully and unlawfully issue in payment of and as evidence of indebtedness for wages to an employé a note for the amount of wages due two years after date, and not on demand, no part of which has been paid, states an offense under Act June 5, 1915, amending Act March 1, 1911 (St. 1915, p. 1215), forbidding payment of wages by any order or acknowledgment of indebtedness unless it is negotiable and payable on demand without discount in cash or by any script or other thing redeemable in merchandise or otherwise than in money.

4. HABEAS CORPUS § 92(1) — HEARING — SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

On writ of habeas corpus for the discharge of one accused of violation of Act June 5, 1915, amending Act March 1, 1911 (St. 1915, p. 1215), relating to payment of wages of employes, the contention in the brief of counsel that the note given by the petitioner was not for current wages, but for accumulated wages for months passed, will not be considered, but must await the trial of the accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 89; Dec. Dig. § 92(1).]

In Bank. Petition by John Ballestra for writ of habeas corpus. Petition denied, and petitioner remanded to custody.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for petitioner. Clarence F. Lea and G. W. Hoyle, both of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The petitioner is in custody upon the charge of having violated the provisions of the act of June 5, 1915, in effect August 8, 1915, amending the prior act of March 1, 1911 (Stats. 1915, p. 1215). Section 1 of the statute is, in part, as follows:

"No person, firm or corporation shall issue, in payment of or as an evidence of indebtedness for wages due an employé, any order, check, memorandum, or other acknowledgment of indebtedness, unless the same is negotiable, and is payable upon demand without discount in cash at some bank or other established place of business in the state; and no person, firm or corporation shall issue in payment of wages due, or wages to become due an employé, or as an advance on wages to be earned by an employé, any script, coupons, cards or other thing redeemable in merchandise or purporting to be payable or redeemable otherwise than in money."

Section 2 makes a violation of the act a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.

In considering this statute we may presume, in support of the legislative enactment, that some employers in this state had adopted and followed the custom of paying the daily, weekly, or monthly wages of their employes when due by giving orders for the amount thereof payable only in goods, or orders of an indefinite nature not payable on demand, but at some future time. The purpose of the statute evidently is to prevent the evils which the Legislature believed had arisen from such practices.

[1, 2] The right to make contracts, like other personal and property rights, is subject to reasonable regulation designed and calculated to promote the general convenience, prosperity, and welfare. Mutual Loan Co. v. Martell, 222 U. S. 232, 32 Sup. Ct. 74, 56 L. Ed. 175, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 529. Laws having a reasonable tendency to accomplish these results, and not imposing unreasonable burdens upon individuals, are valid. The provisions of the statute in question do not transgress this rule. As applied to ordinary transactions between employers and employes, of the kind embraced within its terms, the statute is, in our opinion, valid and constitutional.

[3] The affidavit on which Ballestra is held in custody charged, in the language of the statute, that on October 30, 1915, in Sonoma county, Cal., Ballestra "did willfully and unlawfully issue in payment of and as evidence of indebtedness for wages due an employé, to wit: Pasquale Barberies," a certain note set forth in the affidavit, for the amount of wages due Barberies, payable two years after date, and not on demand, no part of which has been paid. This clearly states an offense embraced in the description given in the statute.

[4] It is claimed in the brief of the petitioner that the note in question was not given for current weekly or monthly wages in the ordinary course of business, but that, in fact, the employé had worked for many months for Ballestra, allowing his wages to accumulate without payment, or to accrue in excess of partial payments, until the amount due was many times the monthly wages agreed on, that Ballestra was unable presently to pay this sum, and that the note was executed in pursuance of an agreement between them to give him further time for payment, or in consideration that Mary Ballestra, who also signed the note, should execute it as surety the terms of the note lend color to this suggestion. We are not prepared to say that the statute in question was intended to, or that it does, apply to such a transaction, or that, if it did, it would be a reasonable regulation of the right of private contract secured by the Constitution, and within the legislative power. We have not the facts before us. The petitioner has not been put upon his trial, and no evidence has been taken. He seeks release solely upon the facts stated in the affidavit upon which the warrant of arrest was issued, and we cannot consider other facts which may exist and which may take the case out of the legitimate operation of the statute, or which raise the constitutional question suggested. We express no opinion concerning the proper solution of such a case. The petitioner must go to trial upon the charge made against him.

The petitioner is remanded to the custody of the officer.

ARTHUR v. MERCHANTS' ICE & COLD STORAGE CO. OF LOS ANGELES.
(L. A. 3484.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨217(17)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Under Civ. Code, § 1970, as amended by St. 1907, p. 119, providing that an employé's knowledge of dangers incident to the work does not prevent his recovery unless he "fully understood, comprehended and appreciated such dangers and thereafter consented to proceed with his work," where a driver who was injured while in the employ of the defendant ice company from being kicked by a vicious horse remained in defendant's employ and continued to drive the horse after being warned of the animal's propensity to kick, he assumed the risk of injury.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨217(1)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

A servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment so far as those risks at the time of his employment are known to him, or should be readily discoverable by a person of his age and capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 574; Dec. Dig. ⇨217(1).]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨150(1)—WARNING OF PERILS—DUTY OF MASTER.

The master should give warning of those perils to which his servants will be exposed, and of which he is or ought to be aware, other than such as they in the exercise of ordinary care should have foreseen as necessarily incident to the employment in the natural and ordinary course of affairs.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨157—INJURY TO SERVANT—SUFFICIENCY OF WARNING—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

That the defendant ice company's route superintendent, who notified plaintiff, also a servant of the company, that the horse which kicked him while he was sitting on the wagon seat about 3½ feet above the ground was addicted to kicking viciously while being driven, failed to warn him that the horse was an unusually high kicker, though he knew such to be the case, did not make the master liable, where the route superintendent was not in the discharge of any duty when he warned the servant, who had previously received a sufficient warning from one charged with such duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. ⇨157.]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨157—INJURY TO SERVANT—SUFFICIENCY OF WARNING.

Where a driver in the employ of defendant ice company, who was injured from being kicked while riding on the wagon seat about 3½ feet from the ground, had been warned that the horse was addicted to kicking viciously, and the employé was as well acquainted with the danger from such horses and the means of protection as the employer's servants whose duty it was to warn him, the fact that he had not been warned that the horse was an unusually high kicker did not render his employer liable.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨157—INJURY TO SERVANT—DUTY TO WARN.

The law does not require the employer to give his employé minute directions as to the character of the danger he incurs and the means of avoiding it if the employé has experience in such matters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. ⇨157.]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨125(1)—INJURIES FROM VICIOUS ANIMALS—LIABILITY.

Since the gist of an action for injuries caused by a vicious animal is the defendant's keeping the animal with knowledge of his vicious propensities, a servant injured by a kick from a vicious horse could not recover in the absence of evidence that the master knew of the vicious propensities of the horse.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT — 278(14) — INJURIES FROM VICIOUS ANIMALS—LIABILITY.

The fact of knowledge of the owner of a vicious animal of its vicious propensities cannot be inferred from a statement of an employé of such owner that the horse "once got him and kicked the whole shirt off of him."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 966; Dec. Dig. — 278(14).]

9. EVIDENCE — 244(11)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTY TO WARN—KNOWLEDGE OF MASTER—EVIDENCE.

A statement of a foreman made several months after plaintiff servant's injury from a kick by a horse as to the vicious character of the horse is not competent evidence of the master's knowledge of such vicious character at the time of the injury.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Plinnie Enos Arthur against the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company of Los Angeles. From a judgment for plaintiff and denial of new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

George Beebe, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Morton, Hollzer & Morton and Frank M. Fowler, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. A hearing in bank having been ordered after decision in Department 1, we have carefully re-examined the case. The department opinion, prepared by Shaw, J., reads as follows:

"In this case the defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The plaintiff sued for damages arising from the alleged negligence of the defendant. The defense was that the injury to the plaintiff arose from a danger incident to the employment, that the plaintiff was informed thereof, and that he assumed the risk of injury therefrom.

[1-3] "The law on the subject is well settled. Section 1970 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1907, was in force at the time of the injury, July 8, 1911. It provides that knowledge by an employé of dangers to himself incident to the work does not prevent his recovery for an injury therefrom, unless it appears that he 'fully understood, comprehended and appreciated such dangers and thereafter consented' to proceed with his work. The question here is whether the evidence shows that plaintiff was fully informed that a horse behind which he was to work was addicted to kicking, and was for that reason a source of danger. 'A servant is held to assume the ordinary risks of the business upon which he enters, so far as those risks, at the time of his entering upon the business, are known to him, or should be readily discernible by a person of his age and capacity.' 1 Shearman & R. on Negl. § 185. 'A servant does not assume any risks which are not thus known or discernible,' Id. § 185a. 'The master must give warning to his servants of all perils to which they will be exposed, of which he is or ought to be aware, other than such as they should, in the exercise of ordinary care, have foreseen as necessarily incident to the business in the natural and ordinary course of affairs.' Id. § 293. See, also, Baxter v. Roberts, 44 Cal. 192 [13 Am. Rep. 160]; Rodgers v. Cent. P. R.

Co., 67 Cal. 608 [8 Pac. 377]; and Bone v. Ophir, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 294 [86 Pac. 685].

"A kick from a horse belonging to the defendant broke the plaintiff's leg. The defendant was engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling ice in Los Angeles. The ice was delivered in wagons drawn by horses and operated by two men, a driver and a helper. The wagons were fitted with but one seat, situated at the front immediately behind the horses. On this seat the driver and helper would sit while going from place to place on the route. Plaintiff had been in the service of the defendant for about a year prior to the injury, part of the time as a driver, and part of the time as a helper. Just prior to the day of the injury he was assigned to a new route, and on that day he was directed to ride on a certain wagon on which one Gardner was driver, and one Nearon was helper, for the purpose of learning a part of the new route. He was to sit on the seat between the driver and the helper as they passed over the route. The horse, 'Ned,' attached to this wagon, was addicted to kicking viciously while being driven. This propensity was known to the defendant's agent and servants in charge of the horses, but was not known to the plaintiff until that morning before he began the work. Plaintiff, as above stated, had been working with the defendant's horses for about a year, and he also had had some experience with horses and had been around them more or less during his life. Although his testimony is evasive in some respects, he, in effect, admitted that, when about to start on the route that morning, Gardner, the driver, told him that the horse Ned was a bad one to kick, and to look out for him; that he talked with Gardner about it during the forenoon as he rode on the wagon; that in the afternoon, before the injury, he accosted Robinson, the defendant's route superintendent, and asked if he could not have Ned to drive on the following Monday, when he was to begin his new route, saying that with proper handling he could break the horse of the habit of kicking; that Robinson said, 'You don't want him,' that he was a bad one and to look out for him, and that he (Robinson) had known the horse for two years, and that he was given to kicking and was sure to kick when the whip was used or when the line got under his tail. Gardner and Nearon were present at that time. Both Gardner and Nearon testified that the plaintiff was warned by Gardner and Robinson as above stated. Robinson also testified to the same effect with respect to the conversation in the afternoon. The injury occurred a short time after the conversation with Robinson and while plaintiff was riding on the wagon sitting on the seat between Gardner and Nearon. This comprised all the testimony on the subject of his information regarding the character of the horse and his conduct with respect thereto. There is no substantial conflict in the testimony between the several witnesses who testified on that subject.

"It is manifest from this testimony that the plaintiff was warned of the vicious character of the horse and of the particular trait which made him dangerous to persons riding on the seat behind him. With knowledge of this danger plaintiff proceeded on his work. Under the rule stated in the above-cited authorities he must be presumed to have taken upon himself the risk of the danger which he incurred, and he cannot hold his employer liable for the injury received in consequence thereof.

[4-6] "The evidence shows that the bottom of the wagon body upon which the plaintiff's feet rested while sitting on the seat where he was injured was about 3½ feet above the ground. It does not appear how far it was from the horse. Plaintiff's counsel claim that there was evidence to the effect that the horse Ned was an unusually high kicker, and that the defendant's servants failed to inform plaintiff of that fact. This claim is based on testimony of the plaintiff to the effect that after he recovered from the injury Robinson told him that the "horse once got him and kicked the whole shirt off of him." He did not state the relative positions of himself and the horse when this occurred, nor that he was on the seat of a wagon drawn by the horse. Robinson did not have charge of the horses and it was not his duty to assign the plaintiff to work behind any particular horse. He was the route superintendent. His duty was to assign drivers to their routes. The man in charge of the stable chose the horses to be hitched to particular wagons. Robinson's information concerning this horse was given to the plaintiff casually while he was in the course of his employment as route superintendent, and not in the discharge of any duty of the defendant to the plaintiff with respect to the horse. It does not appear that it was any part of his duty to act for the defendant in informing the plaintiff of the character of the horse. Furthermore, it cannot be said that the law requires the employer to give to his employé minute directions as to the character of the dangers he incurs and the means of avoiding them, if any there be, when, as in this case, it appears that the employé himself has experience in such matters and is as well acquainted with the dangers from such horses and the means of escape or protection as the defendant's servants whose duty it was to warn him. 1 Shearman & R. on Negl. § 203, note 16. We think the court erred in denying the motion for a nonsuit and in refusing to grant a new trial.

"The judgment and order are reversed."

We are satisfied that the foregoing opinion makes proper disposition of the material questions involved in the appeals. A few words of answer to the criticisms contained in the petition for hearing in bank may not be amiss.

The respondent makes complaint of the statement in the opinion that he had been told that the horse "was a bad one to kick," and that he had asked to have the horse to drive, saying that he could break him of "the habit of kicking." It is claimed that, according to the plaintiff's testimony, he had been told merely that the horse was a bad one; he did not remember that anything had been said about kicking. But a reading of the entire testimony given by plaintiff must convince any fair mind that he had been informed that the horse was given to kicking. Despite the caution with which he sought to guard his testimony, the statements made by him were pregnant with admissions which fully justify the declaration in the department opinion.

[7] Beyond this it is strongly urged that the evidence warranted the inference that the plaintiff did not fully understand the dangers involved in his employment, inasmuch as he had not been warned that the horse could kick a man occupying the wagon seat. This contention implies that there is something unusual in the kind of kick which injured plaintiff, and consequently that mere knowledge that a horse would kick would not lead one to suppose that he would kick to the height reached by this horse. The difficulty with this argument is that, if it be assumed that plaintiff's information did not include knowledge of the danger inherent in his position, there is nothing in the case to indicate that the defendant had such knowledge. The gist of an action for injuries caused by a vicious animal is the defendant's keeping of the animal with knowledge of his vicious propensities. Hanemann v. Western Meat Co., 8 Cal. App. 698, 97 Pac. 695; Barrett v. Metropolitan Contracting Co., 155 Pac. 645. The plaintiff here relies on the negligence of his employer in directing him to ride behind a dangerous animal. If a man was in no apparent danger from riding on the seat of the wagon behind a horse that would kick, it was not negligent for the defendant to direct him to so ride. On the plaintiff's theory he was bound to show, not only that he did not know that the horse was an unusually high kicker, but that the defendant was, or ought to have been, aware of this fact. At this point the evidence fails.

[8, 9] Certainly the necessary fact cannot fairly be inferred from the vague and perhaps figurative statement of Robinson that the horse "once got him and kicked the whole shirt off of him." Furthermore, this statement was made by Robinson, as plaintiff testified, five months after the injury, at a time when plaintiff was asking Robinson for re-employment. It was not shown that Robinson was then or at any other time empowered to speak for the defendant on that subject. A statement so made is not competent evidence of defendant's knowledge at the time of the injury of the vicious character of the horse. The witness Gardner, who had warned plaintiff about the horse, does not appear to have been aware of the animal's unusual agility (if it was unusual); his testimony being that he did not think the horse would kick "that high, quite." If, then, the plaintiff founds his right to recover upon the fact that he was subjected to a danger beyond that ordinarily attaching to the driving of a kicking horse, he did not meet the burden resting upon him to show that defendant was negligent in subjecting him to this unknown and hidden danger.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

NORTHWESTERN PAC. R. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 7928.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 16, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT § 417(5)—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—PROCEEDINGS FOR COMPENSATION—REVIEW.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 315) § 81, providing that the applicant for rehearing before the Industrial Accident Commission shall be deemed to have finally waived all objections, irregularities, and illegalities concerning the matter on which rehearing is sought other than those set forth in the application for rehearing, and section 16, limiting the time for proceedings under the act to six months after the accident or a payment or agreement for payment of disability indemnity, where an award is made in proceedings commenced more than six months after the only payment was made, and no objection is made on motion for rehearing before the Commission as to time of commencement of proceedings, it must be assumed, in proceedings to review the award that the Commission concluded there was an agreement for payment of the compensation.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶405(1) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — PROCEEDINGS FOR COMPENSATION—EVIDENCE.

In proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, evidence held to authorize a finding by the Industrial Accident Commission that there was an agreement between the employer and workman as to compensation within six months before commencement of proceedings.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶414—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—PROCEEDINGS FOR COMPENSATION—"AGREEMENT."

To constitute an "agreement" within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 16, providing that an agreement for the payment of disability indemnity shall extend the time for proceedings for its collection, no more is necessary than an understanding between the parties as to the amount to be paid and a promise of the employer to pay that amount.

In Bank. Application by the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company for writ of review to the Industrial Accident Commission to review an award in favor of one George Prescos against petitioner of $722.10, being $8.30 per week for 87 weeks. Award affirmed.

Stanley Moore, of San Francisco (Elliott Johnson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, in favor of one George Prescos against petitioner, of $722.10, being $8.30 per week for 87 weeks.

By reason of an accident in the course of his employment, by petitioner, and arising out of said employment, Prescos suffered complete loss of vision of the left eye, and became entitled, upon proper application therefor, to receive the amount of compensation awarded him. The accident occurred on December 1, 1914, and the proceeding before the Commission was not instituted until December 23, 1915. The only amount ever in fact paid to him by petitioner was $18, paid on January 5, 1915. The claim of petitioner here is that at the time the proceeding was instituted before the Commission the right of Prescos to so proceed was barred by the provisions of section 16 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which provides that "unless compensation is paid or an agreement for its payment made within the time limited in this section for the institution of proceedings for its collection, the right to institute such proceedings shall be wholly barred," and that proceedings for the collection of such a benefit as is here involved "must be commenced within six months from the date of the accident, except as otherwise provided in this act," and that "the payment of the disability, * * * indemnity, or any part thereof, or agreement therefor, shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of the agreement or last payment of such disability indemnity * * * or any part thereof." Petitioner by its answer before the Commission claimed the benefit of these provisions. Their effect was to bar the proceeding instituted by Prescos unless there was some "agreement" for the payment of the compensation under which it may be held that the time was extended. See Miller v. Industrial Accident Commission, 156 Pac. 1033.

[1] It is urged that the award cannot stand in the absence of an express finding by the Commission on the issue made as to this question. There is no express finding in regard to this matter. But petitioner failed to make any such objection in its petition to the Commission for a rehearing, and therefore must "be deemed to have finally waived" the same. Section 81, Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 315). The award must be considered upon the assumption that the Commission concluded that there was an "agreement" for the payment of the compensation as, in fact, it said in its order denying a rehearing, and the only question for us is whether there is enough in the evidence to furnish legal support for such a conclusion.

[2] Prescos is an illiterate Greek, living in Humboldt county, where the accident occurred. One Johnson conducted for him his correspondence with petitioner railroad company relative to the payment of compensation, concerning his right to which there appears never to have been the slightest question. In March, 1915, application was made on his behalf to the rating department of the Commission for information as to the amount of compensation to which he was entitled. A letter was sent him by such rating department on March 29, 1915, informing him that he was entitled, on the facts stated, to $8.30 per week for 87 weeks. The letter states that a copy was sent to his employer and a copy to the Eureka office of the Commission. Prescos and Johnson testified that about this time he (Prescos) received a letter from Mr. C. A. Coombs, division engineer of petitioner, to the effect that he was to receive $8.30 per week for 87 weeks. Johnson testified that in this letter it was promised that the company would pay this. Subsequently Johnson for Prescos wrote Mr. Coombs about the matter, and in a letter in reply dated June 22, 1915, at Ft. Seward, and addressed to Johnson at Garberville, Mr. Coombs said:

"Referring to accident happening to Mr. George Prescos, I wish to advise that the Industrial Accident Commission has decided that he is entitled to a compensation of $8.30 per week for 87 weeks. We desire to know whether it will be agreeable to Mr. Prescos to accept payments in monthly vouchers and where should voucher be sent so as to reach him. We have been endeavoring to get this information from Mr. Prescos, but to date he has refused to give us this data, so that vouchers may be issued to him. All vouchers are issued by our San Francisco office. We have none here for him, as he has refused to inform us where they should be sent."

In reply, Johnson said that he had seen Prescos, who was working some distance out of town, and that he had left the matter with him (Johnson) to settle with Coombs; that he (Prescos) said that he is "satisfied for company to give him, but he wants to get that money all at one time, that is, the full amount in one payment," and that he would like to be allowed to continue to work for the company because, on account of the loss of sight, he could not get a job elsewhere. As late as August 6, 1915, Mr. Coombs, as division engineer, by letter of that date said:

"With reference to my letter of June 22d and your letter of July 19th: Will you kindly advise me to what post office address compensation vouchers should be mailed for George Prescos? Should they be mailed to Garberville in your care? They will be mailed once a month by registered mail, such being in accordance with the award of the Industrial Accident Commission. We cannot mail them more often than that. We have been endeavoring for several months to have Mr. Prescos advise us where these vouchers should be mailed, but to date he has failed to furnish such information, which accounts for the lateness in his receiving vouchers. A prompt reply will be appreciated."

About three months later, viz. on October 30, 1915, Johnson again wrote Coombs, to the effect that Prescos would like to have his money, and Coombs replied to the effect that, as the Industrial Accident Commission and the railroad company's legal department "now have his case up," he could do nothing for him in the matter of final settlement. It is not questioned that Mr. Coombs in all his communications was acting in accord with authority so to do. Prescos substantially testified that he believed from the correspondence that the whole matter had been adjusted, and that the checks were being retained for him by the company, he preferring to let the matter thus remain so that he could get all of his money at one time. Hence his failure to even think of commencing formal proceedings before the Commission until after receipt of the letter of October 30th. The evidence very clearly shows that both Prescos and petitioner accepted as a final disposition of the matter as to the amount of compensation, the estimate of the rating department of the Industrial Accident Commission. Can it be fairly held that there was in all this a sufficient foundation for a conclusion that there was an "agreement" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act for the payment thereof. We are satisfied that this question must be answered in the affirmative.

As we have seen, according to the uncontradicted evidence, petitioner three times substantially promised in writing to pay to Prescos the amount of compensation declared by the rating department of the Industrial Accident Commission to be due him, $8.30 a week for 87 weeks. The assent of Prescos to the amount of compensation thus proffered is certainly sufficiently expressed in the reply to the letter of June 22, 1915, to constitute an agreement between the parties, within the meaning of the act, for the payment of the compensation stated. There was certainly a meeting of the minds of the parties as to this, an acceptance by both of them of the amount stated by the rating department of the Industrial Accident Commission. The fact that Prescos expressed therein a desire to have all of the money paid to him at one time instead of in monthly installments, as proposed by the petitioner, is not material in this connection. It was the mere expression of a desire as to the way in which he should receive the agreed amount, just as what followed was a mere request that he be allowed to continue to work for the company, in no degree qualifying his acceptance as to the amount. There was an agreement for the payment of a certain sum as compensation, the sum determined by the rating department of the commission to be the correct amount, and this is all the act requires. The act prescribes no particular form of agreement.

[3] To constitute a agreement within the meaning of the act, certainly no more should be held to be necessary than an understanding between the parties as to the amount to be paid, and a promise on the part of the employer to pay that amount.

It is not suggested that, if the correspondence constituted a sufficient manifestation of an "agreement" for the payment of this amount of compensation, the proceeding of December 23, 1915, was not instituted within the time allowed by the act. The whole claim of petitioner in this connection, as shown by the briefs, is that a sufficient agreement is not shown by the correspondence.

It is proper to state that there can be no doubt, in view of the evidence, that Prescos regarded the matter as to the amount of compensation to be paid him to be fully adjusted and determined between himself and petitioner, and understood that petitioner had agreed to pay him this amount, as promised by it more than once.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

RAFAEL v. BOYLE, City and County Auditor. (Civ. 1778.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 6, 1916.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS *§*214(3)—CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—EMPLOYMENT OF ATTORNEY.

The charter of the city and county of San Francisco providing a city attorney, directed to give legal advice to all officers, boards, and commissions when requested by them, by implication requires the civil service commission to avail itself of his services, and it cannot, when he is ready and willing to perform the necessary legal service, employ an attorney at the expense of the city, to defend its members in legal proceedings, merely because the charter empowers it to institute and prosecute legal proceedings for violation of an article of the charter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 584, 585; Dec. Dig. *§*214(3).]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nstrand, Judge.

Mandamus by Joseph Rafael against Thomas F. Boyle, Auditor of the City and County of San Francisco. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Robert M. Searles, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellant. Joseph T. Curley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment granting a peremptory writ of mandamus directed against the defendant herein, commanding him to audit a certain demand against the treasury of the city and county of San Francisco.

In brief, the facts are as follows: William A. Kelly, an attorney at law, was employed by the members of the civil service commission of said city and county to defend them in certain legal proceedings. At the time of such employment the commission had received from the city attorney certain written opinions contrary in tenor to its views as to the legality of certain matters then before it. In each of these matters the commission, disregarding the city attorney's opinion, acted in accordance with its own judgment; and thereafter legal proceedings were commenced in the superior court against said commission to determine the legality of its action. Notwithstanding that the commission had acted contrary to his views in these matters, the city attorney was ready and willing to appear in court and defend said suits.

The members of the commission, however, ignored the offer, and by resolution engaged William A. Kelly to defend them in the proceedings. A total compensation of $500 was agreed upon. The city attorney was not consulted further in the matter nor requested to appear. In accordance with his agreement Kelly appeared for the commission in said actions, and thereafter he presented his demand drawn on the city treasurer for payment of the agreed compensation, which demand was approved by the civil service commission and by the board of supervisors, and passed to the auditor, defendant herein, for audit. That officer declined to audit the demand on the ground of illegality. Kelly assigned his claim to the petitioner herein, who brought the proceeding here under review. Judgment was rendered in favor of the petitioner as prayed, and defendant takes this appeal.

The sole question presented for determination is whether or not under these facts the civil service commission had the power to retain an attorney at the expense of the city when the city attorney was ready and willing to perform the necessary legal services. It is contended by the respondent that under the broad provisions of article 13 of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco the right to retain counsel other than the city attorney is incidental to the very nature and life of the civil service system as therein created. Nowhere in the charter is express power conferred upon the civil service commission to engage private counsel, but it is insisted by petitioner that this power is implied in section 20, art. 13, of that instrument, providing that the commission shall have power "to institute and prosecute legal proceedings for violation of any of the provisions of this article." We are of the opinion that such contention cannot be maintained.

Whether attorneys may be employed in behalf of a municipal corporation depends upon the proper construction of the law under which such employment is sought to be sustained, the nature of the service to be performed, or, in the absence of legal provisions pertaining thereto, the character of the litigation or legal controversy involved. There is much variety in the charters and statutes of different jurisdictions relating to law officers of municipal corporations. In general, unless forbidden by law, when necessity arises therefor and the interests of the municipal corporation require it, the employment of attorneys has usually been sanctioned. 2 McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, § 501. It is usual, however, to find in municipal charters or laws applicable to the government of local public corporations, provisions dealing with the conduct of the municipality's legal business. Such is the case in the charter of San Francisco, which provides for a legal department, the head of which is known as the city attorney, and whose duties are set forth in article 5, c. 2, § 2, as follows:

"He must prosecute and defend for the city and county all actions at law or in equity, and all special proceedings for or against the city and county; and whenever any cause of action at law or in equity or by special proceedings exists in favor of the city and county he shall commence the same when within his knowledge, and, if not within his knowledge, when directed to do so by resolution of the board of supervisors. He shall give legal advice in writing to all officers, boards and commissions named in this charter, when requested so to do by them, or either of them, in writing, upon questions arising in their separate departments involving the rights or liabilities of the city and county. He shall not settle or dismiss any litigation for or against the city and county under his control unless upon his written recommendation he is ordered to do so by the mayor and supervisors."

This express provision clearly indicates an intention that the city attorney should handle all the legal work of the various departments of the city government, except where special provision is made for additional counsel. The manifest intention of the framers of the charter in the adoption of this provision was to systematize the conduct of the city's legal business, and to limit the power of the authorities to incur expenditure for this character of service; and the mere power given the commission to institute and prosecute legal proceedings does not imply that this above-quoted provision of the charter should be inoperative with regard to the civil service commission so as to empower it to employ another attorney to perform the duties belonging to the law officer of the municipality. The charter having provided a city attorney upon whom the board can call when a defense to any suit is necessary, it by implication makes it incumbent upon the board to avail itself of his services, and it cannot ignore this provision and employ some other attorney to render those services which it is the duty of the city attorney to perform. Denman v. Webster, 139 Cal. 452, 73 Pac. 139; Merriam v. Barnum, 116 Cal. 619, 48 Pac. 727.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Annunziata Barsi, by Serafine Barsi, her guardian, against J. A. Simpson. From an order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory and Evan Williams, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The appeal is by plaintiff from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff suffered a fracture of the left arm between the wrist and elbow on the 15th day of March, 1913, and on the same day employed the defendant, a physician and surgeon, to set the fracture. Thereafter the defendant set the fracture, and it is claimed on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant failed to use due care in this respect, by reason of which certain permanent injuries to the plaintiff resulted. The sole claim of negligence, as appears from an examination of the complaint, is that the defendant, at the time the arm was set, did not bring the ends of the fractured bones into position. There is no claim that any subsequent treatment given by the defendant was improper in any way, nor is any contention made on behalf of the plaintiff that the verdict, which was in favor of the defendant, is not sustained by the evidence. The points relied upon for reversal fall under two heads: First, the action of the court in admitting or rejecting offered testimony; second, the instructions given by the court, and the refusal of the court to give certain instructions offered by the plaintiff.

[1] Dr. Guido Caglieri, who was the first witness for the plaintiff, testified that he had caused to be made certain X-ray plates of the bones some two months after the arm had been fractured. The witness was asked whether a fracture set in the manner shown by the plates was a proper setting. The question was objected to on the ground that it assumed something not in evidence, viz. that the fracture was set in that manner. The objection was sustained. Assuming that the ruling of the court was erroneous, still it was a harmless error, for the witness later in his testimony said that if the fracture of the arm had been properly set in the first place there would have been no angulation at that time; and the witness further testified fully as to how the operation upon the arm should have been performed. Considering the testimony of this witness as a whole, he in effect answered the question to which the objection just noted was sustained.

[2] The next contention of this plaintiff is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in permitting defendant to ask Dr. Isaac W. Thorne on cross-examination a question which assumed facts not in evidence; but the question was permitted with the understanding that the defendant would later supply the omitted facts; and, as there is no claim now made that the facts assumed were not thereafter proven, it follows that the plaintiff is without any substantial ground of complaint on this score. Moreover, it is clear that the court permitted the question to be asked with the idea that such evidence was admitted subject to a motion to be thereafter made to strike it out if the defective proof was not supplied. No such motion was made. Consequently plaintiff cannot now be heard to complain of this ruling. Tarpey v. Veith, 22 Cal. App. 289, 134 Pac. 367.

[3] Maud Compton, a trained nurse, who was at the time the superintendent of the operating room of a large hospital, witnessed the performance of the operation on the plaintiff by the defendant, and testified that from her experience as a trained nurse she would say that Dr. Simpson's treatment of the injured arm was proper and not subject in any respect to adverse criticism. Passing the point made by the defendant that the question was answered before the objection was made, and that therefore it cannot now be considered, we think the question of whether or not the witness was qualified to testify as an expert was a matter within the sound discretion of the court; and, there being no showing of a clear abuse of that discretion, the ruling of the trial court will not be disturbed. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 575, 147 Pac. 238. Instances of cases where others than medical practitioners have been allowed to give their opinion on medical matters are found in the following cases: Lund v. Masonic Ass'n, 81 Hun, 287, 30 N. Y. Supp. 775; Robinson v. Exempt Fire Co., 103 Cal. 1, 36 Pac. 955, 24 L. R. A. 715, 42 Am. St. Rep. 93; Kimic v. San Jose & Los Gatos Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 279, 391, 104 Pac. 986, 991. In the last-mentioned case a professional nurse was allowed to so testify, and the court said:

"There can be no doubt that one who is shown to be a graduate nurse and to have been constantly engaged in the calling of a professional nurse for five years may properly be called upon * * * to give evidence of the character * * * elicited by the question asked."

There are two other points made as to the admission of evidence, but they are without any substantial merit, as is also the objection to certain of the instructions of the court, and we see no necessity for a detailed discussion of them.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

TUOLUMNE COUNTY ELECTRIC POWER & LIGHT CO. v. CITY OF SONORA.
(Civ. 1527.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 10, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 7, 1916.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 249 — ORDINANCE REGULATING ELECTRICITY — CONTRACT BY IMPLICATION.

Defendant city by ordinance provided that electric current, except for street lights, should be furnished for 24 hours every day, and for street lighting for a period stated each night. Plaintiff wrote defendant that to comply with said ordinance it would be necessary to leave power on its former night circuit for 24 hours, and that it would be necessary for the city to turn off the street lights belonging to the city which were attached to such circuit, during the day, or the city would be charged for power used in the street lamps during the day, and that the obligation of the company ceases when it furnished power to the city's connection. Defendant city replied that it would only pay for current furnished at the time and in the manner required by the ordinance, unless otherwise specifically requested, that the obligation of the company was to furnish power at the time and in the manner required in the ordinance, and that its obligation did not cease when it furnished power to the city's connection. Held that, regardless of the question of whose duty it was to furnish appliances to prevent the waste of electricity, plaintiff could not recover for electricity used in the defendant city's street lighting system during the daytime on the theory that its use created an implication that the service was performed at the instance and request of the city.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by the Tuolumne Electric Power & Light Company against the City of Sonora. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Curtin, of Sonora, and W. H. Mahony, of San Francisco, for appellant. J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for the recovery of the sum of $2,425.37 for electrical energy claimed to have been furnished by plaintiff and consumed by defendant in the street lights of said city. For years plaintiff, which is a public service corporation purchasing its electricity from the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company and then selling it to consumers, has been engaged in furnishing electrical energy for lighting dwellings, business places, and the streets in said city of Sonora. From its substation along the side of Washington street, the main street of said city, for more than 10 years prior to October 1, 1913, the plaintiff had two main power lines, and to these other lines extending along the sides of the other streets were attached, thus forming the system by which electric lights were furnished for houses and streets. During these years one of these main lines from the substation carried what is called the day circuit current of 24 hours, the other, what is called the night circuit current, both of which currents were turned on and off at said substation. The night circuit was loaded one-half hour after sunset and turned off one-half hour before sunrise, this period being recognized generally as the standard hours for street lighting, and the day circuit was left continuously turned on so as to have 24 hours always of continuous service on that line. More than 10 years prior to October 1, 1913, the trustees of said city, for the purpose of lighting the streets, caused wires from the center of the street to be connected with plaintiff's night service main line; an incandescent light being attached to the end of each of these wires. The light was anchored on the opposite side of the street so that each light would be suspended over the middle of the street at a given height. By this method most of the streets were lighted during this period of time, and all street lights were connected with and received current from plaintiff's night circuit line. During this period the city of Sonora owned all of the wires extending from plaintiff's main night service line into the streets, and also owned all bracket street lamps. When the street-lighting system was constructed, no automatic switches or devices of any kind were connected therewith or constructed thereon, so as to turn on or off independent of other consumers' hours, any of the street lights, the entire street-lighting system being regulated as to that by a switch at said substation, controlled and operated by the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company. As the electric current flowed through the said main night circuit line, it ran out into the street lamps and bracket lamps, and thus the streets were lighted.

With knowledge of these facts, and without any previous notice to plaintiff, the trustees of Sonora on September 15, 1913, adopted and passed to print, to take effect on October 1, 1913, the ordinance in controversy here, which appears in full in the transcript. The title of said ordinance is:

"An ordinance fixing the rate which may be charged and collected by any person, firm or corporation furnishing, distributing or delivering electric current for lighting, heating, power and other purposes to the inhabitants of the city of Sonora, California, providing for the installation of meters and regulating the installation of electric current and prices to be charged for labor and supplies therefor, and fixing a penalty for the violation of any of the provisions of the ordinance."

Section 11 provided:

"Electric current furnished or distributed to consumers in the city of Sonora, except for street lights, shall be an all day and all night service, and shall be furnished every day for twenty-four hours each day, and electric current furnished for street lighting shall be from 4:30 p. m. of each and every day to 7 o'clock a. m. of the following morning."

This section, it may be said, was amended on the 18th of June, 1914, so as to read:

"Electric current furnished or distributed to consumers in the city of Sonora, except for street lights, shall be an all day and all night service and shall be furnished every day for twenty-four hours each day, and electric current furnished for street lighting shall be from one-half hour after sunset to one hour before sunrise each night."

When plaintiff saw the publication of this ordinance of September 15th, it addressed the following letter to said trustees:

"Sonora, Cal., Sept. 25, 1913.

"To the Trustees of the City of Sonora, Sonora, California—Gentlemen: The Tuolumne County Electric Power & Light Company on and after October 1, 1913, will furnish twenty-four hour service to all its customers as required by Ordinance No. 63 of the city of Sonora and in order to so do it will be necessary to leave for said twenty-four hours, power on what is now our night circuit. As all the street lighting apparatus for lighting the city streets is the property of the city, it will be necessary for the trustees of said city to turn off the street lights between 7 a. m. and 4:30 p. m. each day otherwise the power thus used between said hours will be charged for as provided in said ordinance. The obligation of this company ceases when it furnishes power to the city's connection. * * *

The street lights were not turned off, and the city of Sonora enjoyed the unique and illuminating experience of street lamps burning day and night. In passing it may not be amiss to venture the conjecture that strangers must have regarded with some degree of astonishment, if not of admiration, the spectacle of prodigality thereby exhibited.

Plaintiff presented its bill for the whole amount of electric energy consumed by said lights, and it was allowed for the said hours so contemplated by said section 11. Plaintiff declined to accept such payment in full, and hence the suit.

Appellant contends in the first place that:

"The * * * duty of such a corporation is fully performed when it has brought its commodity safely and conveniently to the door of the consumer. Within that door the company is not by law obliged and may not by law be compelled to go for any purpose foreign to the public service it is called upon to render, and that the purpose here contemplated is foreign is abundantly established." Ex parte Goodrich, 160 Cal. 418, 117 Pac. 456, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 56.

It is argued that, if the light company desired to raise or lower the lights from their present height across the street, it would have no right or power to do so, because the lights and wiring connected with the same belong to the city. So, if the company desired to put a longer wire from its main wire to the street lamps, it would have no right to do so for the same reason. It would also have no right to put new lamps on the streets in place of the old ones, or in any manner to interfere with the city's street lamps. These circumstances are mentioned to illustrate appellant's contention that it has done its full duty when it turns on its electrical energy in the main lines to which the city street lamps are connected, and that then it "has brought its commodity safely and conveniently to the door of the consumer and beyond that the company is not by law obliged and may not be by law compelled to go."

Again it is claimed that, since the city of Sonora is a consumer of electrical energy, the same rule of law will control it as would control a private individual, and herein is cited Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 70, 84 Pac. 761, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847, wherein is quoted the following from Touchard v. Touchard, 5 Cal. 307:

"A corporation, both by the civil and common law, is a person, an artificial person; and, although a municipal corporation has delegated to it certain powers of government, it is only in reference to those delegated powers that it will be regarded as a government. In reference to all other of its transactions, such as affect its ownership of property in buying, selling, or granting, and in reference to all matters of contract, it must be looked upon and treated as a private person, and its contracts construed in the same manner and with like effect as those of natural persons."

Lastly, it is claimed that when the "company loaded its electrical energy in its main night service line for the 24 hours required, and to which line the city more than 10 years ago attached its street lamp wires," it had done all that could be required of it and then it "became the duty of the city to take care that it used only so much of that commodity as it required for street-lighting purposes, and not permit any that had entered its door to go to waste and to prevent any waste, if it was necessary, to attach or furnish any appliance to turn on or off the 'commodity' when not required." It is insisted that the duty to so attach and furnish said appliance devolved upon the city, and not upon the company. As authority for this proposition attention is directed to Hunt v. Marianna Electric Co., 114 Ark. 498, 170 S. W. 96, L. R. A. 1915B, 897, wherein it appears that said company for several years had been operating a system or plant in which the generator of electricity produced what is known as "133-cycle current of electricity," and plaintiffs had installed motors and machines for conducting their business adapted to this cycle system, that the said company was proceeding to change the kind and character of machinery operated by them into what is termed a "60-cycle system," so that it would not operate the motors used by plaintiffs and the citizens generally, and that the company was demanding of the users of its electricity that they bear the expense of the readjustment and repairs to their various motors so that they could be operated. It appears further that plaintiffs had demanded of the company to readjust said motors for said purpose to the end that the company might carry out its contract and agreement with them and the public to properly serve electricity, but that the company refused to do so, and was proceeding to change its system to the great injury of plaintiffs. It was held that the company was not bound at its own expense to alter the consumers' fixtures so that they would be adapted to the use of the new current, even though many of the fixtures had been bought from the company and were suitable only for the current formerly furnished; it appearing that the change was not made capriciously. The court said:

"In our judgment, it not having been alleged that the change was needlessly or capriciously made, we think this expense should be borne by the plaintiffs. Otherwise, having become a part of the operating expense of the company, this would be an item to be considered in fixing the rates to be charged all consumers of electricity, and would be an expense to be borne at least by the public generally, rather than by those owners who were required to supply themselves with new appliances."

It is contended that the rule applies with stronger force here for the reason that plaintiff did not change its system "of its own volition from night service to day service of 24 hours. The light company here was compelled to turn in 24 hours of load on what it theretofore had only loaded from one-half hour after sunset to one-half hour before sunrise, and if it failed to do so it was guilty of misdemeanor and subject to a fine." And the claim is that the trustees knew that if they did not put in some device to turn off the current, the lights would burn for 24 hours, and hence arises the responsibility of the city for the whole amount consumed.

It is also claimed that from the showing made the inference must be drawn that the whole amount was furnished upon the demand and at the instance and request of defendant city. In this connection some authorities are cited, among them Babbitt v. Chicago & A. Ry. Co., 149 Mo. App. 449, 130 S. W. 367; Abbot's Trial Evidence, 358, and S. F. Gas Co. v. San Francisco, 9 Cal. 453. In the first it is said:

"It has * * * been held that the specific word 'demand' need not be used in making such a * * * request; but it is sufficient if any words are used which are understood by both parties to be a demand. Furthermore, it has been held that the existence of a demand may be shown by circumstantial evidence, or may be inferred from acts and declarations of the parties as proven by direct evidence."

In the second it is declared:

"In general, there must be evidence that the defendant requested plaintiff to render the service, or assented to receiving their benefit, under circumstances negating any presumption that they would be gratuitous. The evidence usually consists in: First, an express request precedent to the service; or, second, circumstances justifying the inference that plaintiff in rendering the services expected to be paid, and defendants supposed or had reason to suppose and ought to have supposed that he was expecting pay, and still allowed him to go on in the service without doing anything to disabuse him of this expectation; or, third, proof of benefit received, not on an agreement that it was gratuitous and followed by an express promise to pay."

In the S. F. Gas Co. Case, supra, it is held that:

"Under some circumstances, a municipal corporation may become liable by implication. The obligation to do justice rests equally upon it as upon an individual. It cannot avail itself of the property or labor of a party, and screen itself from responsibility under the plea that it never passed an ordinance on the subject. As against individuals, the law implies a promise to pay in such cases, and the implication extends equally against corporations."

Thus far it would seem that the case for appellant is very persuasive, as it appears that it furnished the electric energy, and that it was used by respondent, and the implication would arise that it was furnished at the instance and request of said respondent, although attention is called to no direct evidence to that effect.

Another feature, however, is injected into the situation through the action taken by the council when it received the said written notification from appellant that it would furnish electricity for the entire 24 hours and hold respondent liable for it. To that communication the city replied as follows:

"Sonora, Cal., Sept. 27, 1913.

"Tuolumne Co. Elec. Power & Lt. Co., Sonora, California—Gentlemen: In reply to your communication of the 25th inst. the board of trustees of the city of Sonora desire to inform you that the ordinance of the city of Sonora, being Ordinance No. 63, requires any person, firm or corporation supplying electric current for consumption in the city of Sonora for street lighting only from 4:30 o'clock p. m. to 7 o'clock a. m. the following morning, and it requires any person, firm or corporation engaged in that business in the city of Sonora to so furnish electric current for the purpose of lighting the streets, and it prohibits any charge to be made for any electricity furnished in excess of the amount required. See Section 4 of said ordinance. The obligation of such company is to furnish and supply electricity in the manner required by the ordinance and at the times required and its obligation does not cease merely when it furnishes power to the city's connection. The city will pay for electricity furnished at the time and in the manner provided for in said ordinance and not otherwise, as long as said ordinance remains in effect. Any electric current furnished other than that required by ordinance, unless specifically requested by proper authorities, will not be paid for by the city of Sonora, but must be furnished, if at all, without charge to the city of Sonora. The lighting company is required to equip its system to comply with the requirements of the ordinance. The city does not want street lights at other times than required by the ordinance and is not required to turn off the lights."

The foundation of appellant's cause of action is thus swept away. The theory to which appellant's claim is anchored embodied in the allegations of the complaint is that the electricity was furnished at the instance and request of respondent, and to prove this there must be some evidence either direct or circumstantial that defendant "requested plaintiff to perform the services or assented to receiving their benefit under circumstances negating any presumption that they were to be gratuitous." In other words, the party to be charged must either directly authorize the services or by his declarations or silence he must acquiesce in the action of the one performing and avail himself of the services performed. Here there was neither express promise nor acquiescence, nor was there conduct by silence or otherwise on the part of the city that would justify any expectation that the city would pay for the additional service that was not demanded in said ordinance. To the contrary, the city, by the terms of said ordinance, requested and demanded that the energy be furnished for street lighting during certain hours only, but it went still further and notified appellant by letter that it did not want any longer service, that it had no use for it, and that, if it was furnished, it would not pay for it, but it must be furnished gratuitously. If, in the face of this repudiation of any contractual relation as to the extra electricity, the company persisted in allowing the current to flow into the city's lines during the entire 24 hours, it certainly cannot claim that it was done "at the instance and request" of respondent.

No case cited by appellant is parallel to this in this essential feature. As we have already intimated, if the city had used said electric energy and remained silent as to remuneration, an altogether different situation would be presented. In such case the law as well as principles of equitable dealings would create the implication that the service was performed at the instance and request of the city. Assuredly it is not true, as alleged in the complaint, that "plaintiff herein at the special instance and request of defendant has furnished and delivered electrical energy" during the entire period.

Again, it cannot be said in any proper sense that said electrical energy was used by the city during the additional hours already referred to. It answered no municipal purpose. It was well known that the city desired the electricity for lighting the streets, and there was, of course, no such need during the daytime. Instead of being used during said hours, it was simply allowed to go to waste. It was of no benefit whatever to the city, and it is true, as found by the court:

"That the defendant has never at any time mentioned in plaintiff's complaint had any use whatever for electricity for lighting its streets in the daytime and never at any of said times purchased or procured and accepted electricity from plaintiff for such use, and plaintiff has never at any of said times, at defendant's request, furnished or delivered any electric energy for street lights in the daytime."

It is true that until the said ordinance was amended the city demanded electricity for a portion of the day, but there is no controversy as to that.

It seems clear that the plaintiff utterly failed to make out its case as presented by its complaint. As far as this action is concerned, it seems immaterial as to whose duty it was to furnish appliances to prevent the waste of electrical energy. If appellant is right in its contention that such burden should be borne by the city, then probably an action for damages would lie for its failure to prevent the waste, but in view of the undisputed showing we do not see how it can be held that an action on contract can be maintained by plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Nancy Shellman and A. J. Shellman, her husband, against Ella L. Hershey, L. Henry, and F. A. Giese and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants Henry and Giese appeal. Affirmed.

E. M. Rosenthal, of San Jose, for appellants. A. C. Huston and H. L. Huston, of Woodland, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an appeal by defendants Henry and Giese from the judgment in the case of like title, No. 1568, 161 Pac. 132, this day decided and is here on the judgment roll alone. The only question presented arises on a general demurrer.

[1, 2] The complaint alleged ownership of the premises in defendants, the Hersheys; that defendants Henry and Giese on the day of the accident were lessees of the premises; that the premises are a public place of amusement let for hire; describes what was claimed to constitute the nuisance complained of; that the theater on the day mentioned was leased to defendants Henry and Giese; that said nuisance existed in the theater prior to the letting to Henry and Giese and at the time of the accident, and describes fully the accident and alleges amount of damages.

We think a cause of action was sufficiently stated against these appellants. There was no special demurrer. The case was fully tried on all issues. It must be assumed, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, "that the evidence presented in support of the findings was competent to establish the facts alleged, and was received at the trial without any objection, and was sufficient to sustain each of the facts found." Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Nancy Shellman and A. J. Shellman, her husband, against Ella L. Hershey and others of that name, and other defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, the Hersheys appeal. Order reversed, and a new trial granted as to the defendants Hershey.

Black & Clark, of San Francisco, for appellants. A. C. Huston and H. L. Huston, both of Woodland, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action commenced by plaintiffs to recover damages for an injury suffered by plaintiff Nancy Shellman in passing out through a doorway of the Woodland Opera House owned by defendants, the Hersheys, and under lease to defendants Henry and Giese. The cause was tried by the court without the aid of a jury, and plaintiff had judgment for $2,000, and costs of suit.

Defendants, the Hersheys, moved for a new trial, which was denied. They appeal from the order. Defendants Henry and Giese appeal from the judgment on a separate transcript No. 1569 (161 Pac. 132), but do not appeal from the order.

The Woodland Opera House is situated on Second street of the city of Woodland. The main entrance and exit of the auditorium is on Second street at the southeast corner of the building. Along the east wall opening into the auditorium, about midway of the building, is a door opening from the dress circle. It was in stepping out of this door that plaintiff Mrs. Shellman fell and received the injury of which she complains. The interior of the opera house is similar to most playhouses. In the center next to the stage is the parquet; surrounding the parquet by a half circle are the dress circle seats extending back to the rear wall; at the center of the rear wall is an exit door $8\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide leading from the dress circle into the main entrance area; the center aisle passes from this door down through the dress circle and parquet; aisles also lead from this door along the south, east, and west walls down to the stage. The defendants, the Hersheys, are and have been for many years the owners of this opera house, and at the time of the accident, on the evening of May 29, 1912, it was under lease to defendants Henry and Giese. It had been let by the lessees to the graduating class of the high school of Woodland for an entertainment that evening, for which a rental of \$25 was paid to the lessees. Admission to the entertainment was free and the house was crowded with spectators, many standing in the aisles for lack of seating capacity. It is alleged in the complaint: "that the entrance to said opera house is on Second street in the city of Woodland; that said opera house is so constructed that a door bearing the same relative position to the entrance leads onto Second street from the main auditorium of the theater; that said door is built 3 feet above the sidewalk on Second street; that during all times herein mentioned, there was no light over said door, and said door was not protected or guarded in any way, or at all; that said door as built and situated in said theater is unsafe, insecure, and dangerous to the patrons of said theater; that on the 29th day of May, 1912, said theater or opera house was leased to L. Henry and F. A. Giese, but said door was in said building and was so built and located, and was not connected with the sidewalk by any steps or otherwise, or at all, and was not protected or guarded as above described, and was an unsafe and insecure and a dangerous passageway as above described, prior to the leasing of said opera house to said L. Henry and F. A. Giese; that said owners had during all of the times herein mentioned full knowledge of the unsafe, insecure, and dangerous character of said door, and negligently permitted it to remain in such condition, and failed to properly or at all to safeguard it; that on the evening of the 29th day of May, 1912, plaintiff Nancy Shellman, above named, attended a public entertainment at said opera house; that during said performance the above-described door was left open; that at the close of said performance, as the spectators were leaving the building, plaintiff Nancy Shellman, believing that said door was an exit from said theater, walked through said door and was violently precipitated upon the sidewalk; that at the time said plaintiff walked through said door it was unguarded and unprotected, and there was nothing about said door to warn plaintiff of its dangerous or unsafe character; that by reason of said fall, the left arm of plaintiff Nancy Shellman was broken at the elbow; that the bones in said elbow were broken in such a way that they could not and did not properly mend; that said elbow is now stiff; that she was otherwise injured as set forth in much detail.

In their answer, "defendants deny that said door was constructed for use as an entrance or exit or that it was in any manner necessary" for such use, or that defendants or either of them directed or sanctioned the use of said door as an entrance or exit in the use of said opera house; "admit that said door was not connected with the sidewalk by any steps or otherwise * * * because said door was not an entrance to, or exit from, the said opera house in the use thereof by persons going into, or coming out of, said opera house at the time the same was used for public entertainment;" deny that said door as built is or was unsafe or dangerous or that any act of defendants caused the same to be unsafe or dangerous; deny that on May 29, 1912, or at any other time, defendants had full or any knowledge that said door was unsafe or that they permitted it to remain unsafe; allege that when said opera house was leased to said Henry and Giese, it was never understood that in the management thereof "said doorway should at any time be or remain open as a means of entrance or exit * * * for the use of persons going into or leaving the same"; "that on the occasion of giving said entertainment and after the audience was assembled, some person, whose name cannot be ascertained, requested one Robert Eastham, who at said time was employed by said L. H. Henry and F. A. Giesea, lessees of said opera house, to unlock said door; that said Eastham did thereupon, and pursuant to said request, unlock and open said door and allowed the same to remain open, but all without authority, consent, or knowledge of defendants hereby answering, or either of them;" that said plaintiff Mrs. Shellman entered said opera house without any charge therefor and voluntarily; that the injury suffered by her in leaving said entertainment was caused by her own negligence "in an effort to leave said opera house speedily and by an unusual means and by stepping out of the doorway mentioned in the complaint, which said doorway could be plainly observed; * * * and if the said Nancy Shellman suffered the injuries mentioned in the complaint, they were the direct result of her negligent and careless conduct in so endeavoring to leave said opera house."

The findings of the court are substantially in accord with the averments of the complaint, and are challenged by defendants as not supported by the evidence. A diagram was introduced showing the sidewalk elevation along Second street. "It shows the sill elevation and floor elevation of the door; in front of that door there is a concrete sidewalk; it is 2 feet 5 inches from the sidewalk to the sill of the door; it is 9 inches from the sill of the door to the floor of the opera house. There is no step between the sill and the sidewalk. The door is 7 feet 4 inches by 3 feet 4 inches. The door opens outward into the street."

Plaintiff Mrs. Shellman testified as follows:

"I went to the opera house that evening by going up the front steps, the wide steps, on Second street, and I went down into the lower floor of the opera house, walked around the wall, down to the door. I walked around there; there were no seats, so I stood up there until the entertainment was over. There were a great many that did stand up. There wasn't seats. I was standing near the door, not a great ways from the stage, a yard or so from the door. The door was open all the time. I think people were going out there, that is why I stepped out. I thought they were going out there. There was several in between the door and myself where I stood, and that is why I stepped out there. I thought I could step out there. The floor in the opera house inclines towards the rear. It seemed to me it was much lower there as I went down the side of it, it seemed so much lower that I could step right out on the sidewalk, that is why I stepped out. I thought I could step onto the sidewalk. The Court: Did you see the sidewalk when you stepped down? A. No, sir. Q. It was dark? A. Yes. Q. You looked out from a light room into the dark street? A. Yes, there was no light there as far as I could see, but I supposed I could step right onto the sidewalk. Mr. Huston: State whether or not there was anything there to prevent you from going out. A. No, sir; nothing there and nobody to tell me; nobody guarded the door. Q. The door was not guarded in any way? A. No, sir. Q. State whether or not the door was standing open or closed. A. Yes, it was standing open. The Court: Was that a warm night? A. Yes, sir; it was warm the 29th of May; it was very pleasant and warm. Mr. Huston: When was the first time you noticed the door was open? A. It was open all the time, I think, during the entertainment. Q. Just state to the court how that door or opening looked to you that night. A. Well, it looked to me like a door right down near the sidewalk that I could step right out and without any harm, of course, or I wouldn't have stepped out. Mr. Huston: That is all."

On cross-examination, she testified:

That she had been at the theater twice before, and both times had entered and left by the main entrance, and did not see the other door on those occasions. "There was no light in front of the door through which I stepped. There was no light only on the inside; the lights were inside the house. Q. Had there been a light at that exit or doorway through which you went the night you hurt your arm would you have been able to see whether there was or was not a step there, or would you have been able to see how far the sidewalk was from the door sill? A. Yes, I think I could have seen if there had been a light there. Mr. Clark: But you are rather emphatically of the opinion that there was no light there? A. Yes, sir. Q. You are a lady 67 years of age you stated? A. Yes, sir. Q. And in stepping through an exit that you never went through before you paid some attention to where you were stepping, you looked before you as you walked, didn't you, to that exit? A. Why, I walked to the door and just stepped; I just stepped through; I thought it was right onto the sidewalk of course, or I wouldn't have stepped through. Q. You were looking out of that doorway as you came to the doorway? A. Yes, I was looking out; I just started and went to that door and just stepped right through thinking I could step right onto the sidewalk. Q. Did you pay attention to where you were stepping? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you endeavor as you went through the door to look to see whether you were stepping safely towards the sidewalk? A. I had no thought that it wasn't safe."

Witness Eastham was the lessee's manager in charge of the theater at the time of the accident. He testified that he had the key to the door referred to and opened it and left it open during the entertainment. He testified:

"It was very warm that night, and it was very warm in there and oppressive, and some one came and asked me to open the door; some one requested me, that there was a lot of ladies there about to faint, but who it was I don't remember; so I unlocked the door, but not for an exit. Q. You had been manager of the opera house for some time? A. Yes."

He testified that it was not any one of defendants who made the request; that he had charge of the theater for Henry and Giesea and let the theater to the board of education and collected the rental for the lessees who had the theater for 1911 and 1912. The lease bears date August 26, 1910, and was executed by "Ella L. Hershey and Cornelia A. Hershey, executrices of the last will and testament of D. N. Hershey, deceased, the parties of the first part." It was admitted that when the lease was made, the defendants Hersheys owned the opera house, and that witness Eastham had been in charge of the opera house three seasons under other tenants before the lease to Henry and Giesea was executed, and had the key in his possession all the time. He testified that this particular door was used occasionally "to sweep some of the dirt out that way or take something in that way, but was never used as an exit or entrance"; that while he had charge "there was no box or step leading to that door whereby a person could step into that from the outside"; that he had no instructions from the lessees with reference to that door; that the Hersheys never gave him any instructions about that door; that it was locked that night before the witness opened it, and was always kept locked during entertainments; that he had been acquainted with the building since its construction, and there never had been any step placed at that door, and that to make use of it as an exit or entrance a step would have been necessary.

Witness Clary was asked whether, during the time he was city marshal, the city trustees ever gave him any instructions in reference to the opera house. Over objection, the court allowed the answer if "connected with the defendants in some way." Answering "yes," the witness was asked what the directions were. "A. Well, the board ordered me to notify them that they had to repair the sidewalk, and fix the step for a kind of fire escape there." Defendants' counsel moved to strike out the answer as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent. Motion denied. "Mr. Huston: The step you mention was in reference to this door at the opera house? A. Yes, sir. Q. In obedience to these instructions, did you notify the defendants Hershey concerning this condition?" Over defendants' objection, the court allowed the answer: "A. I know that I told Mr. Webber, and I don't know but I think I wrote them a notice. Mr. Huston: To whom did you address your notice? A. To Mrs. Hershey." An objection was allowed to precede the answer on the same grounds, and that it is not the best evidence. "The Court: The objection will be sustained unless it is connected, but for the present it will be overruled. Mr. Huston: You mailed this notice in the regular course of business? A. Yes, sir. Q. You also notified Mr. Webber? A. Yes, sir. Q. What connection, if any, did Mr. Webber have with this opera house? A. He was manager. Q. He had charge of it? A. Yes, sir. Q. What, if anything, did they do in reference to this notice that you gave them? Mr. Clark: Our objection is going to this. The Court: Same ruling. A. Put a box there for a step. Mr. Huston: At this same door? A. Yes, put a box on the sidewalk at that door. Q. When was that? A. That was after I told Mr. Webber, they put it there for a step." He testified that this was in 1909 while he was marshal, and that his term expired in 1910. Defendants' attorneys moved to strike out all the testimony of Clary on various grounds: that no foundation was laid for it; nothing to connect the Hersheys with the transaction, and other grounds. "Mr. Huston: Mr. Clary, you put that letter in the post office at Woodland? A. Sure. Q. Mrs. Hershey lives in the city of Woodland? A. Lives in Woodland. Mr. Huston: This proof is offered in furtherance of our allegation in the complaint to the effect that the defendants Hershey had prior knowledge and actual knowledge of this door and its dangerous condition prior to the time of the accident. The Court: It doesn't appear who this man Webber is. Mr. Huston: Mr. Clary says he was the manager of the opera house. The Court: You say you told Mr. Webber this? A. Yes, I told him. The Court: The motion to strike out is denied."

Recalled as a witness for defendants, he testified:

"I know the side door of the opera house was never used as an exit or as an entrance. I have been there in the opera house at performances. I have been there when people were going in and out."

Witness Curson, a city trustee from 1907 to 1911, testified that Clary was night watchman up to the time he was appointed marshal, and that during that time "the board gave him directions to enforce some matters that the building committee of the board was asked to look into regarding fire escapes, etc., and the protection of the building, and I think Mr. Clary was authorized to notify the owners of the building that such steps were necessary for the protection of the public at large in regard to fire escapes," etc.

Witness Eastham was recalled as a witness for defendants. He testified that he received the keys to the theater from Mr. Farrell, president of the Great Western Theatrical Circuit and was employed by him and was the only manager of the opera house from that time; that the Farrell lease was made on August 1, 1908, and continued until Henry and Gieseck took the theater; that "Mr. Webber had nothing to do during that time with the booking of the shows or attending to that opera house"; that Webber was employed at one time as manager, previous to Mr. Farrell's time. He testified that he had known the opera house ever since it was built, and that in using it "the entrance and exit to that lower auditorium for performance purposes has been through the main entrance over at the south wall."

Defendant Cornelia Hershey testified that she and her mother acted for the others of the family in leasing the theater; that they got some notice about fixing the sidewalk in 1912 which was attended to, and the work done, but that she had been unable to find among their papers any notice sent them by Mr. Clary relative to that side door; that she knew there was no step there, and that it was in that condition when they took the premises and when they leased them to tenants; that no step was ever maintained there and the door had never "been used as an exit or entrance to the opera house down to the time of this accident." She testified that she and her mother, as executrices, leased the opera house to the Great Western Theatrical Circuit, August 1, 1908, and that Mr. Eastham acted as manager. She testified that she never got any notice from Mr. Clary telling them to put steps at that central side door; that she "got a notice from Mr. Scott regarding the fixing of the sidewalk in 1912," and it was done; that she had made it a practice to keep all papers served upon them and had searched the files, but could find no notice from Mr. Clary relative to that side door.

[1] We do not think there can be any doubt of the lessee's liability. They, through their agent and manager, opened the door in question and left it open under circumstances such as would and did lead the plaintiff Mrs. Shellman to believe that she could safely pass out at that door. Although this door was not used or intended to be used as an exit or entrance, the tenants are chargeable with knowledge that in opening and leaving it open, unguarded, and unlighted, with no step to aid a person in reaching the pavement, the passage out by that door was dangerous and unsafe. This situation was one of their own creation for which upon well-settled principles they were liable.

[2] A much more serious question arises as to the owners' liability. They knew that this door had no step leading from it to the sidewalk; they knew this when they leased the premises to their codefendants, for it was in the same condition it had been in ever since they inherited the property in 1903 at the death of the original owner. But the uncontradicted testimony was that this particular door was not intended for use as an exit or entrance for patrons of the theater and had never been used for that purpose in all the years of defendants' ownership. The only use to which it had ever been put was "only occasionally to sweep some of the dirt out that way or to take something in that way, but it was never used as an exit" and it was "always kept locked." Defendants the Hersheys, had never given any directions concerning this door and personally had nothing to do with the management of the theater. Their liability must spring, if at all, from the single fact that they knew the location of this door and also knew that no step or steps had been placed there.

Witness Clary's testimony that he "mailed notice to Mrs. Hershey," that he "deposited it in the post office at Woodland," does not meet the statutory requirements of such form of service, and at most would be but prima facie evidence which was rebutted by the testimony of Cornelia Hershey that no such notice was received. His testimony that he served the notice when city marshal was disproved by the record showing that in 1909 when he said he served the notice, he was not the city marshal. He was night watchman, however, and he was no doubt honestly mistaken as to when he became city marshal. If he served the notice in either capacity, it would be equally effective, but the proof of service is insufficient.

As to his having notified Webber, this may be taken as established. But Webber was not then the manager. Eastham was manager under the then lessees, Farrell's Company. But, assuming that such notice was given to the Hersheys while the theater was under lease to the Farrell Company, it would have conveyed no new fact to the Hersheys for they admit that there never had been a step placed at this door. Their defense is that this door was not intended to be used and never was used for the convenience of patrons to the theater, and was intended for the use of and used only by the lessees to take in and out stage properties, and was used occasionally to sweep dirt through or to air the house, but never as an exit or entrance for patrons or during performances.

Respondent relies upon the rule stated in note E to the case of Griffin v. Jackson Light & Power Co., 92 Am. St. Rep. p. 526:

"No person can create or maintain a nuisance upon his premises and escape liability for the injury occasioned by it to third persons. Nor can a lessor so create a nuisance and then escape liability for the consequences by leasing the premises to a tenant. Prior to and at the time of the lease, it was the duty of the lessor to put an end to the nuisance. If he fails to do this, and leases the premises with the nuisance on them, he may be deemed, and is deemed, to authorize the continuance of the nuisance, and is therefore liable for the consequences of such continuance. Whether, therefore, the defect be one of original construction, or arises from a failure to repair, or from the maintenance on the premises of any condition endangering the health or safety of strangers, whatever its nature, if it constitute a nuisance, the lessor will be responsible for its consequences if he leases the premises with the nuisance upon them, and thus authorizes its continuance."

Among the cases cited in support of the text is Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 593, 11 Pac. 346, 58 Am. Rep. 568, in which injury arose from an awning falling upon a person while passing under it. The tenant of the premises allowed the awning to be used by sightseers going upon it, thus causing it to fall. It was not built or intended for such use, but only as a cover for the sidewalk from sunshine and rain, and was properly constructed for that purpose. The lessor was held free from liability for the injury. Said the court:

"It is well settled that a landlord is not liable for such consequences, unless: (1) The nuisance occasioning the injury existed at the time the premises were demised; or (2) the structure was in such a condition that it would be likely to become a nuisance, in the ordinary and reasonable use of the same for the purpose for which it was constructed and let, and the landlord failed to repair it (citing cases); or (3) the landlord authorized or permitted the act which caused it to become a nuisance occasioning the injury."

Quoting from Gandy v. Jubber, 5 Best & Smith, 485:

"To bring liability home to the owner the premises being let, the nuisance must be one which was in its very essence and nature a nuisance at the time of letting, and not something which was capable of being thereafter rendered a nuisance by the tenant. * * *"

In notes B and C (at page 524) to the case from which respondents extract note E, supra, in 92 Am. St. Rep., the liability of the lessor of real property to third persons is considered. Note B points out the nonliability of the lessor to third persons for injuries arising from a nuisance not on the premises at the time of the lease, but which was erected or created by the tenant alone without the license or consent of the lessor. Note C is as follows:

"The same considerations control where the nuisance is occasioned by a misuse by the lessee of the premises, or of appliances which were thereon at the time of the lease. It is not sufficient to render a lessor liable that the premises leased by him are capable of a use which will prove a nuisance to strangers. 3. 'If a landlord demise premises which are not in themselves a nuisance, but may or may not become such, according to the manner in which they are used by the tenant, the landlord will not be liable for a nuisance created on the premises by the tenant. He is not responsible for enabling the tenant to commit a nuisance if the latter should think proper to do so. [Citing cases.] In such a case it may be said, in one sense, that the landlord permitted the tenant to create the nuisance, but not in such a sense as to render him liable. [Citing cases.] The landlord will not be liable for the use of the premises in such a way as to do harm, merely because there was a manifest possibility of their being used in such a way.' [Citing cases.] * * * Where, therefore, the premises, while capable of improper use, may be used in an ordinary manner without the creation of a nuisance, the lessor is not chargeable with the improper uses of them by the tenant which results in a nuisance. [Citing cases.]"

In Owings v. Jones, 9 Md. 108, the court, referring to Rich v. Basterfield, 4 Manning, Granger & Scott, 56 Eng. Com. Law, 784, said:

"After a full review of all the cases, and that too after a second argument, we understand the court to deduce, at least, the two following principles from the numerous adjudications to which reference is had: First, that where property is demised, and at the time of the demise is not a nuisance, and becomes so only by the act of the tenant while in his possession, and injury happen during such possession, the owner is not liable; but, second, that where the owner leases premises which are a nuisance, or must in the nature of things become so by their user, and receives rent, then, whether in or out of possession, he is liable."

Further reference to authorities seems unnecessary. We think it results from the principles above stated that the only question here is: Was this side door to the theater a nuisance when the premises were leased to defendants Henry and Glesea, or did it become such for the time being when the tenants used it for a purpose other than that for which it was designed and had, from the day the house was built, been used to the moment the present tenant misused it? We think the premises were not a nuisance when demised and became so because of the manner in which the tenants used them on the night of the accident. It follows that the defendants, the Hersheys, are not liable for the injury complained of.

It is not necessary to consider any of the other alleged errors.

The order is reversed, and a new trial granted as to defendants, the Hersheys.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

WESTERN NAT. BANK v. WITTMAN et al.
(Civ. 1291.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 4, 1916.)

1. CORPORATIONS ⇨426(1) — NOTE — RESOLUTION—RATIFICATION.

Where the note of a corporation was authorized by the unanimous vote of its directors and was executed according to the vote or resolution and the money derived from the loan was placed to its checking account and was used by it to pay an obligation assumed by it, no ratification of the note was necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1596, 1702; Dec. Dig. ⇨426(1).]

2. GUARANTY ⇨78(1) — LIABILITY OF GUARANTOR—DEFENSES.

The vice president of a corporation, and the indorser and guarantor of its note in his individual capacity, would not be heard to defend on the ground that the note was contrary to public policy under Civ. Code, § 2228 et seq., relating to the obligations of trustees, and declaring that in all matters connected with his trust a trustee is bound to act in the highest good faith toward his beneficiary, and may not obtain any advantage by misrepresentation, concealment, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. ⇨78(1).]

3. CORPORATIONS ⇨465—NOTES—CONSIDERATION—CORPORATION.

Where a corporation executed its note, there was a consideration, where the money received for the note was subsequently used to pay its obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1822–1826; Dec. Dig. ⇨465.]

4. CONTRACTS ⇨88—PRESUMPTION—CONSIDERATION.

A presumption of consideration arises where an obligation is in writing.

5. CORPORATIONS ⇨382—NOTE—ULTRA VIRES.

A corporation empowered by its articles of incorporation to manufacture and deal in harnesses, etc., and to borrow and loan money, might assume the obligation of one who conveyed his property to it for purposes of such business, so that its note, given to obtain money to discharge such obligation, was not ultra vires.

7. GUARANTY ⇨49—RELEASE OF GUARANTOR.

The vice president of a corporation, an indorser and guarantor of its note to plaintiff in his individual capacity, was not released by an arrangement by which the president was to manage its business and pay its obligations out of the earnings, where no time for payment was fixed and no extension given by the creditors, and no consideration passed to plaintiff for the agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the Western National Bank against George W. Wittman, J. G. Leibold, and the California Vehicle & Harness Company. Judgment for plaintiff against defendants Wittman and Leibold. Wittman's motion for a new trial was denied, and he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, for appellant. Gavin McNab, B. M. Aikins, A. H. Jarman, and W. F. Williamson, all of San Francisco, for respondent Western Nat. Bank. J. J. Lermen, of San Francisco, for respondents Leibold and California Vehicle & Harness Co.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff commenced the action by verified complaint to recover the balance due on a certain promissory note. Judgment went against defendants Geo. W. Wittman and J. G. Leibold for the sum of $7,076.82, with interest from date of the judgment and costs. Defendant vehicle company, maker of the note, did not answer. The appeal is from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial by defendant Wittman alone. The promissory note in suit reads as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal., March 30, 1907.

"One day after date, for value received, California Vehicle & Harness Co., a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the state of California, promises to pay to the Western National Bank of San Francisco, likewise a corporation, or order, at its banking house in this city, the sum of nine thousand 00/100 dollars in United States gold coin of the present standard, with interest thereon in like coin from date until paid, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, said interest to be paid monthly, and if not so paid to be added to the principal and thereafter bear interest at the same rate. Should default be made in the payment of interest as herein provided, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall immediately become due and payable.

[Signed] J. G. Leibold, Pres.

"[Signed] L. Holt, Secy."

On the back of the note is indorsed: "J. G. Leibold and Geo. W. Wittman," and then:

"San Francisco, for value received, we, or either of us, guarantee the payment of the within note and interest according to its terms, and we, or either of us, hereby waive presentation thereof to the maker, demand of payment, protest, and notice of nonpayment.

"[Signed] J. G. Leibold,

"[Signed] Geo. W. Wittman."

Stamped on the back of the note are various sums of interest and principal.

Defendant Leibold in his answer admitted, by not denying, the due execution of the note, the indorsements and guarantee, and that the vehicle company received consideration for its note, but alleged want of consideration passing to him for his indorsement; denied that the whole or any part of said note or interest is now, or ever was, due from this defendant.

Defendant Wittman's answer is of considerable length, a summary of which he states in his brief as follows:

"The answer denies that the corporation defendant executed the note sued on, or that it ever authorized any one to execute that note, and alleges that the note is not, and never was, the note of the corporation defendant. It also denies that either Wittman or Leibold ever indorsed or guaranteed the payment of any note of the corporation defendant. It denies that no part of the principal has been paid, that the whole or any part of the principal or interest is due, owing or unpaid, and that the plaintiff is the owner or holder of the note in question. The answer then sets up as a separate defense that the note is ultra vires and void, because issued by Leibold and his secretary, Laura Holt, to take up a private and personal indebtedness of Leibold to the plaintiff corporation, without authority from or ratification by the board of directors of the defendant corporation, all to the knowledge of the bank. It further sets up, as an additional separate defense, that no consideration for this note ever passed to the corporation defendant. It further sets up, as an additional separate defense, the fraud of the plaintiff and of Leibold in inducing the defendant Wittman to go upon the note, and it further sets up as an additional separate defense, under section 2819 of the Civil Code, the execution of a contract without the consent of the defendant Wittman, he being unindemnified, which contract suspended the plaintiff's rights and remedies against the defendant corporation."

It appeared that prior to March 23, 1907, defendant Leibold was engaged in business in San Francisco under the name of Leibold Harness Company, and was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $9,000, evidenced by Leibold's promissory note. On that day defendant the vehicle company was incorporated by three persons, one of whom was in Leibold's employment. Neither Wittman nor Leibold was then a corporator. After this date and prior to the execution of the note sued upon, Leibold transferred his business to the vehicle company, and the latter assumed all the liabilities of the Leibold Harness Company, including the bank indebtedness of $9,000, and agreed to, and did, issue a block of the stock of the vehicle company to Leibold as consideration for his business. Leibold was then made a director and president of the corporation, and defendant Wittman, having invested some money therein, became a stockholder in and was made vice president of the corporation. Thereafter Leibold, on behalf of the corporation, applied to plaintiff for a loan of $9,000, and was told by an officer of the bank that the corporation would have to execute its note for the loan, which must be indorsed by the principal stockholders. On March 30, 1907, at a meeting of the board of directors of the corporation defendant, held at its office, all directors and the secretary, L. Holt, being present, defendant Wittman offered and defendant Leibold seconded a resolution, which was adopted, authorizing the corporation to borrow from the Western National Bank an amount of money not to exceed at any one time the sum of $9,000, "and that either the president or vice president, together with the secretary or treasurer of this corporation are hereby empowered to execute its promissory note or notes therefor to said Western National Bank of San Francisco, for all such sums so borrowed, upon such terms in respect to amount or rate of interest or otherwise as may be agreed upon." The resolution directed the secretary to deliver to said bank "a copy of these resolutions properly certified by her in evidence of the authority of the persons hereinbefore named to make said loans and execute the notes as above specified." A duly certified copy of this resolution was delivered to plaintiff, the promissory note above set out was also delivered to and accepted by the bank, and the amount, $9,000, placed to the credit of the vehicle corporation, in its regular checking account. Later, on April 3, 1907, the corporation drew its check for $9,000, and paid the note of said Leibold, which had been assumed by the corporation. This note of the corporation is the obligation which appellant Wittman now contends was not authorized or executed by the vehicle corporation, and is the note on which it subsequently paid various sums of both principal and interest, and is the note for the unpaid balance of which this action was brought.

Section 2192 of the Civil Code provides that no other consideration need exist "where a guaranty is entered into at the same time with the original obligation, or with the acceptance of the latter by the guarantee, and forms with that obligation a part of the consideration to him." Section 2806 of the same Code provides that:

"A guaranty is to be deemed unconditional unless its terms import some condition precedent to the liability of the guarantor."

Section 3116 provides that:

"Every indorser of a negotiable instrument, unless his indorsement is qualified, warrants to every subsequent holder thereof, who is not liable thereon to him: First. That it is in all respects what it purports to be. Second. That he has a good title to it. Third. That the signatures of all prior parties are binding upon them." Fourth. That if dishonored, the indorser will pay the same unless exonerated under certain provisions of the Code not here applicable.

Appellant contends that the note sued on is invalid and void for many reasons: (a) Because, though signed by the president and secretary, their acts were never authorized or ratified by the directors or stockholders; (b) because contrary to public policy declared in section 2228 et seq. of the Civil Code; (c) the note is not evidentiary of any consideration flowing from the bank to the vehicle company.

[1] The note in question was authorized by the unanimous vote of the directors. No ratification was necessary. It was executed in strict conformity to the resolution passed by the directors, and the money derived from the loan was placed to the checking account of defendant corporation, and was used in the payment of an obligation assumed by the corporation as part consideration for the business and property conveyed to it by Leibold. As the governing body of the corporation, the directors were the persons, and only persons, who in their official capacity could execute the note.

[2-4] Sued as he was in his individual capacity, and being both an indorser and guarantor of the note in such capacity, appellant will not be heard to do the very things which the Code sections, supra, say he may not do. We can discover no principle of public policy violated in the transaction, nor can we see that there was a failure to show consideration flowing to the vehicle corporation. Aside from the presumption of consideration arising where the obligation is in writing, and aside from the provisions of the Code, supra, there was a consideration, in that the money received for the note was subsequently used to pay an obligation of the corporation. The genuineness of the corporation note was never questioned by the corporation, and is here admitted. The corporation recognized its validity by numerous payments made on the note, and by an acquiescence of several years.

[5, 6] Neither can we see that appellant has established his claim that the note was ultra vires in the sense that it was beyond the power of the directors to bind dissenting stockholders, or of the legal rights of creditors. The articles of incorporation empowered the corporation, among other things:

"1st. To manufacture, buy, sell, import, export and generally deal in all kinds of harness, saddlery * * * and all goods, wares and merchandise," etc. "4th. To borrow and lend money," etc. "6th. To receive, hold, store, buy and sell and generally deal in goods, wares and merchandise of any kind," etc.

The corporation was formed to conduct the same kind of business which, with the property forming part of it, Leibold conveyed to the corporation. There was express authority given by the articles to transact this business, and part of its business was to pay its obligations assumed in consideration for the property it received from Leibold. There were no dissenting stockholders or directors at the time the note was executed, nor for some months thereafter, and there is none now so far as we know, except defendant Wittman, and he it was who moved the resolution authorizing the note to be executed, and who guaranteed its genuineness, and that he would pay it if the corporation did not. Furthermore, Wittman testified that he knew, or supposed, that the note was delivered to the bank; that the corporation received credit for it, and "understood that they took up that old note with this new one."

It was legal for the parties, in forming the corporation, to exchange its stock for the property conveyed to it by Leibold. Turner v. Markham, 155 Cal. 562, 102 Pac. 272. Having taken over the harness business of Leibold for the purpose of conducting it, and having assumed his liabilities connected with that business, it was as much within its power to pay its debts as to conduct the business for which it was formed.

[7] It is further contended that Wittman was discharged by reason of a certain agreement which it is claimed was entered into in February, 1908, between the vehicle corporation, its creditors, and Leibold. This agreement purports to be "between the California Vehicle & Harness Company, a California corporation, party of the first part, and the undersigned creditors of the said corporation, parties of the second part, and J. G. Leibold, of the city and county of San Francisco, California, party of the third part." By its terms, the first party conveyed to the third party the property of the first party in trust to collect the accounts of the corporation, to sell and dispose of the stock of goods on hand, to purchase such additional goods as were necessary for carrying on the said business, to render an account monthly of receipts and disbursements. "As soon as said party of the third part has in his hands sufficient funds wherewith to do so, a dividend of ten (10) per cent. shall be made to each one of the parties of the second part, upon the amount of their respective claims; providing, however, the interest on said claims shall be kept paid according to the terms of the respective existing contracts. * * * This agreement shall be void and of no effect unless the same be executed by all of the creditors of said corporation as the parties of the second part hereto." The court found among other facts, in respect of the agreement:

"That it is not true that during the operation of said agreement the plaintiff's rights, in respect of its original obligation sued on in this action, should cease and become suspended. That it is not true that said agreement was entered into against the will of said defendant Wittman; and in respect to the agreement mentioned and referred to in paragraph 9 of the answer of said defendant Wittman, the court finds that a certain agreement was drawn and was attempted to be executed by said California Vehicle & Harness Company and all its creditors, and that said agreement was signed by plaintiff. That said agreement specifically provided as follows, to wit: [Then follows the clause above quoted requiring all the creditors to sign.] That said agreement was not signed by all of the creditors of said California Vehicle & Harness Co., and said agreement was never executed and did not become operative."

The evidence supported this finding. But it is contended that because plaintiff signed the agreement and received payments claimed by appellant to have been made under this agreement, plaintiff is bound by it. There was evidence that a payment of $900 was made in June, 1908, shown by the indorsement on the note as on account of the principal, and this was exactly 10 per cent. of the face of the note. Whether or not it was received under the agreement did not appear, except by the fact that Leibold paid it to the bank while acting under the agreement, and by the circumstance that it was 10 per cent. of the principal of the note. The only officer of the bank called as a witness by defendant, testified:

"Q. I will ask you if it is not a fact that the bank did accept payments from Mr. Leibold on the note under that agreement? A. I could only say now after seeing the note that payments were made to the bank. By whom they were made and under what circumstances, I could not say."

Cases such as Daneri v. Gazzola, 139 Cal. 416, 73 Pac. 179, cited by appellant, do not support his contention. In the case cited, the defendants were sureties on the note; the payee agreed in consideration of part payment, and that the interest would be kept paid as it matured, to dismiss the action and extend payment one year. This agreement was carried out without the consent or knowledge of the defendants. The court held that this operated a release of the sureties. No such facts exist here. Assuming that the agreement took effect, it was merely an arrangement by which Leibold was to manage the business and pay the obligation when he could out of the earnings. No time was fixed for payments, and no extension of time given by the creditors, and there was no consideration passing to plaintiff as a creditor for the agreement. It was said in Stroud v. Thomas, 139 Cal. 274, 72 Pac. 1008, 96 Am. St. Rep. 111:

"A surety is not discharged by an extension of time to the principal debtors without consideration. Part payment of the interest or principal of the note after maturity is not a consideration for an extension of time; and the surety is not discharged by an agreement to forbear suit against the principals, founded upon such part payment, though carried out by the creditor."

Under sections 2822 and 2823 of the Civil Code, mere delay on the part of the creditors to proceed against the principal does not exonerate the guarantor, and a partial satisfaction of the obligation of the guarantor will reduce it, but will not otherwise affect the obligation.

We think, however, that as by the express terms of the agreement it was to be null and void unless all creditors signed it, the court rightly held that it never became operative.

We discover no alleged errors in rulings of the court during the trial which were prejudicial or call for consideration.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MATH v. CRESCENT HILL GOLD MINES CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 1415.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 7, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 4, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §80(4)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

The first count of a complaint alleged that plaintiff agreed to work for defendant as miner at the rate of $3.50 a day, and that it was agreed that if plaintiff refrained from demanding payment for services until money had been realized from the mine for that purpose, he would be paid double wages, and that the mine did on or before a date stated yield sufficient sum to pay plaintiff at the rate of $7 a day, and that demand was made on defendant for a statement, which was refused. The second count sets up the employment, rendition of labor for a time stated, and "that said services are reasonably worth $3.50 a day," etc. Held that, as the complaint alleged that the mine did on or before a certain date produce and yield to the defendant a sufficient sum of money to pay the plaintiff for labor at the rate of $7 per day for the period of his employment, it was unnecessary to plead therein that the mine had failed within a reasonable time to produce the money with which to pay plaintiff.

2. WORK AND LABOR ☞22—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

In the count on quantum meruit, it was not necessary to plead that the mine had failed to produce, within a reasonable time, the money with which to pay the plaintiff, since to do so would have necessitated the pleading of an express agreement almost in its entirety, which is inconsistent with the essential theory upon which an action on an implied contract proceeds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. ☞22.]

3. WORK AND LABOR ☞24(2) — PLEADING — ANSWER.

On a quantum meruit count the actual agreement of the parties as may be shown without pleading such agreement, as a defense to plaintiff's claim that defendant is indebted to him in a sum representing the reasonable value of the alleged services rendered defendant, since in such case the defendant is entitled to interpose any defense which, if proved, will counterveil the claim that any sum is due for "reasonable value" of services.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 44, 45; Dec. Dig. ☞24(2).]

4. TRIAL ☞397(1)—FAILURE TO FIND MATERIAL ISSUE—PLEADING.

In an action to recover for personal services, where the court made no finding as to an allegation in the cross-petition of a claim for merchandise furnished to plaintiff, being a material issue, the judgment will be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Joe Math against the Crescent Hill Gold Mines Company of California. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

J. D. McLaughlin and L. N. Peter, both of Quincy, for appellant. L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, for respondent.

HART, J. An opinion affirming the judgment and the order appealed from in this action was filed by this court on June 19, 1916. A rehearing was within due time granted on the petition of the appellant for the reason, as stated in the order granting the rehearing, that the petition called "attention to some evidence that seems to have been overlooked when the case was decided." The former opinion contained the following statement of the facts and the issues as the same are presented in the pleadings of the respective parties:

"Plaintiff worked as a miner for defendant, at its mine in Plumas county, from February 15, 1912, to October 28, 1913, a total of 600 days. In the first cause of action set up in the complaint it is alleged that plaintiff entered into an agreement with defendant whereby the former was to work as a miner at the rate of $3.50 per day, 'and as a part of said agreement it was understood and agreed between plaintiff and defendant that if plaintiff refrained from demanding any pay for his said services until a sufficient amount of money had been realized from the proceeds of said mine for that purpose, the defendant would pay plaintiff double the amount of his said wages, to wit, the sum of $7 per day.' It is then alleged that said mine 'did on or before the said 28th day of October, 1913, produce and yield to defendant a sufficient sum of money as the proceeds thereof to pay the said plaintiff for his said labor at the rate of $7 per day for the period of his employment as aforesaid.' It is also alleged that a demand was made by plaintiff on defendant for a statement of the earnings and proceeds of the mine and for payment of the amount due, but that defendant refused to comply with said demands. The receipt of $75 on account is admitted, and judgment is asked for $4,125.

"The second cause of action sets up the employment of plaintiff and his rendition of labor for 600 days, and 'that said services were and are reasonably worth $3.50 per day'; that no part thereof has been paid except the sum of $75, and judgment is demanded in the sum of $2,025.

"A demurrer to the complaint, generally and for ambiguity, uncertainty, and unintelligibility, was overruled and defendant answered: Admitted an agreement with plaintiff whereby he was to work for defendant, but denies that it was as set out in the complaint; admitted that plaintiff performed 600 days' labor, 'but denies that defendant was to pay for such work or labor, or that the plaintiff was working for defendant'; denied that the mine yielded to defendant 'a sufficient sum of money as the proceeds thereof to pay plaintiff for his said labor at the rate of $7 per day, or any other sum, or at all for his said labor'; admitted plaintiff's demand for a statement, but avers that defendant 'could not understand what kind of statement was expected to be furnished to plaintiff; defendant demanded of plaintiff that he make his demand in writing so that defendant would be enabled to comply with plaintiff's demand, but defendant denies that a statement of the moneys paid and yielded to defendant by and from the operation of the said mine * * * was refused plaintiff, or that defendant does now continue to refuse to furnish such statement to plaintiff'; admitted that no payment was made plaintiff, and alleged that none is due.

"As 'a further defense and answer,' defendant 'alleges that plaintiff was not in the employ of the defendant at any time or at all between the 19th day of February, 1912, and the 28th day of October, 1913, and alleges further that plaintiff with others was working in the said * * * mine, and was to receive as compensation for his said labor and work, his pro rata of the net profits derived from the mining and milling of the ores mined by them * * * up to the sum of $7 per day.'

"Answering the second cause of action, defendant denied the employment of plaintiff or that he rendered work to defendant, and repeated the allegation that plaintiff and others were to receive a pro rata of the net profits; admitted that plaintiff was paid nothing by defendant.

"A cross-complaint sets up an indebtedness by plaintiff to defendant for money loaned and goods and merchandise furnished, of the value of $98.20, and judgment is prayed against plaintiff for that amount. In an 'Answer to Amendment,' defendant denied that $75 was paid plaintiff as wages, but alleged that said sum was a loan.

"Findings were filed: That plaintiff performed 600 days' labor for defendant under an agreement that 'plaintiff should receive for his said services the sum of $3.50 per day, and to pay for his board the sum of $1 per day, and if plaintiff refrained from demanding pay for his said services until an amount of money sufficient to meet the sum had been realized from the proceeds of the operation of said mine, that plaintiff should receive the sum of $7 per day, less the said amount for board; that there was not received from the operation of said mine a sufficient amount of money to pay plaintiff for his said work; that plaintiff is entitled to receive $3.50 per day for 600 days; that defendant is entitled to credit for $75 advanced to plaintiff; that defendant is entitled to credit for board for 616 days at $1 per day,' and judgment was rendered for plaintiff in the sum of $1,409.

"The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial."

Counsel for the appellant vigorously contend in their petition for a rehearing, as likewise they argue in their briefs originally filed herein that the only permissible conclusion from the testimony of the plaintiff himself was the agreement upon which he relies here for a recovery does not require the defendant to pay him any compensation whatever until the money was taken from the mine, "and in case of failure to take it from the mine he would get $3.50 per day, and that before he could claim the latter amount he would have to allege and prove some misconduct on the part of the defendant or that the mine had failed to produce the money within a reasonable time." And it is further asserted that upon the question of what is "reasonable time" no issue was tendered by the complaint nor evidence offered or received.

The agreement not having been reduced to writing, its terms must necessarily be learned, and the intention of the parties as to its nature, scope, and effect necessarily ascertained from the evidence. We have, upon further consideration of the record, concluded that, for a reason to be hereafter explained, the judgment must be reversed. While it may technically be true that there is evidence in the record which supports the trial court's conception of the agreement, as evidenced by its findings, still, on the whole, the evidence as to the nature of the agreement or upon the question of what the parties actually intended should be the precise occasion on which the plaintiff would be entitled to demand and receive pay for his services at the rate of $3.50 per day is, as the learned trial judge in his written opinion, giving his reasons for the conclusion reached, in effect declared, unsatisfactory, and it appears to us to be so much so that, since the judgment must be reversed, a retrial of the issues of fact should be had, in which event the facts bearing upon the transaction may, it is to be hoped, the more clearly and satisfactorily be disclosed. It will, therefore, be unnecessary for us to consider in detail the evidence in this opinion.

[1, 2] As to the criticism of the plaintiff's complaint, however, it is proper that we should say that, it being alleged in the first count or cause of action therein stated that the mine "did, on or before the 28th day of October, 1913, produce and yield to defendant a sufficient sum of money as the proceeds thereof to pay the said plaintiff for his said labor at the rate of $7 per day for the period of his employment," it was obviously unnecessary to plead therein that the mine had failed, within a reasonable time, to produce the money with which to pay the plaintiff, assuming that it is true that the understanding between the parties was that the plaintiff was entitled to the payment of no compensation whatever until the mine did produce the money required to make such payment. Nor was it necessary to plead the matter as to "reasonable time" in the second cause of action, which was cast in the form of a common count, upon a quantum meruit. To have done so would have necessitated the pleading of the express agreement almost in its entirety—that is to say, it would have been necessary to plead not only the agreement to employ the plaintiff (which necessarily is pleaded in said count), but also the condition upon which he would be entitled to demand and receive his compensation. This, it seems to us, would have been inconsistent with the essential theory upon which an action on an implied contract proceeds.

[3] The plaintiff, in his second cause of action, proceeded precisely as is required where the action is in the quantum meruit form of a common count, and in such case the defendant is entitled to interpose any defense, which, if proved, will countervail the claim of the plaintiff that any sum is due and owing to him from the defendant as the "reasonable value" of services alleged to have been performed. In this case, either with or without pleading it, the question of "reasonable time" could have been introduced by the defendant as a defense to the second cause of action. In other words, the actual agreement between the parties, as the defendant understood it, could have been shown by the latter, without pleading such agreement, as a defense to the plaintiff's claim, as set forth in said cause of action, that the defendant was indebted to him in a sum representing the reasonable value of the alleged services rendered by him to and for the defendant.

[4] As above stated, however, it will be necessary to order a reversal of the judgment, and this for the reason that the court failed to make a finding upon a material issue.

As seen, the defendant filed a cross-complaint in which it is alleged that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendant for money loaned and for goods and merchandise furnished and delivered to the plaintiff, at the latter's special instance and request, in the sum of $98.20. In his answer to the cross-complaint, the plaintiff denied the indebtedness so alleged.

There was some testimony supporting the above-mentioned allegation of the cross-complaint, and it was this evidence that this court said in the order granting the rehearing had been overlooked in the preparation of the former opinion.

The plaintiff himself testified that the defendant, through Mr. Oddie, its president and manager, had furnished him a bill of groceries, etc., amounting in value to the sum of $80, for which he had not paid. The court made no finding upon this issue.

It is, of course, well settled that if any material issue is left unfound, it is ground for reversal of the judgment. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, Rev. Ed. p. 1317.

For the reasons herein stated, both the judgment and the order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

WILLS ⚡597(1)—NATURE OF ESTATE CREATED—HOMESTEAD—DEVISE IN FEE.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1465-1468, as to setting aside property for the widow, etc., a will reading, "to my * * * wife * * * I bequeath and devise" a certain sum, and continuing, in another sentence, "This in addition to" the homestead, describing it, "to which she shall be entitled and which I hereby request the court to set apart to her," did not devise to the wife the fee of the homestead, which was deceased's separate property.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Anton Krieg. Margaret Krieg and another filed a petition, which was opposed by Louisa Street Cooley and others and from an order and decree, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

tum Suden & tum Suden, of San Francisco, for appellants. Corbet & Selby and Edgar D. Peixotto, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Anton Krieg died testate, leaving a widow, adult children by his first wife and a minor child by his second wife. The children, including the minor, were to take the residuum of the estate by definite fractional parts. The will provided for the widow as follows:

"To my beloved wife Margaret Krieg, I bequeath and devise the sum of thirty thousand dollars ($30,000). This in addition to the real property now occupied by us as our home on San Bruno avenue, having a frontage of seventy-five feet by a depth of one hundred feet, together with all the furniture and household utensils therein contained to which she shall be entitled and which I hereby request the court to set apart to her and our minor child Lawrence as a homestead:

"In view of the fact that all my property was acquired by me before my marriage to my wife and is separate property, I ask my wife to accept the foregoing provision made for her in lieu of all right of community and in full of her distributive share, either as heir at law or otherwise, subject however to a further reasonable family allowance to be fixed by the court:

"In case my wife Margaret Krieg, contrary to my wishes and expectations insists on receiving her share of the community property, if any there is, then it is my will that she shall receive her said share of the community property but shall take nothing else under this will except the homestead and a reasonable family allowance."

Administration of the estate proceeded as usual until Margaret Krieg and her son Lawrence Krieg filed a petition asking that the real property described in the above quotation be set apart to them as a homestead, but that the fee be found to be in Margaret Krieg. The elder children of the testator opposed such disposition of the property, and after a full hearing the court held with them that the widow was not entitled under the terms of the will to a distribution of the land in fee. An order was made setting apart the property in question to Margaret Krieg, the widow, as a homestead for her life, and to Lawrence Krieg, the minor, during the term of his minority. From this order and the decree this appeal is taken.

The sole question is whether or not the will justified the ruling of the probate court upon the meaning of the language relating to the property occupied by the widow. That it was separate property is necessarily conceded. Such property may ordinarily be set apart to the survivor or the children for a limited time only, to be determined by the court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1465-1468, inclusive. When so set apart the property remains subject to administration. Unless the language of the will compels a different interpretation the court has done with this separate property of the testator all that under the law it may do.

Turning to that instrument, we see that the bequest of $30,000 to Mrs. Krieg is contained in a distinct and wholly unambiguous sentence. To be sure, that sentence does contain the word "devise," but that verb is so commonly misapplied to bequests of personal property that its use here is of no great significance. Ogle v. Tayloe, 49 Md. 158-177; Logan v. Logan, 11 Col. 44, 17 Pac. 99; Barry v. Barry, 15 Kan. 587; Leighton v. Sheldon, 16 Minn. 243. The punctuation forbids us from transferring that word into the next sentence, as appellant suggests that we should do, and making it apply to the realty therein described. Examining the next sentence, we find that it contains no words of devise applying to the home on San Bruno avenue. It is suggested that, as the court had the right, independently of the will, to set aside the home and the personal property exempt from execution to the use of the widow and the minor son of decedent, the language is futile and unnecessary, unless we give to it some dispositive force. If we grant this to be true, still do we look in vain for the words of devise. "This in addition to," etc., are not such words, nor are the words "to which she shall be entitled." This last expression clearly refers to her right and that of her son to a limited homestead on the separate real property and to the use of the exempt personalty. There is no ambiguity in the language. The paragraph containing the bequest of money to Mrs. Krieg and the request to the court neither by direction nor implication disposes of the fee to the property on San Bruno avenue; but we do not agree with appellant in the belief that, interpreted as a request or direction to the court to do something which might have been done without any suggestion on the part of the testator, the language becomes futile or redundant. Read as a whole, the will exhibits, not only a desire on the part of Mr. Krieg to dispose of his property to the natural objects of his bounty, but also a wish to justify the division as a fair and proper one. For example, he asks his wife to accept the provision made for her because he considers it "fair and just." Similarly defending the division of the residue among his children, the testator uses this language:

"I desire to say that the unequal divisions of the residue of my estate made among my children is for the reason that I have during my life time made various and sundry payments and advancements to them. I have deducted these advances in apportioning these bequests, and hereby provide that no further deductions be made on account thereof for past advances."

The estate was of a value of about $165,000. It was the evident intention of the testator to call attention to the fact that the money left his widow would not be the sole means of her support after his death, and he therefore pointed out to her and the other heirs the power of the court in the premises. It makes no difference whether his request to the court was merely precatory, or amounted to a direction which the judge sitting in probate was bound to follow. The fact remains that the property was set aside just as the will indicated the testator's desire to have it assigned, and his purpose was therefore consummated.

The order and decree from which the appeal is taken are affirmed.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 337(2)—PREMATURE TAKING OF APPEAL—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1715, amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 406) to provide that the appeal may be taken at any time after the order, decree, or judgment is made or rendered, but not later than 60 days after the same is entered in the minute book of the court, in proceedings to contest a will, where contestant's appeal was taken after the rendition or making of the judgment of the superior court, it was not prematurely taken because taken four days before entry of the judgment.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John Newton Stone, deceased. From a judgment admitting decedent's will to probate, Leo Stone Green, the contestant, appeals, and the proponent and defendants move to dismiss. Motion to dismiss the appeal denied.

Bernard Potter and Ingall W. Bull, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Hartley Shaw and Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is a motion to dismiss an appeal taken by Leo Stone Green. The first ground of the motion was that the transcript on appeal, which has now been filed was not filed within the time prescribed by our rules. As to this ground, at the oral argument we announced that a sufficient showing had been made to warrant us in holding that the appellant's failure in this regard should be excused. Consideration of the affidavits allowed to be filed by the respective parties since the argument has not changed our views in this regard. As to certain matters referred to in these affidavits there is an irreconcilable conflict in the statements made, a conflict that we do not deem it necessary to attempt to determine. We think that there is a sufficient showing to warrant a conclusion that appellant herself understood that she had paid all charges required to and including the filing in this court of the transcript on appeal, and that her mistake in this regard was not inexcusable. We do not feel warranted in dismissing the appeal on this ground.

The notice of appeal was filed June 24, 1916. It stated that the contestant in a proceeding to contest the will of deceased "hereby appeals * * * from the judgment on the verdict of the jury made and entered in the Superior Court * * * on the 27th day of April, 1916, in favor of said proponent and defendants." The record shows that the jury's verdict in the matter, being on the single issue of undue influence, was received and filed April 27, 1916. On this verdict a purported clerk's judgment in favor of defendants for costs, ineffectual under the law for any purpose, was filed April 27, 1916, and this was not entered until June 28, 1916. On June 10, 1916, there was filed a formal judgment signed by the judge, setting forth the verdict and the conclusions of the court as to the other matters essential to the admission of the will to probate, admitting the will to probate, appointing an executrix, and awarding costs. This judgment was entered June 28, 1916. As we have said, the appeal was taken June 24, 1916.

[2] We are satisfied that the notice of appeal should be construed as showing an appeal from the judgment of the superior court admitting the will to probate, rather than as one from "the verdict," or from the attempted clerk's judgment which even then had not been entered. If this be so, there is no force in the claim that the order from which the appeal is taken is not an appealable order.

[3] There is no force in the suggestion that the appeal was prematurely taken because taken 4 days before the entry of the judgment. Section 1715, Code of Civil Procedure, was amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 400) so as to provide that "the appeal may be taken at any time after the order, decree, or judgment is made or rendered, but not later than sixty days after the same is entered in the minute book of the court." The appeal here was taken after the rendition or making of the judgment. The authorities relied on by learned counsel for the respondents are inapplicable in view of the amendment.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

BULSON v. MOFFATT et al. (Sac. 2358.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1916.)

CONTRACTS ⇨138(3) — EQUITY ⇨66 — ILLEGAL CONTRACT—RELIEF TO PARTIES—DOING EQUITY.

Though actions under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 749a-751, authorizing an action to determine adverse claims to realty, are quasi, if not strictly, in rem proceedings, such a proceeding may become in effect a simple action to quiet title, where a mortgage lien, held by defendant on plaintiff's property, was barred by limitations, and the consideration of the secured note had been adjudged illegal in a former suit to foreclose the mortgage, both parties to the foreclosure suit having violated a statute, and having been equally at fault, plaintiff could not quiet title against the defendant mortgagee without first paying the debt, since the parties must be left where, on account of their mutual violation of the statute, they were placed by the decree in the former suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 688, 689; Dec. Dig. ⇨138(3); Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 180-190; Dec. Dig. ⇨66.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by A. E. Bulson against James Moffatt (also sometimes known as James Moffat), and also all other persons unknown claiming any right, etc. From a judgment that plaintiff was not entitled to have his title quieted, he appeals. Affirmed.

L. N. Peter, of Quincy, for appellant. A. F. St. Sure, of Alameda, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Appeal by plaintiff on the judgment roll alone from a judgment by which the superior court refused to quiet plaintiff's title to certain property in Plumas county.

The action was brought under authority of sections 749a, 750, and 751 of the Code of Civil Procedure. After trial the court found that plaintiff was the owner in fee of all of the property involved; that by himself and his predecessors he had exclusively possessed it continuously for more than 20 years preceding the date of this action, and had paid all taxes assessed against it; that Moffatt's only claim of interest was based upon a note and mortgage dated March 5, 1887, upon which no payment had been made since August, 1888; that said mortgage had never been paid, satisfied, nor released, and that it was still of record in Plumas county; that Moffatt was still the lawful owner of the note and mortgage; that in 1890 Moffatt commenced an action upon the note and mortgage; that the court, after trial of the cause, adjudged the consideration for said note and mortgage to have been illegal, both parties to the action having been equally in the wrong; that the said judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of California September 1, 1892; and that aside from the mortgage Moffatt had no title whatever in the property specified in the complaint herein. Upon these findings the superior court concluded and adjudged that plaintiff was not entitled to have his title quieted. The appeal to which the court referred in its findings was Moffatt v. Bulson, 96 Cal. 106, 30 Pac. 1022, 31 Am. St. Rep. 192.

Appellant contends that this is a proceeding purely in rem, and that the doctrines of equity are not applicable to its facts. Actions under the McEnerney Act are quasi, if not strictly, in rem (Title, etc., Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289-308, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. [N. S.] 844), yet this court has held that such a proceeding may become in effect, a simple action to quiet title between the parties. Faxon v. All Persons, 166 Cal. 707, 137 Pac. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209. This is a case coming properly under the same rule, and on the authority of that and many other cases the court was justified in finding that, although the lien of the mortgage had become extinguished, the debtor could not quiet title against the mortgagee without first paying his debt. See Faxon Case, supra, particularly at 166 Cal. 720, 137 Pac. 924 (L. R. A. 1916B, 1209).

The fact that the consideration for the note was illegal does not take this case from under the operation of the rule. The parties to the foreclosure suit were both violators of a statute, and each was equally at fault. This action should leave them, as did the foreclosure suit, exactly where their mutual violation of the statute placed them.

The judgment is affirmed.

BUTTE CREEK CONSOL. DREDGING CO.
v. OLNEY et al. (Sac. 2283.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 31041(5)—HARMLESS ERROR—SUPPLEMENTAL PLEADING.

The objection that a supplemental complaint set up no matter not known to plaintiff when the original complaint was filed will not be considered on appeal, where the trial court awarded no damages or relief on account of additional facts stated in the supplemental complaint.

2. PLEADING 3248(16) — AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Where, after commencing suit for specific performance and damages for breach, plaintiff discovered defendant's lack of title to a portion of the property, an amended complaint alleging that fact and demanding damages therefor did not alter the cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 708½; Dec. Dig. 3248(16).]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 3351(6)—REMEDY OF PURCHASER—RECOVERY OF PAYMENT—SHORTAGE IN LAND CONVEYED.

It was not error to fix the damages for partial failure of vendor's title at a price per acre based on the sum actually paid the vendor for all the land, although such sum included, in addition to the sum described as the "purchase price," another sum claimed by the vendor to have been intended merely as a "bonus" for the right to make the purchase, since calling this money a "bonus" did not mitigate the vendee's loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 1054; Dec. Dig. 3351(6).]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 365(2)—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—SALE BY ACRE OR IN GROSS.

A contract was not for sale of land in gross, although after specifying the sections and quarter sections to be sold it recited the description was intended to apply to all the vendor's lands "lying west of the east bank" of a creek "as described above, except" a certain quarter "where the middle" of the creek "shall be the dividing line"; the recital being merely to prevent the vendees from asserting title to any of the land covered by the description according to subdivisions yet lying east of the line fixed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 95, 96; Dec. Dig. 365(2).]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 3351(6)—REMEDY OF PURCHASER—RECOVERY OF PAYMENT—SHORTAGE IN LAND CONVEYED.

The compensation allowed for deficiency in quantity of acreage conveyed should be at the rate of the average price per acre paid by the purchaser for the whole tract, where no difference is shown between the value of the land to which title fails and the remainder of the tract.

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT 334(2)—RESCISSI—MISTAKE OF LAW.

Where vendors had by their conduct waived those provisions of a land sale contract making time of the essence, and the vendee, tendering the full purchase price, was entitled to full performance, but, under mistake of law that his rights had been lost by delay, consented to take a seven-year lease instead of conveyance of the premises, for the original consideration named in the contract, the vendee was entitled to rescind the contract of lease, as to which consent was given by mistake, under Civ. Code, § 1689, as to rescission for mistake of law.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the Butte Creek Consolidated Dredging Company against Laura F. Olney and another. From judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying new trial, defendants appeal. Judgment modified, and it and order denying new trial affirmed.

Tucker, Kenyon & MacFarland, of Washington, D. C., J. Z. Tucker, of San Diego, and White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for appellants. Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendants appeal from an adverse judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The litigation concerns certain contracts for the sale and purchase of real property. On April 8, 1907, an agreement in writing was made by defendants and plaintiff's predecessors in interest by the terms of which the Olneys, parties of the first part, in consideration of the sum of $5,000, receipt of which was thereby acknowledged, and in further consideration of the covenants and promised future payments provided by the contract, gave and granted to the "parties of the second part" the option and right to purchase the property therein described. The description was of certain land situated in section 19, township 22 north, range 3 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian in Butte county. The part of the description to be particularly considered in this opinion related to "all of the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter lying west of the east bank of Butte creek." It was further provided that the purchase price of said property should be the sum of $28,000 to be paid as follows: $5,000 on or before October 8, 1907; $10,000 on or before April 8, 1908; and $13,000 on or before October 8, 1908. Deferred payments were to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum commencing six months from the date of the instrument. The first parties agreed that upon the demand of the second parties or assigns they would place in escrow a good and sufficient deed to be delivered upon deposit of the final payment. The contract also contained the following language:

"That in the event of a failure on the part of the second parties, or their assigns, to make any payment at the times herein provided, or to otherwise fail to comply with any and all the terms and conditions herein stated, all rights hereunder shall thereupon cease and this option become null and void, it being especially understood and agreed that upon any such failure all and any moneys paid and all improvements made upon said property hereunder by the second parties shall be forfeited to and become and remain the property of the first parties, as their compensation and in full satisfaction to them for having granted this option."

It was further provided that the Olneys might occupy the premises for farming, but that after the first payment the second parties might enter upon the land, construct mining machinery, and mine for gold. The sum of $5,000 due under the contract on October 8, 1907, was paid two days before that date. The sum of $10,000 was due on or before April 8, 1908, and before that day the sums of $10,000 principal and $690 interest were paid and a supplemental agreement was signed by all the parties, including the plaintiff. In this instrument the former writing is referred to and designated as "a certain contract for the purchase of lands in Butte county," thus showing, as respondent insists, that the parties treated the original and the supplemental agreements as contracts for the purchase and sale of real property, and not as mere options. By the later instrument the time of payment of the $10,000 due on or before April 8, 1908, was extended to August 8, 1908, and the time of payment of the sum of $13,000 due by the terms of the original contract October 8, 1908, was extended to February 8, 1909, credit being given on this part of the indebtedness, however, for the $1,000 paid on the date of the execution of the supplemental contract—another evidence that the vendors and vendee were regarding the transaction as one of purchase and sale. The installment of $10,000 supposedly with interest then due was paid prior to the date set by the second contract, and on October 20th an additional payment of $27.32 was made to cover an error in the computation of interest. The sum of $12,000 was not paid when due, but on August 3, 1909, payment was made of $5,000 of the principal and $360 interest. Mrs. Olney by letter acknowledged receipt of the check covering these amounts, and while protesting that it was inconvenient for her to grant further extension, she consented to a payment of $3,000 October 8, 1909, with interest to that date on $7,000 and of the remaining $4,000, with interest on or before February 8, 1910. In this letter, however, Mrs. Olney wrote:

"I have no desire to distress you in your efforts, and I imagine it is difficult to start so big a thing as you have undertaken there, so once more I consent to the extension of time you have asked for."

A few days before October 8, 1909, the sums of $3,000 and $70 interest were paid. The final payment was not made on time, but on or about February 8, 1910, the date on which it became due, the secretary of the Butte Creek Consolidated Dredging Company wrote to Mrs. Olney, at Washington, D. C., informing her that an assessment had been levied upon the stock of the corporation to meet the indebtedness, and asking her to send to the Bank of Chico a deed to the property executed by her and her husband to the dredging company as grantee, together with an abstract of title. After receiving this letter Mrs. Olney wrote to the secretary of the corporation under date of February 14, 1910, declaring that by its failure to make the final payment on or before February 8th the plaintiff had forfeited all right to the property.

Mr. March, secretary of the plaintiff, was sent immediately to Washington with a draft for $4,095 principal and interest due as the final payment for the property. He made tender of the money to the Olneys and demanded a deed, but they refused to admit that the corporation had any rights in the property. After negotiations covering several days, Mr. March, the secretary of the Butte County Dredging Company, believing that the vendors might lawfully declare a forfeiture of the contract, agreed to accept a lease of the land for the term of seven years giving the corporation the right, during that period, to dredge the land. He delivered to Mrs. Olney the draft for $4,095 and promised to have his company send to her $500 and 5,000 shares of its capital stock. The board of directors of the dredging company complied with the promise thus made in their behalf and the lease was executed. It was dated March 5, 1910, and it contained as part of the description a specification of the land, approximately 20 acres to which, as the parties to the lease subsequently learned, neither of the Olneys had any title. About July 27, 1910, after the payment of the $500, the transfer of the stock and the execution of the lease, the corporation served notice of rescission of the lease upon Mr. and Mrs. Olney. In this notice the corporation recited that in accepting the lease in lieu of a deed the action of the board of directors of the plaintiff was taken through a misapprehension of the facts and of the legal rights of the corporation. Rescission is sought also on the ground (to quote from the notice):

"That the said Laura F. Olney has received and accepted of this corporation the full purchase price therefor, together with interest on all deferred payments, and that this corporation is entitled to a deed to said property, and on the further ground that at the time the said payment was tendered to you and you refused to accept the same that such refusal was unauthorized, and you had no legal right to refuse to convey the said property to this corporation, and on the further ground that at the time the last payment was due from this corporation to you on account of the said lands you concealed the fact from this corporation, and from its agents, that your title to a portion of the said land was not perfected, and you could not at the said time deliver a deed conveying the title to the said lands free of incumbrance."

The writing contained a demand for a deed, for a return of the stock and money paid on account of the lease; and for $5,000 damages sustained by reason of refusal to convey title and on account of fraudulent acts and concealments. These demands were not complied with and this litigation was the result.

[1] The original complaint is not set forth in its entirety in the transcript, although two quotations from it were read into the record by appellants. The amended complaint which does appear in full in the transcript pleads the execution of the two contracts and the various payments thereunder; alleges that the agreements were just and fair; sets up full compliance with their terms; avers that defendants never insisted upon strict performance in the matter of dates of payment; and prays specific performance as well as damages for the refusal on the part of defendants to convey the described property. In the second amended complaint plaintiff alleges that defendants represented themselves as owners of the land described in the two contracts, but that as matter of fact they did not own a certain tract of 20 acres contained in that area, namely, the south one-half of the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 19. There are also averments of the various payments made to defendants of the ownership by Mrs. Olney on behalf of the marriage community of all the land except the 20 acres; of the justness of the agreements; and of the refusal of defendants to give a deed. The pleading further sets forth plaintiff's belief until shortly before the filing of the second amended complaint that the Olneys owned the 20 acres in question and recites that, when its dredging operations had reached the south line of this tract, the work was halted by one Martin, the real owner, greatly to the loss of plaintiff. Damages in the sum of $5,000 are demanded for the loss thus occasioned, and the prayer is for conveyance of the property less the 20 acres belonging to Martin, and for $5,000 damages sustained because of the refusal to convey and because of the failure of title in defendants to the 20-acre parcel. There was a supplemental complaint containing allegations to the effect that after the commencement of the action Martin had halted plaintiff's dredging operations, thus preventing access to other lands of plaintiff to its damage in the sum of $5,000. This pleading also contains the statement that immediately prior to the commencement of the action plaintiff discovered Mrs. Olney's lack of record title to the 20-acre tract, but was assured by her and believed that nevertheless she could deliver title thereto. Appellants earnestly contend that the court erred in permitting the filing of the second amended complaint and the supplemental complaint, because each, they insist, changed the original cause of action from one for specific performance to a suit for damages. Of the supplemental complaint it is said that it set up no matter which was not known to the pleader when the original complaint was filed, and Young v. Turner, 168 Cal. 671-675, 143 Pac. 1029, is cited to the effect that the function of a supplemental complaint is to set up facts material to the case occurring after the filing of the former complaint. We may at once dismiss the consideration of the point of appellants with reference to the supplemental complaint because, conceding the correctness of their claim that the facts therein alleged were known when the original complaint was filed, the court awarded no damages on account of the failure of plaintiff to reach with its dredger other lands owned by the corporation because of the adverse ownership by Martin of the tract of 20 acres.

[2] Appellants are mistaken in their belief that the original cause of action was abandoned and another pleaded in the second amended complaint. Plaintiff in all of its pleadings declared upon the two contracts praying both specific performance and damages for breach. In her original answer Mrs. Olney averred title in her to all the property as alleged in the amended complaint. When subsequently failure of her title to the smaller portion was discovered, a pleading of that fact and the consequent demand for damages did not alter the cause of action. In essence it was still a suit founded upon the written contracts of sale and the failure on the part of the Olneys to perform their part of said agreements.

The court found that strict performance of the original and supplemental contracts had been waived; that plaintiff had performed its part of the agreements; that the title of defendants failed as to 20 acres of the land involved; that by reason of such failure plaintiff had been damaged to the amount of $3,420; that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for $500 paid on account of the lease made after the refusal of defendants to convey any of the land to plaintiff in fee; that the lease was made under misapprehension of law and facts; and that defendants were not damaged by plaintiff's action in canceling and refusing to deliver the 5,000 shares of stock issued to Laura F. Olney in compliance with the terms of the lease. The judgment followed the findings, except, as we have stated above, there were no damages awarded for the exclusion of plaintiff from certain of its properties by reason of Martin's refusal to permit passage across his 20 acres.

Appellants call attention to a mistake of the court in determining the acreage. The parcel of 20 acres, title to which failed, lies partly east of the east bank of Butte creek, and therefore is not all within the description contained in the contracts. The evidence shows that the portion east of the creek is of an extent between 1 and 2 acres. On motion for new trial counsel for plaintiff offered to refund $855 as a credit on the judgment in case the motion should be denied. This was the price of 5 acres according to the finding of the court that the amount paid by plaintiff was $171 per acre. The motion for a new trial was denied, but the order failed to notice the remission. Respondent stipulates that the sum of $1,078.45 be remitted from the judgment, being $855 on account of principal together with interest thereon up to the date of judgment. We will permit and direct a modification of the judgment in accordance with this stipulation.

[3] Appellants insist that the court erred in fixing the price of the land at $171 per acre on the basis of the $33,000 actually paid instead of $28,000 described in the contracts as the "purchase price." The argument is that the sum of $5,000 was intended merely as a bonus for the right to make the purchase. Conceding this, it does not follow that in estimating the damage due to the partial failure of the title of defendants the initial payment should be disregarded. Calling this money a "bonus" does not mitigate plaintiff's loss.

[4] Appellants further contend that the contracts were merely for the sale of their land in gross. It is true that after specifying the section and quarter sections to be sold the contract recites that the description is intended to apply to all of the lands owned by the Olneys lying west of the east bank of Butte creek, "as described above, except the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter where the middle of Butte creek shall be the dividing line." There is no force in the contention that by this language the Olneys merely promised to convey title to whatever land they might own in that vicinity. The purpose of the limitation was evident. It was to prevent the vendees or their assigns after payment of the purchase price from asserting title to any of the land covered by the description according to subdivisions, yet lying east of the line fixed. In other words, it was a limitation of a general description by specific boundary lines. In Lawson v. Floyd, 124 U. S. 108, 8 Sup. Ct. 409, 31 L. Ed. 347, cited by appellants in support of this point, the land was described in the contract as "about 1,000 acres of land lying on the east side of Guyandotte and north of Aracoma," and again as a tract "estimated to contain one thousand acres." That case does not support the contention of appellants when applied to the description which we are here considering. In this connection it is argued that there is no evidence of mistake on Mrs. Olney's part with reference to her title to the land described; but the record shows that in the lease the particular tract of 20 acres to which she had no title was specifically described as her land and that of her husband just as it had been in the other contracts previously made; and in her deposition taken after the commencement of this action Mrs. Olney set forth her belief that at the time the contract of sale was made she owned this very land.

[5] It is argued that the court erred in fixing damages for the failure of title in and to the 20-acre tract on the basis of the proportion which it bore to the whole area described in the contract. Appellants say that the recovery should have been limited to the value of the land and call attention to testimony that the property never was worth more than $10 an acre and that a subsequent purchaser of the land once owned by Martin estimated its value as being $100 an acre; while it is true that, where a buyer has proven his right to specific performance and title fails as to a part of the land on which are situated improvements, he will be entitled to compensation for the actual value of the improved property. But we are not confronted with any such state of facts. There was no testimony tending to show a difference in value in Martin's land and that owned by defendants. There was some evidence that plaintiff had paid too much for the entire tract to which defendants claimed title, but the fact remained that the corporation had paid for it at the very price per acre fixed by the court. In Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406-411, 69 Pac. 96, it was laid down as a rule of decision that, where a court of equity finds itself unable to enforce conveyance of all of the land described in a contract of sale, it will compel compliance with the agreement as far as possible at the rate agreed upon between the contracting parties. A necessary corollary to this rule is that the same measure must be applied in estimating the proportion of the purchase price recoverable by one who has mistakenly paid for more land than the vendor is able to convey. In other words, the compensation allowed for the deficiency in quantity should be at the rate of the average price paid for the entire tract. Kelly v. Riley, 22 W. Va. 247-251. The court applied the correct measure of damages. The case of Tyson v. Eyrick, 141 Pa. 296-313, 21 Atl. 635, 23 Am. St. Rep. 287, cited by appellants, does not support their contention. In that case the vendor had in good faith assumed to convey title to land having a frontage of 50 feet. As matter of fact, the title failed as to one foot of frontage, the land extending the entire depth of the lot. After learning of this defect the vendee continued to make payments according to the terms of his agreement, and did not seek to rescind. The court held that under the circumstances he was entitled merely to an allowance for the proportionate value of one foot of ground.

to be computed upon the basis of the consideration provided by his contract. That case is authority for the rule followed by the trial court in this case. In Wheeler v. Boyd, 69 Tex. 293-297, 6 S. W. 614, the court condemned an instruction which permitted two deductions on account of the shortage of land—one on the basis of the proportion arising from the relation of the amount not conveyed to the whole tract and another based upon the value of the acreage cleared in case the court should find that the property was less open than the vendor represented it to be. The case is not in point.

[6] Appellants assert that the court had no power to set aside the compromise agreement based upon the mutual belief that the vendors had the absolute right to declare a forfeiture because the final payment of the purchase money was not timely made. Even conceding (say appellants), under Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126, Boyd v. Warden, 163 Cal. 155, 124 Pac. 841, Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751, and other cases of similar import, that a waiver of the right to forfeiture of the contract without notice had resulted from their conduct as vendors, nevertheless (as they contend), the vendee's right was merely one which the court might have sustained if appealed to, and was therefore one which might be the subject of compromise. In this behalf they cite such cases as Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156-159, 58 Pac. 451; Spielberger v. Thompson, 131 Cal. 55-58, 63 Pac. 132, 678; and Rohrbacher v. Aitken, 145 Cal. 485, 78 Pac. 1054. The principle of the cited cases is that the courts favor findings declaring compromise agreements which have been made in good faith supported by considerations, even if the litigation compromised or the claims surrendered might not have been susceptible of full enforcement. But in the case at bar the vendee was entitled to full performance on tender of the final portion of the purchase price, because the Olneys had by their conduct waived those parts of the agreements of sale making time of the essence of the transaction. The course of business between the plaintiff and the defendants brought this sale under the rule declared in Boone v. Templeman, supra, and removed it from the category of contracts considered in such cases as Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 739, 93 Pac. 1007; Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 162 Cal. 539, 123 Pac. 363; and Myers v. Williams, 159 Pac. 982. Both parties acted under a mistake of law, and there was therefore no consideration for the lease. Respondent was entitled to rescind the contract of lease made by reason of mistake of law or of fact. Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 1. If plaintiff would not have consented to the lease except for the mistake of law which led to the belief that an arbitrary forfeiture of all the money paid and all the rights of the purchaser could be declared, then the corporation was entitled, upon discovery of the mistake to rescind the lease. That there was such mistake of law there can be no doubt, and we do not doubt the power of a court of equity to uphold the rescission. Hannah v. Steinman, 159 Cal. 142-146, 112 Pac. 1094.

Let the judgment be modified as indicated herein by striking from it the sum of $1,078.45 and as so modified it is affirmed. The order denying the motion of appellants for a new trial is affirmed.

ABSTRACT & TITLE GUARANTY CO. v. STATE. (Sac. 2265.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1916.)

1. TAXATION ⚡879(1) — TRANSFER TAXES — "CONTEMPLATION OF DEATH."

Under Inheritance Tax Law of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 341), imposing taxes on transfers made in contemplation of death, the term "contemplation of death" cannot be interpreted in that limited sense of expectancy which actuates a person in making a gift causa mortis, but includes transfers made in expectation of death in the future at some more or less distant time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1702; Dec. Dig. ⚡879(1).]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contemplation of Death.]

2. TAXATION ⚡879(1) — TRANSFER TAXES — GIFTS.

Under Inheritance Tax Law of 1905, imposing taxes on transfers made in contemplation of death, the adequacy of the consideration may be inquired into for the purpose of determining whether the transfer was in contemplation of death, though the law made no express provision to that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1702; Dec. Dig. ⚡879(1).]

3. TAXATION ⚡893—TRANSFER TAXES—CONSIDERATION.

Where taxes were claimed under Inheritance Tax Law of 1905 on the theory that a conveyance was in contemplation of death, evidence as to the value of the land conveyed, the monetary consideration named being nominal, is admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. ⚡893.]

4. TAXATION ⚡893—TRANSFER TAXES—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held sufficient to warrant a finding that land, claimed to be subject to transfer taxes under Inheritance Tax Law of 1905, because conveyed in contemplation of death, was worth more than $500.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. ⚡893.]

5. TAXATION ⚡880—TRANSFER TAXES—CONSIDERATION.

Where transfer taxes were claimed under Inheritance Tax Law of 1905 on land conveyed for an expressly nominal monetary consideration, the state may treat the expressed consideration as the true one, notwithstanding defendant's payment of debts due from the grantor; there being no evidence that such debts were assumed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1703, 1704; Dec. Dig. § 880.]

6. TAXATION § 893 — INHERITANCE TAXES — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to show that a conveyance of land claimed to be subject to transfer taxes under Inheritance Tax Law of 1905 was one of gift made in contemplation of death, without adequate consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 893.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Suit by the Abstract & Title Guaranty Company against the State of California. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert L. Hargrove, of Madera, G. J. Hely, John N. Anderson, of Santa Ana, and Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant. W. H. Larew, of Madera, and Robert A. Waring, of Sacramento, for the State.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued under the provisions of subdivision A et seq. of section 29 of the Inheritance Tax Law of 1905 (Stats. 1905, pp. 341, 351) to quiet its title to the real property described in the complaint, against the state's claim of lien of an inheritance tax. Defendant by its answer averred that the deed upon which plaintiff's claim of title was founded had been made by the grantor in contemplation of death, and to take the place of a testamentary disposition of the realty. After trial upon the issues joined judgment was given in favor of the state. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff's asserted title is derived through mesne conveyances from the Hely Estate Company, a corporation of which Gorges Hely's three sons and only heirs are the sole stockholders each holding an equal proportion of the stock. The important document upon which plaintiff's alleged title depends is a deed from Gorges Hely to the Hely Estate Company, dated July 10, 1908, and recorded soon thereafter. Plaintiff offered this deed in evidence. In it the grantor Gorges Hely was described as "the party of the first part," and the corporation as "the party of the second part." It provided that:

"For and in consideration of the sum of $10 gold coin, to him in hand paid by the party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, as a further and additional consideration the agreement on the part of the party of the second part to and with the first party that the second party will care for, maintain, and support in a proper and suitable manner during the balance of his life the first party, said first party does by these presents grant, bargain, sell, convey, and confirm unto said party of the second part."

After introducing at the trial the other record evidence of its title, plaintiff placed J. H. Hely on the witness stand, and he testified that following the 10th of June, 1908, the Hely Estate Company commenced to pay off the indebtedness on the land described in the deed. He enumerated payments amounting to more than $17,000, some of them made before, but more of them after the grant to the corporation by Gorges Hely. He testified:

"The amount of the indebtedness of my father, Gorges Hely, at the time this deed was made to the Hely Estate Company was, I think, about $23,000."

He did not state, however, that the assumption of the debts of Gorges Hely was a part of the consideration for the conveyance of the land to his corporation. Plaintiff then rested.

Thereafter the defendant introduced its evidence and the court gave judgment in its favor based upon findings that at the time of the conveyance to the family corporation Gorges Hely was 80 years old; that his physical condition was such that, if a reasonable man, he must have apprehended that death was likely to occur at any time; that without any material change or improvement in his physical condition death did occur a little more than 6 months after the execution of the deed; that the deed operated as a transfer of all property owned by Gorges Hely at the time; that the transaction was not a sale; that the transfer was not made for a valuable consideration; that the agreement made by the corporation to care for the old man for the remainder of his life was ultra vires and void; that the conveyance was made in contemplation of death; and that it was made in lieu of a testamentary disposition of the property. As a conclusion of law the court determined that the state of California had a lien on the land for an inheritance tax, and it was so adjudged.

[1, 2] Appellant calls attention to the difference between the phraseology of the Inheritance Tax Law of 1905 and that of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 713), and insists that since the former act is applicable to this case, we may interpret the words "contemplation of death" in the limited sense of that expectancy which actuates a person in making a gift causa mortis. We are also reminded that the words "made without valuable and adequate consideration," which are applied to gifts specified in the later act, do not occur in the earlier statute, and appellant suggests that adequacy of consideration is not an essential element to be dealt with in this action under the law of 1905. Both of these contentions have been considered by this department in Estate of Reynolds, 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268, and there rejected. In the opinion in that case Mr. Justice Henshaw said of the amendment of 1911 regarding want of valuable and adequate consideration:

"The amendment served but to clarify and not to change the pre-existing law."

Of the amendment adding to the law an express definition of the words "contemplation of death" he said:

"This amendment also served the purpose of elucidating without changing the law, by giving fuller expression to the legislative intent and meaning."

[3, 4] Another and more serious attack upon the court's findings made by appellant is that the value of the property was not shown, and that therefore the finding of inadequacy of consideration is not supported. The record reveals the fact that the defendant sought to prove the value of the land involved in this controversy by Mr. Bordon, county treasurer of Madera county and a person familiar with land values in that county. The court sustained an objection to the question upon the ground that no definite and specific sum had been proven as a consideration for the transfer of the property, but only the nominal monetary payment of $10 and the agreement on the part of the grantee to care for the octogenarian invalid, and that therefore the value of the land in money was not involved. This was error. The evidence was material. It is true, as the court ruled, that if an inheritance tax was due, an appraisalment would be necessary; but it was proper for the defendant to show, in a case of this sort, the amount and value of property deeded by the old man to his sons in return for their promise to support him. But the error did not injure the appellant because it had shown by its own witnesses that the land was of a greater value than $500, and therefore not exempt, under proper conditions, from an inheritance tax. In the first place the situation was such and the acreage was so great as to amount to some proof of substantial value. It would be very difficult, if not impossible, to find 2,000 acres of ranch land in Madera county which was of a value less than $500 at the time when this tract of that extent was transferred. Plaintiff's own witness, J. H. Hely, testified that the grantee paid a mortgage indebtedness the principal amount of which was $3,160. That mortgage was upon a portion only of the land described in the complaint, that is, "on the west half of section 16 in township 12 south of range 18 east," as Mr. Hely said while a witness for the Abstract & Title Guaranty Company. If 320 acres of the land would support such a mortgage, surely there was some evidence that the tract was of much greater value.

[5, 6] But it is contended that the state should prove a value of more than $500 beyond the $23,000 which the grantor owed when he made the transfer of the land. Plaintiff neither alleged nor proved that the assumption of the debts of Gorges Hely was a part of the consideration for the conveyance of the land to the Hely Estate Company. It proved by J. H. Hely the amount of those debts, and that some of them had been paid by the corporation; but the only proof of consideration was that involved in the introduction of the deed itself. Upon this prima facie showing the defendant was entitled to attack the expressed consideration as the true one. The attack was successful, and the court's finding in this regard was supported by abundant testimony. It was shown by the statements of the physicians who attended him at about the time when the deed was executed that Gorges Hely, who was 80 years of age, was very feeble. He was a sufferer from Bright's disease, and his circulatory organs were in a state of arterial sclerosis, resulting in a functional derangement of all the organs. He was unable to care for himself. A nurse, who attended him during the last 6½ months of his life, said that he only uttered the words "Yes" and "No" during that period, and was not able to hold an intelligent conversation. There was some evidence of his ability to read books at about this time, but there was abundant testimony of his great physical feebleness. Upon the evidence and under the principles declared in Estate of Reynolds, supra, we must hold that the essential findings are supported. These were in substance that the deed was one of gift; that it was made without adequate consideration; and that it was executed in contemplation of death.

The appellant objects to the finding that the agreement of the Hely Estate Company to care for Gorges Hely was void as being ultra vires, and calls our attention to that part of the articles of incorporation of the said company declaring one of its purposes to be as follows:

"To execute, accept, or complete contracts, documents, or instruments of all kinds."

It is not necessary for this court to decide whether or not this finding is supported, because the judgment does not invalidate the deed from Gorges Hely to the corporation composed of his sons who were also his sole heirs. The other findings amply support the judgment fixing the state's lien and, therefore, conceding the correctness of appellant's position relative to the finding of ultra vires, we cannot see how it has harmed the Abstract & Title Guaranty Company.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BROOKINGS LUMBER & BOX CO. v. MANUFACTURERS' AUTOMATIC SPRINKLER CO. et al. (L. A. 3793.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1916.)

1. CONTRACTS §212(2)—CONSTRUCTION—REASONABLE TIME FOR PERFORMANCE.

In the absence of provision in a contract for installation of fire prevention machinery as to the time within which the contract shall be completed, the installer of such machinery is entitled to a reasonable time.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ¶103(12)—POWERS OF AGENT—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a contract for the installation of fire prevention machinery provided that no alterations should be binding unless indorsed thereon by the president of the company and stated no time within which the contract was to be completed, the agent taking the contract had no authority to guarantee completion within three weeks instead of within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 290; Dec. Dig. ¶103(12).]

3. CONTRACTS ¶305(1)—PERFORMANCE—TIME OF PERFORMANCE—WAIVER.

Under a contract for installation of fire prevention machinery containing no provision as to time of completion, the purchaser waived the oral promise of the installer's agent to complete within three weeks where he permitted the work to be commenced six weeks after signing the contract and made a payment on the price nearly three months thereafter.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1011(1)—REVIEW—DECISION OF TRIAL COURT.

Where the evidence makes it a question for the trial court as to what constituted a reasonable time for performance of a contract to install fire prevention machinery, its determination on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed by the court on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3983-3988; Dec. Dig. ¶1011(1).]

5. DAMAGES ¶19 — BREACH OF CONTRACT — PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Under a contract for installation of fire prevention machinery containing no provision as to time when the contract should be completed, where the premises were destroyed, during the installation, by fire, three months after the contract was signed, and the owner had not completed his part of the contract by installing connections underground, the proximate cause of damages was the fire, and not the alleged breach of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-53; Dec. Dig. ¶19.]

6. PAYMENT ¶85(7) — RECOVERY — MISTAKE — RATIFICATION.

Where the purchaser of fire prevention machinery mailed a check which was credited on account, but claimed that it was sent through error, and later, by a statement of account, itemized such check as a payment on account, it ratified the payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 280; Dec. Dig. ¶85(7).]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by the Brookings Lumber & Box Company against the Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company and another. Judgment for defendants and order denying new trial, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for appellant. H. H. Chase, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. We will treat this as an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, although respondents contend that no efficient appeal was made from the order, owing to the failure of plaintiff to serve them with proper notice.

Plaintiff entered into a written contract on July 7, 1910, with the Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company, whereby the latter agreed for a certain consideration to install in the former's box factory an improved "wet pipe" system of automatic sprinklers and fire extinguishing apparatus. On September 22, 1910, and while the sprinkler company was putting in the pipes for the installation of said system a fire broke out in the box factory and destroyed it. The plaintiff corporation sued for $15,000 damages, alleging that when the fire occurred the work was being done in a dilatory manner; that the Manufacturers' Company had agreed to install the system within three weeks following July 10, 1910; and that if this promise had been kept or if within a reasonable time the work had been completed the fire would have been extinguished and plaintiff's loss prevented. The Automatic Sprinkler Company of America is sued as the successor to the obligations of the other corporation defendant. By a second count the latter company is sued for $500 money had and received from plaintiff on the 29th day of September, 1910.

After trial the court made findings substantially supporting defendant's contentions, namely, that the contract had been made as alleged; that the Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company had not agreed that the apparatus should be installed within three weeks from July 7, 1910; that the said corporation had not represented or warranted that its system when installed would extinguish all the fires which might originate in plaintiff's premises; that the Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company had performed its contract until prevented by the fire from doing further work; that on September 22, 1910, when the fire occurred plaintiff had not performed its part of the work, namely, the putting in of the underground supply pipes; and that had the apparatus been installed the fire could not have been extinguished. It was further found that plaintiff had a verbal agreement with an agent of the Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company that the apparatus would be installed within three weeks following July 17, 1910, but said agreement was not binding because the agent was not authorized to make it. A waiver of the alleged oral agreement was found and likewise a waiver of any breach of the contract by reason of delay in the performance thereof. The court also found that by its implied terms the written agreement was to be performed within a reasonable time, and that at the time of the discontinuance of the work a reasonable time for completing the installation had not elapsed. There were additional findings that any delay in the execution of the work was not a proximate cause of the loss by fire of plaintiff's buildings. Regarding the payment of $500 it was found that this sum was a first installment on the contract being money due under the terms thereof, and that plaintiff had waived any claim to said sum.

All of these findings are substantially supported by the testimony, and we discover no material error in the record to plaintiff's prejudice.

[1, 2] Plaintiff's counsel lay great stress upon the verbal promise made by Barney, the agent for the other contracting corporation that the installation of the sprinkler should be within three weeks, but it is evident that no dependence was placed on this promise by plaintiff's officer, Mr. Brookings, who conducted the negotiations. It is true that he testified that this agreement as to the time of installation was the controlling feature of the contract, yet he did not cause it to be put into that writing. The contract itself did not specify any particular time within which the work was to be done, and the court correctly found that therefore a reasonable time was implied. 17 Cyc. 716; Peterson v. Chaix, 5 Cal. App. 525-527, 90 Pac. 948; Standard Box Co. v. Mutual Biscuit Co., 10 Cal. App. 746-750, 103 Pac. 938. By its distinct and unequivocal language any change or modification of the terms of the contract was prohibited unless indorsed in writing upon it by the president of the Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company. This was ample notice that the agent was not empowered to vary the writing verbally. Belden v. Union Central Life Insurance Co., 167 Cal. 740, 141 Pac. 370.

[3] Moreover the plaintiff unqualifiedly waived the oral agreement by permitting the work to be started five or six weeks after the written contract was signed, and two or three weeks after it should have been completed if the oral promise had been kept. On September 15, 1910, a check for $500, the first installment on the written agreement, was sent by plaintiff to the Automatic Sprinkler Company of America. In the face of these facts it is clear that the proximate cause of the loss to plaintiff was not the failure to install the fire extinguishing apparatus within three weeks from the date of the verbal contract, and it is equally clear that the plaintiff waived any rights it may have acquired under the oral agreement.

[4] It is not necessary to analyze in detail the testimony upon the subject of the reasonable amount of time necessary to complete the work. There was testimony to the effect that the contract, under the rules of the manufacturing corporation, had to be sent to New York state for approval before the representatives of the contractor in this state could act upon it. So, also, there was testimony that the materials were only obtainable in Syracuse, N. Y., and that their shipment to Highland in this state, where the work of installation was to be done, consumed thirty-five days or more. The peculiar appliances necessary to complete the work were received by that defendant then busy installing the apparatus only on September 22d. Whether these delays were reasonable or not was a matter peculiarly for the superior court to determine, and we will not disturb the findings of that tribunal based, as they were, upon conflicting testimony.

[5] There was a sharp conflict of testimony with reference to the proportion of the work completed at the time of the fire. One of the witnesses, Mr. Goodrich, testified that he had worked in the placing of the fire extinguishing apparatus in the box factory. By the terms of the writing appellant was to put in the pipes for the underground supply, and Mr. Goodrich said that if no fire had occurred and the "underground" had been put in it would have taken him and the helper two days to complete the contract. It would have taken two days according to testimony on behalf of appellant to conduct the water into the building and to connect it with the fire-extinguishing system; therefore if the court accepted Mr. Goodrich's statement as true appellant was quite as much in default as was the contractor, and as the court justly found, if the apparatus had been installed on September 22, 1910, the fire could not have been extinguished because there would have been no water supply for the operation of the sprinklers.

Appellant's contention that the failure to complete the construction of the fire extinguishing machinery was the proximate cause of the destruction of the building by fire has no force. In this state the law is definitely settled adversely to the views expressed in the briefs filed by appellant's counsel. In Hunt Brothers Co. v. San Lorenzo Water Co., 150 Cal. 51, 87 Pac. 1093, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 913, the suit was for damages because of loss by fire against a corporation that had promised to furnish certain appliances for protection against fire, but had failed to keep its agreement. It was held in that case that where the contract had been executed to the extent of installing and commencing the contemplated service, and where both parties were acting thereunder, the one being bound for a consideration to furnish water and the other depending upon such service for the extinguishment of fires, only then could the breach of the agreement to supply water be the basis for damages because of loss by fire. The proximate cause of the loss to plaintiff was the fire, not the incomplete condition of the fire extinguishing plant. In Schaeffer Piano Manufacturing Co. v. National Fire Extinguisher Co., 148 Fed. 159, 78 C. C. A.

293, the fire extinguisher company had entered into an agreement very similar to the one here under review. In that contract as in this was a stipulation that in case of destruction of the building by fire before completion of the equipment, the piano company would be liable for the value of the materials destroyed and labor furnished up to the time of the fire. There was a conflagration which destroyed the partially completed fire extinguishing apparatus, and the court held not only that the National Company could recover for such loss, but that the piano company might not set off as against its contractor's claim damages on account of the latter's failure to complete the contract within a reasonable time. The court declared in that case the familiar rule that damages under any contract are limited to those which may be fairly considered as arising from the breach of the agreement itself or which both parties must have contemplated, when making the contract, as likely to flow from a breach.

[6] At the trial plaintiff endeavored to prove that the check for $500 was sent by mistake, and there was some showing of an attempt to stop payment on it after the fire. But by its own statement of account the plaintiff had later fixed this item as a payment on the contract. This was a ratification of the payment on account in any view of the case, and the court's finding that the money was not sent by mistake therefore finds ample support. It was alleged in the answer that this sum was applied as a credit against plaintiff's obligation to pay for materials destroyed by the fire and for work performed up to that time. While there was no definite proof that the materials and labor furnished by the sprinkler companies amounted to more than $500, there was testimony that they amounted to approximately that sum. We think the court was justified in holding that plaintiff by not demanding an accounting had waived any recovery of the $500 paid under the contract.

There are several alleged errors in admitting and excluding testimony which appellant specifies. We have examined them and find no substantial merit in any of the contentions regarding them.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BERGEN v. TULARE COUNTY POWER CO. (Sac. 2294.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1916.)

1. PLEADING $\hookrightarrow$ 18—CERTAINTY—NEGLIGENCE.

A pleading, stating several distinct acts of negligence, proof of any one of which would warrant recovery, is not subject to demurrer for uncertainty or ambiguity because plaintiff may recover upon proof of enough to make a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 64; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 18.]

2. NEGLIGENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 111(1)—PLEADING.

If it appear from the allegations of the complaint that defendant's negligence caused or contributed to the injury, it is sufficient if what was done is pleaded and alleged to have been done negligently, without stating the particular omission which made the act negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 182, 184; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 111(1).]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 1040(10)—HARMLESS ERROR—OVERRULING DEMURRER—DEFECT IN PLEADING.

Though there was error in overruling a demurrer to the complaint for ambiguity, defendant was not misled, where the case was tried on a well-defined theory, and the controversy fairly determined upon its merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4098, 4105; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1040(10); Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 567.]

4. ELECTRICITY $\hookrightarrow$ 19(4)—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

In an action against an electric company for death of a person electrocuted by a high-voltage wire, the defense being that death was caused by a fall, or by the long-continued passage of 110 volts of electricity through decedent's body, testimony of a witness as to the effect on him of a shock of 110 volts was not objectionable because there was no similarity between the physical condition of the two men, because it appeared that prior to his death deceased had been struck on the head and thereafter was subject to headaches, where there was also testimony that just prior to his death he had been in good physical condition, and that his heart had been strong and normal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 19(4).]

5. ELECTRICITY $\hookrightarrow$ 19(5)—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

In an action for death by electrocution, evidence held to show that no material change had been made in the ground wire and the ground pipe or rod, when examined by witnesses 10 and 13 days after the accident.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 19(5).]

6. EVIDENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 571(1)—EXPERT TESTIMONY—WEIGHT—ELECTRICITY.

In such action, testimony of experts as to insufficient grounding, where primary and secondary wires were in direct metallic contact with each other, and grounded through the same wire, held to support plaintiff's theory that the death occurred from faulty and negligent installation and operation by defendant of the system in use at decedent's pumping station.

7. ELECTRICITY $\hookrightarrow$ 19(4)—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

In such action, where defendant's liability was based upon its negligence in putting in the pumping plant originally, it was proper to exclude defendant's by-laws offered in evidence by it as showing decedent's duty to care for his electric plant after its installation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 19(4).]

8. DEATH $\hookrightarrow$ 99(4)—ELECTROCUTION—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Where deceased was 50 years old, and evidence showed that he earned $50 a month about half his working time, and the other half being spent in conducting his ranch, and he left a widow and minor children, a verdict of $12,500 was not excessive.

9. TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 252(20)—INSTRUCTION—DAMAGES.

In an action against an electric company for electrocution of plaintiff's decedent, where there was evidence that he had suffered some injury in a runaway two months before his death, but the physician who treated him at the time described him as a "strong, hearty man" when the accident occurred, an instruction, relating to the use of expectancy tables, was not objectionable as being inapplicable because assuming decedent was in good physical condition.

10. ELECTRICITY ¶14(1)—CARE REQUIRED.

A company furnishing electricity, although not an insurer, is required to use very great care, where it affords the means for the service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. ¶14(1).]

11. ELECTRICITY ¶19(13)—INSTRUCTION.

In an action for death by electricity escaping from a defective plant installed by an electric company, an instruction as to the care required of the company, where it affords "the means for the service," was not objectionable; the accident having occurred because of defendant's installation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. ¶19(13).]

12. ELECTRICITY ¶19(3)—INJURIES—BURDEN OF PROOF—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

In such action, where plaintiff had established the death, while deceased was exercising ordinary care, by an excessive current furnished by defendant through the electric light wire, it then devolved upon defendant to show that the excessive voltage was not due to its negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. ¶19(3).]

13. ELECTRICITY ¶19(3)—INJURIES—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

Where electricity is furnished to a system installed and operated exclusively by the owner of the premises, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has no application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. ¶19(3).]

14. TRIAL ¶244(6)—INSTRUCTIONS—EMPHASIZING DAMAGES.

In an action for death, instructions did not unduly emphasize the matter of damages because seven of them made mention of that subject.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Actions by Sarah E. Bergen, administratrix, against the Tulare County Power Company. From judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. I. Feemster, of Visalia, Chas. E. Bush, of Tulsa, Okl., and A. E. Cooley, of San Francisco, for appellant. Murry & Knupp, of Porterville, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from an adverse judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The action was one for damages sought by Sarah E. Bergen as administratrix of the estate of L. C. Bergen, deceased, on account of his death. The verdict in favor of plaintiff was for $12,500. Bergen was a rancher living near Strathmore in Tulare county. He had a wife and two minor children, the latter being at the time of his death respectively, 17 and 10 years of age. Water for irrigating the orchard on Mr. Bergen's ranch was raised from a well by means of a pumping plant operated by electricity. This plant had been installed about a year previous to Mr. Bergen's death by the defendant corporation, which is a power company engaged in furnishing electricity to its patrons by means of wires carrying heavy currents. During a few days before that upon which the accident occurred, Mr. Bergen had been having trouble with the pumping plant, and on that evening when he arrived at his home his wife told him that something was wrong with the pump. He replied that the pump was all right, but that there was not enough power coming over the wires to move both the motor and the pump. About 9 o'clock Mr. Bergen went to the pumping plant for the purpose of discovering, if possible, the cause of the trouble with the supply of power. After vainly awaiting his return for about an hour, his wife and daughter caused search to be made for him. His dead body was found in the well pit behind the pump. Deceased was in a kneeling posture, his head resting against the discharge pipe leading from the pump. In his hand was held the lamp socket on the drop cord suspended in the pit. His hands were severely burned, and the physician who examined the body declared that death resulted from electric shock. There was evidence to the effect that glass from broken lamp globes was found scattered about the place; that the motor was burned out; that the insulation on the lamp cord was badly punctured; and that the coating of the jacket which is set over the lamp socket to prevent contact between the interior electrical connection and the brass case was completely burned away over one of the terminals. Appellant delivered its current to Mr. Bergen by means of its primary power wires, which terminated at a pole a few feet from the pumping plant. The primary wires carried 6,600 volts. By means of "transformers" a current of 220 volts was taken off of these wires for the engine, and one of 110 volts for the electric lighting. Respondent's theory developed at the trial by the evidence in her behalf was that appellant in the installing of the plant had employed dangerous and unsafe connections and a deficient ground wire, with the result that a high, dangerous, and excessive current was permitted to pass from the primary side of the transformers into the secondary side, and so through the drop cord into Mr. Bergen's body.

[1] Appellant's first attack is directed against the order of the court overruling the demurrer to the complaint. That pleading set forth with some elaboration the statements that defendant improperly and carelessly constructed and installed transformers and ground wires; negligently and carelessly failed to use due care in selecting proper materials, safety devices and appliances, for reducing the current carried by the primary wires; and that by reason of the fact that defendant had permitted the transformers, ground wires, and appliances to remain in a defective condition, a high and dangerous current of electricity was permitted to pass from the primary wires into the secondary wires and into the drop cord and electric light which hung in the pit. Appellant complains of ambiguity because the words "appliances" and "appurtenances" are used in the attempted descriptions of both the primary and the secondary systems. There is no merit in this contention. The complaint clearly sets forth the theory of the accident upon which respondent relies. Appellant also complains of ambiguity in the pleading resulting in its inability to determine therefrom whether its alleged negligence consisted in improperly installing transformers, ground wires, and appliances; in lack of care in selecting proper materials and safety devices; in improper construction and maintenance of transformers, etc.; or in failing properly to operate, inspect, keep, and use the transformers, etc. The statement in a pleading of several distinct acts of negligence, proof of any one of which would entitle the pleader to a recovery, is not properly subject to demurrer for uncertainty or ambiguity because the plaintiff may recover "upon proof of enough to make a cause of action." 6 Thompson on Negligence (2d Ed.) § 7474.

[2, 3] Nor was the complaint vulnerable to the objection that the particular acts constituting the negligence of defendant were not specified. It is well settled in California that negligence may be charged in general terms. It is only necessary to plead what was done, and allege that it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which made the act negligent. But it must appear from the allegations that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury. Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29; Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663; Champagne v. Hamburger, 169 Cal. 683, 147 Pac. 954. Measured by this rule, the complaint was sufficient. The order overruling the demurrer to the complaint was a proper one. The case was tried upon a well-defined theory, and even if the complaint had contained the defects of which the demurring party complained, that litigant was not misled because the controversy was fairly determined upon its merits. Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234-237, 90 Pac. 936; Stein v. United Railroads, supra; Irrgang v. Ott, 9 Cal. App. 440-442, 99 Pac. 528.

[4] It was defendant's theory that Mr. Bergen fell from the ladder while he was going down into the pit where the pump was located, and that he was either killed by the fall or by the long-continued passage of 110 volts of electricity from the drop wire through his body. While Mr. Gardiner, an electrician, was under examination as a witness, he was asked if he had ever received a shock of 110 volts of electricity. He answered in the affirmative, over the objection of defendant's counsel. The basis of the objection was that there was no similarity between the physical conditions of the two men, because the evidence showed that a few months before his death Mr. Bergen had been struck on the head, and thereafter had been subject to headaches. The testimony was properly admitted. While it was true that there had been evidence tending to prove an injury to Mr. Bergen which had left some painful results, there had been medical testimony also to the effect that just prior to his death Mr. Bergen had been in good physical condition, and that his heart had been strong and normal at that time. It was therefore competent for plaintiff to offer evidence regarding the result of suffering a shock of 110 volts of electricity by a man of average physique and resistant powers. If the witness had been unusually powerful and capable of withstanding a heavier shock than the ordinary man, even that fact would have related more to the weight than to the admissibility of the testimony. But it does not appear that he was at all abnormal.

[5, 6] Mr. Gardiner also testified regarding the condition of the ground wire when he examined it about 10 days after the accident. Objection was made upon the ground that the time was too remote, but we cannot say that the court erred in exercising discretion in favor of the admission of this testimony. That 10 days had elapsed between the accident and the electrician's inspection of the ground wire was a fact going more to the weight than to the relevancy of this testimony. It is the contention of appellant's counsel that upon plaintiff devolved the duty of proving that no change had taken place in the condition of the ground wire and the buried pipe between the time of the accident and Mr. Gardiner's inspection of it. It is quite true that, as appellant contends, the presumption of unchanged condition is not retroactive, and that the mere production of the pipe and wire would not prove that they were in the same state 10 days after the accident as they were on that day. Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617-621, 28 Pac. 557; Cerruti Mercantile Co. v. Simi Land Co., 171 Cal. 254-256, 152 Pac. 727. But there was evidence tending to show that no change had been made during that interval. Miss Hazel Bergen testified that, so far as she knew, nothing was done between the date of the accident and the coming of Gardiner to connect the plant with the system of the Mt. Whitney Power Company, except that the defendant caused its power to be disconnected. She said:

"I was not around the plant myself and I did not see anybody else around there."

Mr. Gardiner testified that he did not touch the wire prior to the time it was examined by witness Davis, who went to the scene of the accident 13 days after Mr. Bergen's death. Davis said he was accompanied by Mr. Knupp, plaintiff's attorney. They found a ground wire and rod or pipe, and pulled the rod up. It gave no indication of having been lately tampered with, and it looked as if it had been imbedded in the earth at that place for a long time. This rod was in the same place indicated in the testimony of witness Kratzer, who had installed the wiring, and at the time of its removal it was still connected with the ground wire, running the full length of the pole. Mr. Knupp corroborated the statements of Mr. Davis. We think this testimony fairly established the fact that no material change had been made in the rod and the wire during the 13 days following the accident. Kratzer had sworn that the ground wire was attached to the pipe or rod with solder, and that the latter had been driven into the ground about five feet or nearly its entire length. The testimony of Davis, Knupp, and Gardiner was in contradiction to this statement. Gardiner said that the wire was loosely attached to the pipe, but was not soldered; and Davis testified that there never had been any good connection with solder between the wire and the ground pipe or rod, and that the latter was corroded. The rod, together with about two feet of the attached wire, was introduced in evidence. Mr. Gardiner said that if the primary and secondary wires were grounded together and the primary ground wire and rod were not sufficient, the primary voltage would go into the secondary. "In such a case," he said, "if a man attempted to turn on his light in the well pit, if he would come in contact with a bare place or some current would jump through on the socket, the primary would go on through the secondary to the ground and whatever was connected with it. If he made a better ground than the company made in this case, he would be in direct contact with the primary voltage." This testimony entirely sustained plaintiff's theory of the manner in which Mr. Bergen met his death. Mr. Davis, another electrician, gave it as his opinion that the grounding of the system at the Bergen pumping plant was unsafe, for the reason—"that the primary or high-tension wire and the secondary or low-tension wire are in direct metallic contact with each other, and also grounded through this same wire; one wire runs down the pipe. In other words, the primary ground is not grounded separate from the secondary; they are both tied together with a common ground."

Continuing he said:

"The effect is this: If you remove that ground wholly, your primaries and secondaries are in direct metallic connection with each other. The only difference in the potential you would have would be due to the subtraction of the windings of the transformer, which would be a small amount."

The witness was asked the further question:

"If this ground was insufficient and the primary and the secondary sides of the transformer were connected as Mr. Kratzer has described them here, what would be the effect upon a person who attempted to turn on a light in the pit?"

Over objection he answered:

"I should say that he would be very apt to replace that defective ground with his body."

Mr. Noble, a graduate of and a former assistant professor of electrical engineering in the University of California testified that 110 volts, the normal current in the lighting circuit at the Bergen plant, would not, in his opinion, injure a man in good health having a normal heart. He also gave it as his opinion that in the wiring of the Bergen place the method which had been followed was very unusual and dangerous. He said:

"The danger lies in the fact that the primary or high-voltage side and the secondary or low-voltage side of the transformer are connected together, and then are connected to a ground wire. The loosening of that ground wire, or severing of that ground wire, from its ground connections would immediately cause a considerable rise in the voltage between the secondary, low-tension wires and the ground."

Prof. Noble also testified as follows:

"If the ground were totally deficient in this case and a person came in contact with the lamp cord in the pit under the circumstances testified to in this case, he would get, in my opinion, in the neighborhood of 2,800 volts between the wires on the low-tension side and the ground, assuming that the ground connections became totally loose."

He also inspected the ground wire and pipe or rod which were brought into court, and gave it as his opinion that they would not make a good ground. This witness also examined the lamp cord and socket which had been found in the hand of the dead man, and gave it as his opinion that their conditions indicated the passage of a current of high potentiality greatly in excess of 110 volts.

This evidence fully supported plaintiff's theory that decedent met his death by reason of the faulty and negligent installation and operation of the system in use at the pumping station on the Bergen ranch.

[7] There was no error committed by the court in refusing to admit defendant's by-laws in evidence. We can see no possible connection between said by-laws and the defendant's obligations to plaintiff's decedent. It is argued that they might have shown Mr. Bergen's duty to care for his own electric plant after its installation, but defendant's liability was based upon its negligence in putting in the pumping plant originally.

[8] The amount of damages was not excessive. Appellant attacks the verdict upon the ground that Mr. Bergen's earning capacity was but $50 a month, and, counting his life expectancy as 16 years, the greatest possible pecuniary loss would be about $9,600, assuming that his earning capacity would have remained the same if he had lived. The evidence showed, however, that he earned $50 a month during about half of his working time, and that the other half of his time was spent in conducting his ranch. The jury was justified also in considering the loss to the widow and the minors due to the deprivation of the comfort, society, protection, and support of the husband and father.

[9] We find no error in the instructions. Appellant attacks instructions numbered 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12. The first of these related to the use of mortality or expectancy tables, and was based upon an instruction approved in Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156-168, 47 Pac. 1019. The objection made to the giving of such an instruction is that it is applicable to the case of a man in good physical condition, while Mr. Bergen was the victim of a recent injury which had impaired his health. It is true that there was some evidence that he had suffered injuries in a runaway which occurred about two months before his death, but the physician who had treated him at that time described him as a "strong hearty man" when the accident occurred.

[10, 11] Instruction No. 9 related to the great care exacted of companies like defendant engaged in furnishing that dangerous commodity, electricity. The jurors were told that such a company is not an insurer, but where it affords "the means for the service," it is required to use "very great care." Appellant's counsel say that the instruction is erroneous because of the use of the expression "very great care." There is no force in this objection. Giraudi v. Electric Imp. Co., 107 Cal. 120-124, 40 Pac. 108, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114; Tackett v. Henderson Bros. Co., 12 Cal. App. 658, 108 Pac. 151; Fairbairn v. American River Electric Co., 170 Cal. 115-118, 148 Pac. 788. The instruction is not open to the criticism that it would lead the jury to believe that defendant owned and controlled all of the instrumentalities for the application of electric power, including the machinery and wires of the pumping station itself. There was no question but that defendant had installed all of the instrumentalities owned and used by Mr. Bergen, and in that sense it had afforded means for the service. The instruction was approved by the Supreme Court of Alabama in Alabama City, etc., R. R. Co. v. Appleton, 171 Ala. 324-331, 54 South. 638, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1181.

Defendant criticizes the tenth instruction upon the ground that it failed to apprise the jury of Mr. Bergen's duty to exercise ordinary care, but the instruction in terms does state his duty in that regard. In brief, it informed the jury that if by reason of defendant's installation of dangerous connections and defective ground wires an excessive voltage of electricity was permitted to enter the drop cord in the pit, and if plaintiff's intestate "while using ordinary care" came into contact with the cord and was killed, plaintiff was entitled to recover.

[12, 13] The eleventh instruction stated the rule that if plaintiff had established by a preponderance of evidence the death of her decedent while he was exercising ordinary care, by an excessive and dangerous current furnished by defendant through the electric light wire, it then devolved upon defendant to show that the excessive voltage was not due to its negligence. This did not unduly extend the doctrine res ipsa loquitur as appellant complains that it did. Such control as Mr. Bergen exercised over the equipment of his pumping station could not have resulted in an increase of the voltage; therefore the presence of a death-dealing current in the wire through which defendant had contracted to furnish a current of 110 volts was sufficient to afford reasonable evidence of negligence on its part. It is the rule in this state that where electricity is furnished to a system installed and operated exclusively by the owner of the premises the doctrine res ipsa loquitur has no application. Hill v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 22 Cal. App. 788, 136 Pac. 492. But where the defendant in such a case had some control of the situation, either by reason of its construction or its operation of plaintiff's plant, a showing of accident without plaintiff's fault shifts the burden of proof. The jury was carefully instructed that the mere happening of the accident raised no presumption of defendant's negligence.

The twelfth instruction was in its material part a quotation of section 3281 of the Civil Code, defining damages. It had no tendency to impress the jury, as appellant fears, with the idea that the corporation was a law-breaker.

[14] The final criticism of the instructions is that they unduly emphasized the matter of damages because seven of them made mention of that subject. No objection is urged to the substance of these instructions, but we are told that devoting so much attention to the matter of damages might well have led the jurors to believe plaintiff entitled to compensation. With equal force it might be said that the court's elaboration upon that subject might have caused jurors to devote great care to the consideration of the evidence before they could feel justified in awarding a verdict requiring defendant to pay damages. Defendant's point has the charm of novelty, but possesses no substantial merit.

Other questions discussed in the briefs do not require consideration here, as they are substantially covered by that which is written above.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

KIRKPATRICK et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 2044.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 12, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT $\hookrightarrow$ 417(7)—INJURY TO SERVANT — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CONCLUSIVENESS OF FINDINGS.

Where the evidence tends to support the Industrial Accident Commission's finding of fact that the employé, when fatally injured, was in the employ of his employer, though furnished to another, such finding is final, and will not be reviewed on certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 417(7).]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT $\hookrightarrow$ 361—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — "EMPLOYER" — "EMPLOYÉ" — STATUTE.

Under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 284) §§ 13, 14, defining "employer" to include every person who has any person in service under a contract of hire, express or implied, and "employé" to include every person in the service of an employer, one regularly employed as a driver and teamster for one engaged in contract teaming, who was directed to take a team and haul lumber for another party, and who used his employer's horse and the other party's wagon when the fatal accident occurred, was then in the employ of his regular employer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 361.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Employer.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT $\hookrightarrow$ 361—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—"IMMEDIATE EMPLOYER"—STATUTE.

In such case, the regular employer of the decedent did not stand in any different relation than that of an "immediate employer," as those words are used in Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 294), § 30, subd. d(1), providing that the liability imposed by the section upon a principal and general contractor, when other than the immediate employer, shall exist only where the injury occurred on or in or about the premises on which the principal general contractor or intermediate contractor has undertaken to do any work, or where such premises or work are otherwise under his control.

Writ of Review to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act by James McLeod to obtain compensation for the death of his son, Jay McLeod, opposed by Roy Kirkpatrick, employer, and the Southwestern Surety Insurance Company, insurer. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer and the insurer petition for writ of review as to such order. Award affirmed.

Hickcox & Crenshaw, of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. A writ was issued in this proceeding to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission whereby it awarded to the dependent parents of one Jay McLeod compensation for his accidental death while in the employ of Roy Kirkpatrick, defendant in that case and one of the petitioners herein. Jay McLeod was regularly employed by Kirkpatrick as a driver and teamster in connection with Kirkpatrick's business, which was that of contract teaming and hauling. On that day the Blinn Lumber Company requested the Pasadena Transfer Company to furnish a team and driver for the delivery of some lumber. The Pasadena Transfer Company called upon Kirkpatrick to furnish a team and driver to fill this order. Thereupon Kirkpatrick directed McLeod to take his team and do the hauling required. As Kirkpatrick did not have a wagon suitable for hauling lumber, a wagon of the Pasadena Transfer Company was used. While using said wagon and the horses of Kirkpatrick in hauling lumber for the Blinn Lumber Company, the accident occurred which resulted in the death of McLeod. The Southwestern Surety Insurance Company is the insurance carrier for Kirkpatrick and had insured him against liability for compensation for injuries sustained by his employés in connection with his business.

Petitioners' first contention is that at the time of the accident McLeod was not the employé of Kirkpatrick, but was the employé of the Blinn Lumber Company, and that therefore Kirkpatrick was not liable for compensation to McLeod or to his dependents. The argument is based upon rules which often have been enforced in cases arising out of injuries to third persons through negligence of employés, and cases arising out of negligence resulting in injuries to employés, wherein it became necessary to determine who was the employer or master responsible for the acts of the servant or liable for injuries to the servant. It has sometimes been held that, where the direct or immediate employer furnishes his servant to a third person to do work of the latter and places the employé under the exclusive control of such third person in the performance of the work, the employé becomes for that particular purpose the servant of him to whom the employé is furnished, with resultant responsibility on the part of the employer whose work is being done. An instance of this kind is shown in Cotter v. Lindgren, 106 Cal. 602, 39 Pac. 950, 46 Am. St. Rep. 255. It was there held that the defendant, who was the first or general employer of the servants whose negligence caused plaintiff's injuries, was not responsible for their negligence, because the work in which the servants were employed was not work of the defendant, and the defendant had not at that time the control or right to control or supervise the conduct of the servants in doing that work.

[1] But even in negligence cases it does not always follow that the general employer is freed from responsibility by the mere act of hiring out his employes to third persons to be used by them in the performance of their work. Thus in Stewart v. California Improvement Co., 131 Cal. 125, 63 Pac. 177, 724, 52 L. R. A. 205, the defendant company had employed one Conger as engineer to manage a steam roller owned by it. The steam roller, with the engineer in charge, was hired out by the company to the city of Oakland for use in rolling and leveling a street, such use being under the direction of the superintendent of streets. The plaintiff suffered injuries caused by negligence of the engineer, who carelessly let off steam from the engine without giving warning thereof, thereby frightening the plaintiff's horse. It was held that under the given circumstances the relation of master and servant existed between the defendant company and its engineer, and not between the city of Oakland and said engineer. "Here the city simply hired the use of the street roller outfit from the defendant company—to wit, the roller, engine, and the engineer to manage the same—for so much a day. The city's agent—foreman of the street superintendent—only directed or supervised how and where the street should be rolled; he did not have the control or management of the engine; this was subject entirely to the judgment of the engineer, the servant of the owner, the defendant company, who had selected and employed him for that special purpose, paid him his wages, and had the sole right to discharge him." So here, the Industrial Accident Commission may well have concluded from the evidence that the Blinn Lumber Company simply hired the use of the team and driver to deliver its lumber, without in any way interfering with the control or management of the team by McLeod as servant of Kirkpatrick, who had selected and employed him for that special purpose, who paid him his wages and had the sole right to discharge him. The evidence thus tending to support the Commission's finding of fact to the effect that McLeod at the time of receiving his injuries was in the employ of Kirkpatrick, such findings are final and will not be reviewed in this proceeding, since they present only questions of fact and not of law.

[2] The Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, in sections 13 and 14 thereof, furnishes its own definition of the terms "employer" and "employé." The term "employer" includes every person who has any person in service under any contract of hire, express or implied. The term "employé" includes every person thus in the service of such employer. The decisions in negligence cases such as those above mentioned are not necessarily controlling in cases like the present; for the liability of the employer in this case arises, not from any wrong done by him, but from the statute, which imposes such liability upon persons bearing toward each other the relation of employer and employé as defined in the statute. While this appears to be the first case in this state in which the courts have been called upon to review an award of the Commission for injuries received by an employé hired out by one employer to another, the same questions have been presented under the Workmen's Compensation Acts in other states.

In Dale v. Saunders Bros. (N. Y.) 112 N. E. 571, the award was made to a widow and children for the death of one Frank Dale. The general employer in that case, like Kirkpatrick in this case, was engaged in the teaming business and in hiring out teams with drivers for trucking purposes. Dale was sent with a team to work for one Walsh, by taking sand from Walsh's sand pit and delivering it to his customers. The Court of Appeals, after referring to the rules which we also have mentioned as applied in negligence cases, declared that the question in this case was not one of responsibility for negligent injuries inflicted upon strangers, nor upon an employé; that the doctrine of respondeat superior had no application there, nor were the rules of employers' liability for negligence controlling—and it was held that Dale was working for Saunders Bros. as a teamster; that he was engaged in teaming, not in the operation of a sand pit. In like manner it might be said in the present case that McLeod was engaged in teaming, which was the business of Kirkpatrick, and not in the lumber business, which was the business of the Blinn Lumber Company.

In Rongo v. Waddington & Sons, 87 N. J. Law, 395, 94 Atl. 408, a similar case arose. There the Supreme Court of New Jersey determined that the petitioner, who had been injured in the course of his employment, was the employé of Waddington & Sons, the contracting teamsters, who employed him by the day, and who had let him out for the day to haul sand and other building materials for a third person. In this, as in the New York case, the terms of the statute were not identical with those of the California statute. They are sufficiently alike, however, to indicate the trend of opinion. In the New Jersey case it was determined that the person to whom the team and driver had been furnished by Waddington & Sons could not be held liable as the employer. He "had no direct dealings with the petitioner; he had nothing to say on the question how much wages petitioner should be paid; the only contract that he made was a contract with Waddington for the supply of a team, consisting of a wagon, horses, and driver, for which he paid as a team. There was, of course, ample evidence to justify an award as against Waddington, and this is what we think the court ought to have done."

[3] Petitioners further contend that "Kirkpatrick, not being the immediate employer, would be considered as a principal and in-intermediate contractor, and would be excluded from liability under subdivision 1 of subdivision 'd,' section 30 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act." Even without taking into consideration the effect of section 30 under the construction given to it in Carstens v. Pillsbury, 158 Pac. 218, and Sturdivant v. Pillsbury, 158 Pac. 222, we are of opinion that Kirkpatrick does not occupy any different relation than that of an "immediate employer," as those words are used in said section 30.

Finally, petitioners contend that the act under consideration, so far as it provides or attempts to provide for compensation to others than employes, is unconstitutional. This question has been determined adversely to petitioners' contention, by a recent decision of the Supreme Court. Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 156 Pac. 491.

The award is affirmed.

DELLARINGA v. HOOKER et al. (Civ. 1389.)
(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 12, 1916.)

APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 1133—FAILURE TO OFFER ARGUMENT TO SUSTAIN APPEAL.

In an action to quiet title, where, prior to plaintiff's request for dismissal, a defendant had answered, setting up ownership and asking for an adjudication in his favor, and plaintiff, on appeal from an order made on defendant's motion directing that the order of dismissal entered on plaintiff's request be set aside, being advised of the suggestion of defendant's counsel at the time for oral argument that the controversy had been settled, and that only moot questions were now involved, fails to furnish any stipulation on which to authorize the court to enter order of dismissal, the court will affirm, the record showing no reason why the order should be disturbed, being left without argument offered by plaintiff to sustain his appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by Luvisa Dellaringa against E. T. Hooker and others. From an order, made on motion of defendant Hooker, directing that an order of dismissal of the action theretofore entered upon the written request of plaintiff's attorneys be set aside, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

W. W. Kaye, Rowen Irwin, and Emmons & Hudson, all of Bakersfield, for appellant. John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This appeal was taken from an order of the superior court made on the motion of defendant E. T. Hooker. This order directed that an order of dismissal of the action theretofore entered upon the written request of the attorneys for the plaintiff be set aside. The action was to quiet title, and defendant Hooker had answered prior to the request made for the dismissal of the action, in which answer he set up ownership in the property in controversy and asked for an adjudication to be made in his favor. A clerk's transcript was prepared under the alternative method of appeal, and that is the only document which has been filed in this court. At the time set for oral argument, no counsel for appellant appeared, and counsel for respondent being present stated that the controversy had been settled, and that only moot questions were therefore now involved. However, the appellant, upon being advised of the suggestion made, has failed to furnish any stipulation upon which to authorize the court to enter an order of dismissal. We are left without any argument offered by the appellant to sustain the appeal taken. An examination of the record discloses to our minds no reason why the order of the court should be disturbed.

The order is affirmed.

Ex parte DUPES. (Cr. 513.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 17, 1916.)

1. DIVORCE $\S$ 312 — ACTION — CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—APPEAL—STATUTE.

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 946, 949, provide that the perfection of an appeal stays all further proceedings upon the judgment or order appealed from. Petitioner's husband brought an action for divorce and for the custody of the minor children, and petitioner asked a divorce and custody, and, pending the trial, the court awarded their custody to her, and on findings that the husband was entitled to a divorce, and that petitioner was unfit to have their custody, awarded their custody to him, and, after petitioner's appeal had been perfected, vacated the temporary order and gave their custody to the husband. Held, that the appeal stayed all proceedings and deprived the trial court of jurisdiction to make any order pending the appeal, so that its findings, its decree, and its order, awarding custody to the husband, constituted no ground for his asserted right to their custody.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 806; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 312.]

2. DIVORCE $\S$ 312—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—FITNESS—APPEAL.

Pending such appeal a new proceeding involving the same question as determined therein respecting petitioner's fitness to have the custody of minor children could not be based thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 806; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 312.]

Petition for writ of habeas corpus by Eugenia N. Dupes against T. W. Dupes to secure the custody of petitioner's two minor children. Ordered that the custody of the minors be surrendered and restored to petitioner.

MacKnight & Fitzgerald and P. N. Myers, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Chas. N. Sears and E. J. Emmons, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The facts are as follows: On February 25, 1916, T. W. Dupes filed a complaint in the superior court of Kern county, wherein he prayed for a decree of divorce from Eugenia N. Dupes and the award to him of the care, custody, and control of Janice and Bernard Dupes, minor children of the parties, who, it appears, were at the time living with their mother. By answer and cross-complaint Eugenia N. Dupes asked that she be awarded the decree of divorce and likewise awarded the care and custody of the children; each of said parents alleging the other's unfitness to have control of them. Pending the trial an order was issued to Eugenia N. Dupes requiring her to show cause why an order should not be made awarding the custody of the children to their father, and this matter coming on for hearing, the court, pursuant to stipulation of the parties, on March 6, 1916, made an order, subject to such further order as might be made, awarding the custody of the children to the mother. The case was tried, and on July 22, 1916, the court made findings in said action upon which, as a conclusion of law, it found that T. W. Dupes was entitled to a decree of divorce and that Eugenia N. Dupes was unfit to have the custody and care of the minor children, and awarding their custody to the father. Three days thereafter, to wit, on July 25, 1916, the defendant in said action, Eugenia N. Dupes, perfected an appeal from said interlocutory judgment. After the appeal had been perfected, and on July 26, 1916, the court made an order reciting that whereas, before the hearing of said action upon its merits, to wit, on March 6, 1916, an order had been made awarding the care, custody, and control of said minor children to the defendant Eugenia N. Dupes, and the court, having at the conclusion of the trial of the action found that defendant was not a fit and proper person to have the care of said children, and it having appeared by the evidence introduced that T. W. Dupes was a proper person to whom their care and custody should be awarded, ordered that said temporary order made on the 6th day of March, 1916, be vacated, and the care, custody, and control of said children awarded to their father, T. W. Dupes. Thereafter, on July 31, 1916, the court by an order directed the sheriff of Kern county to take into his custody and deliver to the court said Janice and Bernard Dupes, to be disposed of according to the order of court, and further ordered that a copy of the order so made be delivered to the mother then having possession of the children. The sheriff complied with this order and took from the mother the possession of the children and produced them in court; whereupon, on the same day, to wit, July 31, 1916, the court ordered the sheriff to immediately deliver the children to their father.

By the return made in response to the writ T. W. Dupes bases his right to the custody, care, and control of the minors upon the findings of fact showing petitioner's unfitness to have charge of the children, and upon the interlocutory decree made July 22, 1916, awarding the custody of the children to the plaintiff in said action, and also upon the order of the superior court made after the perfecting of the appeal from said interlocutory decree (and which said order purported to vacate and set aside the order awarding the custody of the children to Eugenia N. Dupes on March 6, 1916), pursuant to which the sheriff was on July 31, 1916, directed to take possession of the children and deliver them to the father.

[1] The effect of the perfecting of an appeal is to stay all further proceedings upon the judgment or order appealed from or matters embraced therein in the court below. Sections 946, 949, Code Civ. Proc. It operates to remove the subject-matter of the adjudication from the jurisdiction of the court below pending the appeal, and suspends the power of that court to enforce its order until the appeal is determined. Ex parte Queirolo, 119 Cal. 635, 51 Pac. 956.

"The effect of the appeal is to remove the subject-matter of the order from the jurisdiction of the lower court, and that court is without power to proceed further as to any matter embraced therein until the appeal is determined." Vosburg v. Vosburg, 137 Cal. 493, 70 Pac. 473.

The fitness of the respective parties as custodians of the children was one of the issues involved in the action and tried by the court, and as to which it found the mother, Eugenia N. Dupes, was not a proper person to have control of the children, that the father was a fit person to whom the control should be awarded, and so ordered.

The mother, however, under and by virtue of the order of March 6th awarding her the custody of the children, had possession of them, and, since the stay of proceedings pending appeal has the legitimate effect of keeping the subject thereof in the condition in which it was when the stay of proceedings was granted (Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 113, 43 Pac. 580), it would seem clear that the decree from which the appeal was perfected should constitute no ground upon which respondent could found his right to the custody of the children. This being true, the order awarding their custody to T. W. Dupes, as embodied in the decree from which the appeal was perfected, left in full force and effect the order of March 6th, under which petitioner was awarded control of the children. Since by perfecting the appeal the subject of the litigation was removed from the lower court, it would seem equally clear that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order of July 31st purporting to vacate and annul the order of March 6th, and directing the sheriff to take the children from the mother and deliver them to the father. Our conclusion is that the appeal stayed all proceedings upon the decree and order embraced therein and removed the case from the trial court, thus depriving it of jurisdiction to make any order as to the subject-matter thereof pending the appeal. Hence neither the findings, decree based thereon, nor the order made after the appeal was taken purporting to vacate the order of March 6th constitute any ground for respondent's asserted right to the control and custody of said minors. See Vosburg v. Vosburg, and Ex parte Queirolo, supra.

[2] It is also claimed that petitioner is not a fit and proper person to have the care and control of said minors. Specific acts of neglect of the children occurring prior to the trial and a course of misconduct pursued by petitioner prior thereto are set forth in the return, to prove which numerous affidavits are presented. These affidavits, however, relate to acts of omission and commission on the part of petitioner, as stated, occurring before the trial of the issues involved in the litigation and therein relied upon to show her unfitness. Pending the appeal a new proceeding involving the same question cannot be based thereon.

It is ordered that the custody of said Bernard Dupes and Janice Dupes be by T. W. Dupes, the respondent herein, surrendered and restored to petitioner, Eugenia N. Dupes.

KRAMER v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 2088.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—§361—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—INJURY TO "JANITOR"—"HORTICULTURAL LABOR."

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 284) § 14, excluding from its operation employes engaged in horticultural labor, where a janitor of a dancing hall and dwelling house was injured by stepping on a palm thorn while pruning a fig tree on a lot adjacent to his employer's, used in part for a garage, the servant was not entitled to compensation, as, when injured, he was engaged in "horticultural labor," the labor of caring for grass lawns, trees, shrubbery, and flowers, and not engaged as a "janitor," a person employed to take charge of a building and rooms therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §361.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Janitor.]

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Oscar Ohlsson for compensation for personal injuries, opposed by Henry J. Kramer, the employer. There was an award by the Industrial Accident Commission, and to review its action the employer petitions for certiorari. Award set aside and annulled.

Jones & Evans and Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, all of Los Angeles (Norman S. Sterry, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner. F. M. Shepard, of Los Angeles, and Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Certiorari to review the action of the industrial accident commission in awarding benefits to Oscar Ohlsson, an employé of petitioner Henry J. Kramer.

[1] The findings are, unfortunately, meager in detailing the facts upon which the commission based its conclusion. Such being the case, we may refer to the evidence, not to vary or contradict the findings of fact, but for the purpose of explaining or supplementing the same. Matter of Rheinwald, 168 App. Div. 425, 153 N. Y. Supp. 598. It appears that Ohlsson was an employé of Kramer, who conducted a dancing academy in a building which was also used by him for the purpose of a residence. Adjoining the lot upon which this building stood was a lot, upon the rear of which there was a garage, reached by a driveway from the street, along which there grew some peach and palm trees, the branches of which overhung the driveway, thus interfering with the free use thereof, and some 25 feet from which was a growing fig tree. Kramer did not own this adjoining lot, but was permitted by the owner thereof to use the garage, and Ohlsson had been directed by Kramer to trim the branches of the palm and peach trees which overhung the driveway. On both lots were plots of grass, flowers, trees, and shrubbery. The evidence, without conflict, shows that Ohlsson was employed by Kramer in the capacity of a janitor, the duties of which position were to take charge of the rooms, sweep and dust the same, and in general keep them in order, and also employed as a gardener to look after and care for the grass, flowers, shrubbery, and trees growing upon both lots, and that he performed services in both capacities.

The commission found:

That Ohlsson was injured by accident "while in the employment of * * * Henry J. Kramer as a janitor of a dancing hall and house and garden laborer." (2) "That said accident and injury arose out of and happened in the course of said employment, and occurred while the said employé was performing service growing out of, incidental to, and in the course of his employment, and was as follows: While pruning a fig tree upon a lot adjacent to that occupied by his employer, and in part used by such employer, a garage used by such employer being located thereon, and the driveway thereto on such property having along its border palm and peach trees which applicant had been instructed to trim, applicant stepped upon and was pierced in the ankle by a palm thorn, which occasioned serious disability. That the pruning of such fig tree without specific instructions so to do did not constitute misconduct on the part of the applicant or take him outside the scope of his employment, but was such an act as any employé might reasonably perform incidental to the course of his employment."

[2] It thus appears that Ohlsson was employed in a dual capacity; that is, in the capacity of a janitor for a dancing hall and a house and garden laborer. A janitor is defined to be "one who is employed to take care of a public building." As generally understood, the term refers to a person employed to take charge of a building and rooms therein and keep the same clean and in order. Fagan v. Mayor, 84 N. Y. 348. For the purpose of this case we may assume that the employment of a person in such capacity brings him within the operation of the statute. Section 14 of the act excludes from its operation employés engaged in farm, agricultural, or horticultural labor, or in household domestic service. In the light of the evidence we construed the finding that Ohlsson was employed as a house and garden laborer, as referring to household domestic service mentioned in section 14, and the caring for the flowers, grass, trees, and shrubbery growing upon the two lots. In other words, the service performed by Ohlsson as a house laborer consisted of household domestic service, while that performed by him in the capacity of a garden laborer consisted in horticultural labor. Clearly the labor of caring for grass lawns, trees, shrubbery, and flowers is horticultural in character. See definitions of "horticulture" in Standard Dictionary and American Encyclopedia. Ohlsson was thus employed for the performance of services in two capacities: One that of janitor, falling within the terms of the act; the other as a house and garden laborer; employés engaged therein being excluded from its operation. Hence, if the injury sustained by Ohlsson was due to an accident while he was engaged in labor as and under his employment as a gardener, he would not be entitled to the benefits of the act, unless the service was incidental to the work of janitor. The pruning of this fig tree without specific instructions so to do might well be regarded as within the scope of his employment as gardener, since the proper care thereof required such work to be done. It did not, however, interfere with the use of the driveway, and the pruning thereof had no connection with the work of janitor which by any stretch of the imagination could render it incidental thereto. Therefore the conclusion of law as found by the commission that at the time of the injury "the applicant employé was not engaged in any of the occupations or employments excepted by section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act from the provisions of said act" is without support in the facts found. Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 170 Cal. 782, 151 Pac. 277. The New York Compensation Act does not apply to all employés, but to those only engaged in certain occupations there designated as extrahazardous, while the California act applies to all except those designated as being excluded when engaged in certain work. This being true, the decisions of the New York courts in like cases furnish a rule which we think should be followed in the case at bar. In the case of Gleisner v. Gross, 170 App. Div. 37, 155 N. Y. Supp. 946, a part of the duties of an employé was to operate boilers and elevators, designated as extrahazardous. He had other duties to perform, however, which were not within those so classed by the Legislature, and was injured while performing some of the latter duties. In holding that he was not entitled to recover, the court said:

"Regardless of the contractual or colloquial designation of the duties or position of an injured employé, the question remains in every instance as to the work which he was in fact doing and the extent to which his work came within the category of the enumerated employments. The actuality, rather than the appellation, is the sound basis for the commission's action in determining whether an employé met with mishap in the course of an enumerated employment."

In the case of In re Sickles, 171 App. Div. 108, 156 N. Y. Supp. 864, the defendant was engaged as warehouseman in storing fruit, and also engaged in buying and selling fruits. An employé of the defendant was engaged part of the time in connection with defendant's business as a warehouseman, designated as extrahazardous, and part of the time as a salesman in buying and selling fruit, which latter calling was not within the operation of the statute. He was injured while engaged in the latter business, and it was held that he was not entitled to recover compensation therefor. The court there said:

"The difficulty is that the employer was engaged in two entirely distinct kinds of business, one of which was not within the protection of the statute, and that the claimant was injured in performance of his duties, which at the time of the injury, solely had reference to that kind of business not thus protected."

So, too, where an employé of a common carrier engaged in both intra and inter state transportation is injured, his right to recover under the federal statute will depend upon the character of his service at the time of his injury; that is, if at the time of the injury he was engaged in interstate work, he may recover under federal statute; otherwise his rights are measured by the state law. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Behrens, 233 U. S. 473, 34 Sup. Ct. 646, 58 L. Ed. 1051, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 163; Colasurdo v. Central R. R. Co. of N. J. (C. C.) 180 Fed. 832; Erie R. Co. v. Jacobus, 221 Fed. 335, 137 C. C. A. 151. Our conclusion is that the injury sustained by Ohlsson arose out of and was in the course of his employment, not as a janitor, but while engaged in garden labor, which is in the nature of and included within the term horticultural labor, for which he is not entitled to the benefit of the act.

The award is therefore set aside and annulled.

DIVORCE — 201—PROCEEDINGS—APPLICATION FOR ALLOWANCE—RIGHT TO PRIOR HEARING.

Where plaintiff in a divorce action alleges that she has been a resident of the state for 1 year and of the county for the 90 days next preceding her action as required by Civ. Code, § 128, and makes the verified assertion that she is without means to prosecute the action, she is entitled to have her application for allowances heard in advance of a motion to dismiss the suit, on the ground that the court has not jurisdiction of either party, as said section does not impose any limitation on jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 591, 592; Dec. Dig. —201.]

Petition for writ of mandate by Louise B. Dahne against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of San Diego. Peremptory writ of mandate ordered issued.

C. C. Kempley and Holcomb & Kempley, all of San Diego, for petitioner. W. Jefferson Davis, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Petition for mandate to compel the superior court of the county of San Diego to hear and determine the application of Louise B. Dahne made for the purpose of securing to her in a divorce action against Eugenio Dahne an allowance to cover attorney's fees, court costs, and alimony pendente lite. This petitioner filed her complaint in due form in the superior court, alleging, among other things, that she had resided in the state for 1 year and in the county of San Diego for 90 days next preceding the commencement of her action, and further set forth that she was without means or money with which to prosecute the action. The complaint was duly verified. The matter of her application for the allowance referred to first coming on to be heard, the defendant filed a demurrer, alleging among other grounds that the court had no jurisdiction over his person. He also made a motion to quash the service of summons and dismiss the action on the ground that he was not a resident of the state of California, but was a resident of Brazil, and that he was in the state of California for a temporary purpose as representative of the department of agriculture, industry, and commerce of the government of Brazil. The argument is made that the domicile of the husband is in law the domicile of the wife, and that as the defendant was a Brazilian subject and had no intention of remaining permanently in the state, the wife could claim no residence here sufficient to entitle her to bring an action for divorce. We do not understand the law to be that a citizen of a foreign country may not, even under the alleged facts asserted by petitioner's husband, be deemed in a divorce action to have acquired such residence as the Code (Civ. Code, § 128) requires. But that is a matter which need not here be considered. Counsel for the defendant insisted upon the right to have the question of the plaintiff's residence determined in advance of the hearing on the application for an allowance of attorney's fees and costs, and in this contention he was sustained by the trial judge who, as appears from the petition and return herein, has refused to consider the motion for such allowances. On the other hand, the court proposes to proceed in advance of the trial of the case to a hearing of the motion to dismiss the suit and to determine the truth of the allegation of plaintiff's complaint that she has been a resident of the state of California for a period of 1 year and of the county of San Diego for a period of 90 days next preceding the commencement of her action. The question presented is as to whether the plaintiff, this petitioner, in view of her verified assertion that she is without means to live or prosecute the action, is entitled to have her application heard in advance of the trial of the main issues. As appears from the petition, the trial judge is of the opinion that the question of the plaintiff's residence, where challenged, must be first established before any jurisdiction rests in the court to make to her any allowance provided to be made under the provisions of the Civil Code. We cannot agree with the view taken by the learned trial judge on that proposition. In the case of Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 100 Pac. 1086, it is said:

"Section 128 of the Civil Code, relative to residence of the plaintiff, does not impose any limitation on the jurisdiction of the superior court in the matter of divorces, but simply prescribes certain facts essential to the making out of a case warranting a divorce, and allegations in regard to residence stand upon the same footing as any other allegation of facts showing the right to a divorce."

Admitting, as we must for the purpose of this motion, that the petitioner is without means to prosecute her divorce action, is to admit that she is without means of meeting the objection raised by the defendant as to one of the material issues in the case. That issue is to be treated as any other issue of fact, and the wife should in a proper case be furnished with funds by her husband in order that she may employ counsel and produce such evidence as may be available to her. To say that she is entitled to have her motion for a preliminary allowance heard by the court before being required to meet the defendant on issues regularly proposed by the complaint is not to say that the court must make such allowance, for that is a matter which the discretion of the trial judge will regulate altogether upon the hearing of the motion. But it appears clear to us that the petitioner is entitled to have her application considered in advance of the determination of any question of residence which the defendant has sought to interpose in advance of the trial.

Peremptory writ of mandate is ordered to be issued, requiring respondent superior court to proceed in accordance with the conclusions expressed in this opinion; petitioner to have her costs.

HARTNETT v. WILSON et al. (Civ. 2005.)

1. GAMING $\S$ 37—MARGIN TRANSACTIONS—RECOVERY OF COLLATERAL—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Under Const. art. 4, $\S$ 26, as amended November 3, 1908, whereby contracts for the purchase or sale of corporate stock on margin or for future delivery are unlawful only when made without intention to make actual delivery and when contemplating merely the payment of the difference between the contract prices and the market prices, plaintiff might maintain replevin to recover stock, etc., deposited with a broker as collateral security for any indebtedness accruing from such unlawful transactions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gaming, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 74; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 37.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 1050(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In such action, where the gaming character of defendant brokers' business was fully brought out, the facts being almost wholly within their knowledge and unknown to the plaintiff, and where a course of transactions had been shown to be the same, and where, if any transaction was of a different character, defendant could have shown it, the admission of plaintiff's statement that after he put up the collateral no stock owned by him had ever been sold by defendants was not prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 1068, 1069, 4153, 4157; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 1050(1).]

3. GAMING $\S$ 49(2)—MARGIN TRANSACTIONS—RECOVERY OF COLLATERAL—EVIDENCE.

Where it did not appear that defendants were members of the New York Stock Exchange or transacted any of the plaintiff's business through that Exchange, and there was no evidence of genuine purchases or sales on plaintiff's account, or any deliveries, objection to a question to defendant's manager as to whether he knew the laws of the New York Stock Exchange in regard to buying and selling stock was properly sustained, since such rules were in no way material to the defense.

4. REPLEVIN $\S$ 106—DAMAGES—TIME.

In replevin for certificates of stock, etc., deposited by plaintiff as security on his margin transactions with defendant brokerage firm, on the ground that no deliveries were intended by the parties, plaintiff was entitled to the value of the collateral when demand for its delivery was made, and not to its value at the time of its deposit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 416-423; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 106.]

5. CONTINUANCE $\S$ 14(2)—GROUND—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

Where plaintiff was permitted to amend, without objection, and as to evidentiary matter provable without allegation, the refusal of a continuance on the ground of further time needed to put in the defense and to prove actual purchases was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 100; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 14(2).]

6. BANKRUPTCY $\S$ 418(3)—STAY—DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY.

It was no ground for an order staying all proceedings that since the rendition of the judgment appealed from and the time of the appeal defendant had obtained a discharge in bankruptcy, where the defendant about 16 months before the bankruptcy proceeding had given a stay bond with undertaking under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 943, conditioned to obey the orders of the appellate court upon the appeal, since, while the court might order a stay of execution, plaintiff was entitled to an affirmance, in order that he might recover the property if adjudged to him and prosecute his rights under the bond, since nothing in the bankruptcy proceeding would prevent a return of the property in discharge of any money judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Welborn, Judge.

Replevin by Patrick J. Hartnett against John C. Wilson and B. A. Wilbrand, copartners doing business under the firm name of J. C. Wilson & Co., and John C. Wilson and B. A. Wilbrand. Judgment for plaintiff, new trial denied, and defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Hartley Shaw, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Arthur Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action of replevin brought by the plaintiff to recover certain certificates of stock and a certain bond, alleged to be his property, in possession of the defendants and unlawfully detained by them. The defendants were partners doing business under a firm name as stock brokers engaged in the business of buying and selling stocks and bonds on margin and otherwise. The complaint shows that on July 30, 1912, a series of transactions began between the plaintiff and the defendants wherein, as it is alleged, contracts were made between the parties, whereby the plaintiff employed the defendants to purchase for him shares of the capital stock of corporations on margin, without any intention on the part of either of the parties for delivery of the shares sold or bought and without any actual delivery of such shares or any agreement for such delivery. It is alleged that each of said contracts provided that only the difference between the contract price and the market price of said shares on divers days should be paid, and only such difference was ever paid. On the day of trial of this action the complaint was amended so as to show that the transactions included purchases and sales by the defendants as principals and included bales of cotton as well as corporation stock.

On several dates, beginning on August 8th, the plaintiff deposited with defendants the certificates and the bond, one at a time until all of them had passed to the possession of defendants. It was alleged that the property was deposited as collateral security for any debt that might accrue from the plaintiff to defendants on account of any loss caused by reason of any contract that plaintiff might make with defendants whereby defendants might purchase of or for or sell to or for plaintiff, on margin without intention to deliver, shares of the capital stock of divers corporations, or bales of cotton; that since said delivery of the certificates and bond plaintiff has entered into divers verbal contracts with defendants whereby the plaintiff sold to or for defendants, and divers other verbal contracts whereby the plaintiff purchased of defendants shares of the capital stock of corporations or bales of cotton on margin; that in each instance and in every case, and as agreed to in each of said contracts, there was no intention either on the part of the plaintiff or on the part of the defendants to deliver by the party selling or to receive by the party purchasing any of said shares or bales of cotton, and no shares of capital stock or bales of cotton were ever delivered by plaintiff to defendants or by defendants to plaintiff, as the case might be, and no agreement was ever made for such delivery or receipt; that each of said contracts provided that only the difference between the contract price and the market price of said shares or bales of cotton on divers days should be paid, and only such difference was ever paid; that said certificates and bond were deposited with the defendants for no other purpose than as so stated. By their answer the defendants raised issues upon the material allegations of the complaint, both as to the ultimate facts and the evidentiary facts thus pleaded, other than as to plaintiff's ownership and deposit of the certificates and bond. The case was tried upon those issues with resulting findings and judgment in favor of plaintiff, awarding to plaintiff possession of each of said certificates and said bond; it being further provided in each instance that, if delivery or return of the property cannot be had, plaintiff should recover the value thereof as stated in the judgment. These values were severally stated, and in the aggregate amounted to $5,017.50. The defendants appealed from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] It is not disputed that the complaint states facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover. Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 123 Pac. 276, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392; Const. Cal. art. 4, § 26. Appellants also admit that the evidence is sufficient to justify the court in finding that all of the transactions involved were of the character alleged, except those involved in the account of one M. T. Zorn. We are satisfied, however, that the Zorn transaction was like the others. The defendants maintained an office in the city of Los Angeles in which they kept a blackboard for market quotations and maintained a telegraph operator, a manager, a bookkeeper, and agents for soliciting business. One of these agents, Mr. C. H. Marshall, introduced the plaintiff to that place of business and suggested that there was a chance for plaintiff to make some easy money there by buying stock on margin. Upon being informed that plaintiff had never done business of that kind, Marshall compared it to horse racing. He said:

"It is just about the same as making a book. You bet that the stock will either go up or down. If you bet it goes up and it goes up, you win the equivalent of what you bet or what you buy."

The transactions which followed and which are set forth at great length in the record as occurring between the plaintiff and the defendant, were of the nature thus described and nothing else. After the plaintiff had invested few hundred dollars there came a time when he was called upon for more cash to protect his margins, but did not have the money. In lieu of cash the defendants accepted from plaintiff the certificate for ten shares of Northern Pacific Railroad stock as collateral for plaintiff's account. The other deposits were made from time to time under like circumstances.

At the office of defendants the plaintiff was made acquainted with Mr. Zorn. Plaintiff's testimony concerning Zorn is not disputed, and in substance is as follows:

"He had some deals on there in corn, and they were calling him for $200. He asked me if I would give him a loan, or he would lose a whole lot of money, he claimed. I brought this certificate up the next morning, and I told Mr. Marshall to protect this corn."

It is unnecessary to follow this matter through its devious course wherein the Zorn account was manipulated and shifted into plaintiff's name and the deposited shares of stock used for purposes not intended or authorized by the plaintiff. In further discussion of the case we will make no further separate mention of the Zorn transaction.

[2] Appellants next contend that, since the burden was on plaintiff to show the unlawful character of the transactions, and since there were many of those transactions, the court erred in allowing the plaintiff to make this proof in a wholesale manner and by general questions; for, if any of these were lawful transactions and indebtedness arose out of them, defendants were entitled to hold plaintiff's collateral therefor. A great deal of evidence was received covering particular details of the several transactions, including numerous statements in writing made by the defendants. The character of the business of the defendants was thus thoroughly exposed to view. The facts as to the manner in which the business was done were almost wholly within the knowledge of the defendants, and were not known to the plaintiff. This is peculiarly true of that portion of these transactions well along toward the end of them, when (the plaintiff then being "ahead of the house") the defendants got the plaintiff drunk for three days, during which time numerous transactions occurred, and then or soon thereafter nearly all of the "losses" occurred whereby they claimed that his collateral had been absorbed. The principal objection made by appellants under this head is to the following question put to the plaintiff by the court:

"Subsequent to the time that you put up these collaterals was there ever any stock you owned sold by them for you in Los Angeles or anywhere else, after you put up these collaterals?"

To which the plaintiff answered, "No, sir." Objection was made that the question was too general and called for the conclusion of the witness. This matter must be considered in the light of occurrences immediately preceding the asking of this question, as shown in several pages of the transcript. Plaintiff's showing of facts had progressed to a point where it was appropriate for the court to intervene for the purpose of shortening the record and saving a large waste of time which would be consumed in proving the details of many transactions of apparently the same character. If any of those transactions were of different character and involved actual and legitimate sales, it would have been an easy matter for the defendants to point out the transactions upon which they relied to protect their claim to these collaterals. But this they did not do, and we are unable to see that the defendants were prejudiced by the ruling of the court.

[3] The defendants called as their witness at the trial one Ellis M. Harris, who on and after November 1, 1912, was the manager of their Los Angeles office, and propounded to him the following question:

"Do you know what the rules of the New York Stock Exchange are in regard to buying and selling stock?"

Objection to this question was sustained, and was properly sustained, unless the rules of that Exchange were in some way material and of benefit to the defendants. Some of the statements of account furnished by the defendants to the plaintiff contained a statement in the following form:

"It is agreed between broker and customer: (1) That all transactions are subject to the rules and customs of the New York Stock Exchange and its clearing house.

There is no evidence that the defendants were members of the New York Stock Exchange, or transacted any of the plaintiff's business through that exchange, and if we may suppose that the rules of the New York Stock Exchange prohibit mere gambling and fictitious transactions that fact would be of no value to the defendants if in truth the transactions between them and the plaintiff were not conducted in accordance with those rules. Neither at the time when the foregoing question was asked of the witness Harris, nor at any other time, was evidence offered tending to show that in any instance there was a genuine purchase by the plaintiff or a genuine sale by him. It is true that, referring to two or three orders received from the plaintiff, Mr. Harris testified that the orders were transmitted to New York, that the orders were executed, and that the cotton mentioned was bought; but there is nothing to show that the word "bought" was used in any other sense than in the multitude of other transactions in which that word was current in the business of defendants. Harris admitted that never in his experience as an employé of the defendants did he know of cotton being actually delivered. As a specific instance: In referring to the last 500 bales of cotton "bought" for the plaintiff (and which previously had been "sold" for him), the amount involved would be about $60,000 and he said:

"We did not get $60,000 from anybody, nor deliver any cotton at all." "Q. Isn't it true that those losses were merely differences between different days of the price of cotton? A. Different prices at which he bought and sold cotton."

He said that the contracts were held by their correspondent in New York, and that he did not know whether plaintiff knew or not that there was any such transaction. Under the circumstances shown by this and by all of the evidence in the case, it is manifest that any rules of the New York Stock Exchange, whatever they might be, could not affect the plaintiff's rights in this case.

[4] Appellants contend that the court erred in its findings as to the value of the property involved. At the trial an attempt was made by the attorneys for the respective parties to agree upon these values. Plaintiff's attorney claimed that he was entitled to the value of the property as of the dates when the certificates and bond were deposited. Defendants' attorney claimed that the value should be taken as of December 17, 1912, the day when plaintiff made his demand for their return to him. As to the latter date, defendants' answer admitted values amounting to only $4,848.75. The answer of defendants had admitted values at the date when the properties were deposited by the plaintiff with the defendants, which admitted values in the aggregate amounted to $5,017.50, or $168.75 more than the values at the time of the demand. The court in its decision adopted the larger figures, proceeding evidently upon the theory that the value should be fixed as of the earlier dates. Appellants now contend that the court's findings as to values are wholly without support in the evidence, because there is no evidence of the value of the property at the time of the trial, which they now for the first time contend is the time for which the values should have been fixed. It is provided by Code of Civil Procedure, § 667, that:

"In an action to recover the possession of personal property, judgment for the plaintiff may be for the possession or the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had, and damages for the detention."

As no damages for the detention of the property were allowed, that element need not be considered. It is said that there is only one decision upon this precise point. In Phillips v. Sutherland, 2 Cal. Unreported Cases, 241, 2 Pac. 32, it was held that in an action of this kind, where the judgment is in the alternative, the value of the property should be fixed as of the day of the trial as being nearest to the time when the property would be delivered. Under the stipulations made as above stated, we do not think that the losing party should be allowed on appeal to object for the first time that the findings are wholly unsupported by the evidence. In substance, he conceded that on any theory of the case the values to be found by the court would amount to at least $4,848.75. So far as this matter is concerned, the only relief to which he should be entitled would consist in reducing the amount of the judgment by deducting therefrom the sum of $168.75. This may the more readily be done because, unless controlled by the decision above cited, it is our opinion that the value of the property at the time when demand for its delivery was made is the value which should prevail.

[5] It is contended by appellants that the court erred in refusing to allow a continuance at the close of the evidence presented on behalf of the plaintiff. When the plaintiff presented his amendment to the complaint at the beginning of the trial, the defendants made no objection thereto, but stated that they would desire to have a continuance. The court responded that the plaintiff might introduce his evidence, and that, whenever it became necessary in the interest of fair play to get the defendants' evidence on the transactions in cotton, the court would adjourn the trial of the case for such time as was necessary. After the plaintiff had rested his case, the attorney for appellants stated that, on account of the cotton transaction having been received as part of the evidence, he would want further time before he could finish putting in his defense; that it would be necessary for the defendants to show that the deals in cotton were actually made, and he was not prepared to produce such evidence at that time. He said that the man Marshall was not then in the employment of the defendants, and they had no means of communicating with him, and did not know whether they could find him or not. He said he wanted to prove that the cotton deals were actually carried out on the New York Exchange; that there was a telegraph line from their office to New York, and messages were received in New York about this cotton, and the cotton was bought and sold according to the order and report got back to Los Angeles and given to the plaintiff. Upon suggestion of defendants' attorney that he could put the evidence in the form of an affidavit, the court stated:

"It is not necessary. I am assuming every word you say to be true, and no affidavit is necessary; but I say, assuming all that you have said to be correct, I do not see any reason for a continuance."

The following also occurred:

"The Court: But you don't claim that this man ever owned any cotton in his life, or put up one cent of money as the purchase price of the cotton?"

"Defendants' Attorney: It does not make any difference whether he ever owned any cotton in his life or not. The court has stated that it is perfectly legal to make a contract to sell something he hasn't got."

Thereupon, the continuance having been denied, the defendants introduced the testimony of several witnesses. One of them, the witness Harris, manager of the office of defendants, referred to the cotton deals as follows:

"Two or three days after I came to Los Angeles [which would be two or three days after November 1, 1912] I asked Mr. Hartnett for some more money to protect us on some cotton that we were carrying for him. He told me he wouldn't be able to take care of it at that time, and we bought in 500 bales, I think, November 6th, and I told him we would put a stop loss order on the remaining 500 bales at $1,215. I told him it would be bought in when it reached $1,215. He said if it would go up there, it would have to be closed out, if it reached that point before he heard from the east. He made no objections to my closing it out. That is one of the two cotton transactions I spoke of before. The other one is the one we bought in the day I first spoke to him about margin, because he said he didn't have any money, and he would lighten up his load by buying in half his commitments, which was 500 bales. These two days were about five days apart, I think. The day he told me we had better lighten up his load by buying 500 I entered an order to buy 500 bales January cotton at the market. It was bought. The other time there was an order entered with our New York correspondent to buy if it reached a certain point. That was bought too at 1215."

Defendants made no further attempt than as above shown to prove the good faith and reality of their transactions with plaintiff.

Let the statements made by defendants' attorney be treated as a substitute for an affidavit; they nevertheless were not sufficient to require that the court grant a continuance. It was not stated that Mr. Marshall could or would testify to the facts referred to by the attorney, nor that other witnesses upon whom the defendants must rely were not within call on the day of the trial. For aught that appears, the defendants themselves were then in court or at their office in Los Angeles. It may be that books, contracts and other documents were in the hands of the defendants which, together with testimony of defendants or of their bookkeepers and other agents in the city where the case was on trial, would have proved all of the facts covered by the statement made in connection with the application for a continuance. Moreover, the allegations of fact introduced into the case by the amendment of the complaint at the day of the trial were all of evidentiary matter which would have been provable in the case without such allegations. This was an action for the recovery of personal property wherein the plaintiff had alleged all the facts necessary to a complaint in that kind of an action, including the facts of ownership by the plaintiff and his right to immediate possession and the wrongful possession by the defendants, the demand for a return of the property, and refusal thereof. The defendants were fully acquainted with the facts upon which the determination of the case must depend and adequately warned of the nature of the plaintiff's claims. Our conclusion is that the refusal of a continuance under the circumstances shown did not constitute an abuse of the discretion vested in the court as to that matter.

[6] In addition to the foregoing matters directly involved in the appeals herein, we are required to consider a motion presented by counsel for appellants whereby they ask for an order staying all proceedings in the action on the ground that since the rendition of the judgment appealed from and since the time of the appeal the defendants have been duly discharged in bankruptcy. The motion is accompanied by a certified copy of an order duly made in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California discharging the defendants from all debts and claims provable under the acts of Congress relating to bankruptcy and which existed on the 7th day of November, 1914, when the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against them was filed, with the usual exceptions, none of which require attention at this time. Respondent in reply to the motion shows that the appeal from the judgment herein was taken and a stay bond filed by appellants on the 16th day of July, 1913, which was about 16 months prior to the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings; that an undertaking was given as required for a stay of proceedings under section 943, Code of Civil Procedure, and was conditioned that the defendants will obey the orders of the appellate court upon the said appeal. Respondent concedes that this court may appropriately make an order perpetually staying execution as against the appellants themselves, but insists that he is entitled to an affirmance of the judgment in order that he may prosecute his rights under the bond. That he is so entitled, and that an action may be maintained upon such bond, we do not doubt.

Regardless of the suggestion thus made with respect to the existence of a stay bond, we also think that appellants are not on this motion entitled to anything more than is thus conceded to them by counsel for respondent.

The principal object of the judgment was to enforce the plaintiff's right to have certain personal property restored to his possession. If that property remains in the possession or under the control of the defendants, it may be redelivered to the plaintiff, in which event the alternative money judgment would be of no consequence. We are not aware of anything in the bankruptcy proceedings which would prevent such return of his property by the defendants to the plaintiff. The respondent is entitled to a determination of this appeal, so that, if the judgment be affirmed, he may recover that property; and since the condition of the bond was that the defendants would obey the order of this court upon the appeal (which upon an affirmance of the judgment would in substance be an order for the return of the property), we see no reason why the respondent is not equally entitled to a determination of the appeal so that if the judgment be affirmed he may assert his rights with respect to that bond. All the protection to which the appellants are entitled by reason of a discharge in bankruptcy will be obtained by them under an order perpetually staying proceedings by execution or otherwise, against them, to realize upon the alternative money judgment which was rendered against them.

The order denying defendants' motion for a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is modified in that portion thereof providing for the amount to be recovered in case a delivery or return of the property cannot be had by substituting for the sum of $1,287.50 the sum of $1,200, and for the sum of $1,270 the sum of $1,250, and for the sum of $1,460 the sum of $1,398.75, and for the aggregate sum of $5,017.50 the sum of $4,848.75. As thus amended, the judgment is affirmed, without prejudice to the right of appellants to apply to the superior court for an order perpetually staying execution as against them, upon those parts of the judgment which provide for recovery by the plaintiff against the defendants of any sum or sums of money in case a delivery or return of the described personal property or any thereof cannot be had.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT § 195(2)—ABANDONMENT BY TENANT—RELETING.

Where a tenant abandons the leased property and repudiates the lease, the landlord may accept possession of the property for the benefit of the tenant and relet it.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨195(2)—ABANDONMENT BY TENANT—RELETING—ACTION FOR DAMAGES.

In such case the landlord may maintain an action for damages for the difference between what he was able in good faith to let the property for, and the amount payable under the lease.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨110(2)—ABANDONMENT OF PREMISES—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—NOTICE.

A lessor, who on the lessee's abandonment of the leased premises chooses to bring an action for damages, must in some manner inform the lessee that he is accepting possession for his benefit, and not for his own benefit, and, if he takes unqualified possession of the property, he thereby releases the lessee from liability.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨172(1)—SURRENDER—LIABILITY FOR RENT—RELEASE.

A lessor's unqualified taking of possession and his reletting of the premises as owner to new tenants is inconsistent with the continuation of the original lease, and, if done without the lessee's consent, is an eviction which will release the lessee from liability for rent, and, if done pursuant to the lessee's attempted abandonment, it is an acceptance of the surrender releasing the lessee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by A. H. Rehkopf against Joe Wirz and others. Judgment for defendants upon a motion to nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dan V. Noland and Walter B. Kibbey, both of El Centro, for appellant. McPherrin & Nichols, of Imperial, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action whereby the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for breach of the covenants of a written lease of real property. The court having granted defendants' motion for a nonsuit, judgment was entered, from which plaintiff appeals.

The lease was for three years, beginning April 1, 1913. Defendants paid the rent monthly in advance for the period of one year and vacated the premises a few days prior to April 1, 1914. Thereupon the lessor took possession of the premises and advertised for another tenant. During the month of April, 1914, he obtained another tenant to whom he leased the premises for a term of three years, beginning May 1, 1914, and at a rate of rental less than that provided for in the lease which had been made to defendants. Plaintiff claims damages in a sum equal to the difference between the rent which would have been paid under the lease of the defendants and the amount for which he was able to rent the property for the period of the unexpired term of the defendants.

[1, 2] Where a tenant abandons the leased property and repudiates the lease, the landlord may accept possession of the property for the benefit of the tenant and relet the same, and thereupon may maintain an action for damages for the difference between what he was able in good faith to let the property for and the amount provided to be paid under the lease agreement. Bradbury v. Higginson, 162 Cal. 602, 123 Pac. 797.

[3] But a lessor who chooses to follow that course must in some manner give the lessee information that he is accepting such possession for the benefit of the tenant and not in his own right and for his own benefit. If the lessor takes possession of property delivered to him by his tenant and does so unqualifiedly, he thereby releases the tenant. Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 26 Cal. App. 371, 146 Pac. 1056; Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. 507, 27 Pac. 369, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145.

[4] An unqualified taking of possession by the lessor and reletting of the premises by him as owner to new tenants is inconsistent with the continuing force of the original lease. If done without the consent of the tenant to such interference, it is an eviction, and the tenant will be released. If done pursuant to the tenant's attempted abandonment, it is an acceptance of the surrender and likewise releases the tenant.

[5] In this case the plaintiff's testimony presents the facts clearly and without conflict. The defendants informed the plaintiff that they were going to leave the ranch. They did leave, and omitted payment of the installment of rent which, according to the terms of the lease, fell due April 1, 1914. Without making any further demand upon the defendants or in any manner informing them as to the course which he would pursue, the plaintiff took possession and made a new lease of the land as above stated. Upon these facts the plaintiff failed to establish any right of action for the damages claimed by him. In Auer v. Penn, 99 Pa. 370, 44 Am. Rep. 114, it was stated that if the tenant gives up the demised premises, the landlord may re-enter and relet, and that such action on his part raises no presumption of acceptance of a surrender, since it is for the advantage of the tenant that he should do so. Referring to that case and that proposition, the Supreme Court of California in Welcome v. Hess, supra, declared that while there are many cases which hold to this view, "the weight of authority and the better reason is the other way." It follows that the evidence in this case, although construed as favorably as possible to the plaintiff, was insufficient to establish his case, and the court was right in granting the nonsuit.

In examining the evidence we have not overlooked the proposed alteration of the lease, which alteration was signed by the lessor and delivered by the lessor to the defendants for their approval, nor the evidence of the circumstances connected with that proposed change in the terms of the lease. The defendants did not sign the proposed supplemental agreement, and it does not appear that any of the things which they did after it was delivered to them amounted to an acceptance or part performance. Throughout the transaction they appear to have acted consistently with the terms of the original lease until the time when they abandoned the premises and thereby offered to surrender the same, which surrender must be deemed to have been accepted by reason of the acts of the plaintiff as above stated.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 6, 1916.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—TAX SALES—PRIMA FACIE CASE—STATUTE.

Under St. 1897, p. 271, § 48, providing that the matter recited in the certificate of sale of land for delinquency in paying an assessment of an irrigation district must be recited in the deed, and that the deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is prima facie evidence of certain matters, where plaintiff sued to quiet title, claiming under a sale of land to satisfy a delinquent irrigation assessment, and supported his claim of ownership by proof of a tax deed to the property which contained all the matters recited in the certificate of sale, as required by the statute, being duly acknowledged, plaintiff made a prima facie case, and the burden devolved on defendant to establish her title to the property by a preponderance of the evidence.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—TAX SALES—DEFENDANT'S BURDEN OF PROOF.

In suit to quiet title by one claiming under a tax sale of the property by an irrigation district, to satisfy her burden of proof and to establish her title to the property it was requisite that defendant should show some defect in the assessment or other proceedings leading up to the sale, and, finally, to the execution of the tax deed to the purchaser at the sale, fatal to the legality of the sale or deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. ⇨231.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION—ASSESSMENT BY DISTRICT—RESOLUTION OF BOARD—STATUTE.

Under St. 1897, p. 254, authorizing the organization and government of irrigation districts, whether the act of the board of directors of a district in levying an assessment be done by a mere motion or in the form of a resolution is immaterial, so long as it constitutes the action of the board and the proceeding is otherwise properly carried out and duly preserved in the board's records or the books required to be kept for that purpose by sections 34, 39.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. ⇨231.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION—ASSESSMENT BY DISTRICT—CERTIFICATION OF ASSESSMENT ROLL AND DELINQUENCY LIST—STATUTE.

Under the statute, it was no objection to the validity of a sale of property for unpaid taxes levied by an irrigation district that the assessment roll and delinquent list were not certified, since the statute makes no such requirement, and the governing body of the district was required to take no step not expressly or by necessary implication required.

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION—ASSESSMENT—LISTING PROPERTY—STATUTE.

Under St. 1897, p. 254, authorizing organization of irrigation districts, section 35, providing that the assessor must prepare an assessment book with appropriate headings in which must be listed all real property within the district, and in which must be specified in separate columns under the appropriate heading the name of the person to whom the property is assessed, etc., where property sold for non-payment of taxes by an irrigation district was listed and described in the assessment book of the district, as well as in the delinquent assessment book, under the heading "Description of Property," "Modesto, Bl'k 123, lots 1 to 5, inclusive," the property, situated in the city of Modesto, was properly listed.

6. TAXATION ⇨421(1)—ASSESSMENT—DESIGNATION OF LAND.

If the designation of land in the assessment book is such as to afford the owner the means whereby the land may readily be identified, or does not mislead, or is not calculated to mislead him, it is sufficient.

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION—ASSESSMENT—PUBLICATION OF NOTICE OF DELINQUENCY.

In suit to quiet title by plaintiff claiming under tax deed from irrigation district, evidence held to support the court's finding that the delinquency notice was published as required by St. 1897, p. 263, § 41.

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨231—IRRIGATION—ASSESSMENT—SALE FOR DELINQUENCY—CERTIFICATE—DEED—STATUTE.

Under St. 1897, p. 254, authorizing organization of irrigation districts, section 45, providing that, after receiving the amount of as-assessments and costs, the collector must make out in duplicate a certificate, dated on the day of the sale for taxation, etc., where a sale of property in an irrigation district for nonpayment of an assessment was made February 20th and the certificate of sale was dated March 3d, such certificate was not void, as the mere dating of the certificate subsequent to the date of sale is not of material importance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. ¶231.]

9. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ¶231—IRRIGATION—ASSESSMENT—SALE FOR LESS THAN DUE.

Where land in an irrigation district was sold, for nonpayment of an assessment, for $21.92, the actual amount due on the assessment, including its amount and penalties, the property was not sold for less than the total amount actually due because, in computing the amount in the assessment book, the assessor penciled 50 cents in the column entitled, "Amount of tax for semi-annual interest bonds," $1.02 in the column entitled "Amount of tax for redemption of bonds," and $21.92, in the column entitled "Amount of tax for general purposes," amounts which totaled $23.44.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. ¶231.]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶843(2)—IMMATERIAL QUESTION.

Where the trial court's judgment could stand on the one finding, with another finding eliminated, it is immaterial whether the latter finding is without support in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3331; Dec. Dig. ¶843(2).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by R. A. Corson against Charles Crocker and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Josephine Arata appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Reeder, of Oakdale, and Charles S. Conner, of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. H. Zion, of Modesto, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action to quiet title to certain real estate. The plaintiff had judgment, from which this appeal is prosecuted by the defendant Josephine Arata, upon a transcript of the record prepared in pursuance of the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff claims title under a deed executed by the Modesto irrigation district, a corporation, the property in dispute lying within the boundaries of said district and having been sold on default of the owner in the payment of an assessment levied thereon by the district in the year 1905. The appealing defendant challenges the validity of the sale and deed, and the objection so made presents the only questions involved in the controversy.

The lands in question consist of lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, in block 123, of the city of Modesto, and, as stated, are embraced within the limits of the said irrigation district, and were assessed to the appealing defendant.

The appellant was the daughter of one Giovanni Arata, who died testate on the 22d day of March, 1897. With the mother, and other surviving children of the deceased, she was made a devisee in trust of a certain designated portion of the residue of his estate, of which the lots in dispute constituted a part. The record discloses that the lots in question were, together with lots 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, in the same block, by the trustee conveyed by deed to one Susan Springsteen, on the 2d day of February, 1903, and that said deed was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Stanislaus county on the 15th day of December, 1903. This conveyance appears to have been executed prior to the partition of the residue of the said estate and the assignment to the devisees in trust of their respective interests therein in severalty. But it is further made to appear that a partition suit was subsequently filed in the superior court of Stanislaus county, wherein and whereby the several interests of the parties in the residue of the estate were set off to them in severalty, and that by the decree in said action the appellant was awarded title in fee to the particular lots involved in this controversy.

The above recital is important only because thus it is made to appear that the record shows that legal title to the lots in dispute was, notwithstanding the conveyance to Springsteen, still in the appellant, and that the assessment involved herein was properly made against the lots in the latter's name.

By finding No. 4 the court in effect found that the plaintiff's title was deraigned from the sale of the property for the satisfaction of the assessment above referred to, and further found that for more than five years prior to the commencement of this action he and his predecessors in interest have been in actual, exclusive and continuous possession of said lots, which possession was founded on the "certificate of sale and deed for delinquent irrigation assessment, issued by the Modesto irrigation district, * * * and has himself and his said predecessors in interest paid all taxes and assessments of any kind and description and character levied on or against said property for the said period of five years preceding and immediately prior to the date of the filing of the complaint herein."

By finding No. 5, the court further found:

"Fifth. That the said assessment of the Modesto irrigation district, for the nonpayment of which said premises were sold, was duly and regularly levied according to law, and that the said irrigation district and its officers complied with all the provisions of law prior to and leading up to the sale and the issuance of the certificate hereinbefore referred to, and that thereafter a deed was duly and regularly issued by the Modesto irrigation district conveying to the predecessors in interest of the said plaintiff the said premises, and that all proceedings leading up to said deed were duly and regularly taken, and that the said deed conveyed to and vested in the grantee therein named a good and perfect title to the said premises, free from all claims and demands of every character of the defendants, Josephine Arata, Assunta Arata, as trustee, and all persons holding by, through or under them."

The appellant claims that said findings are not supported by the evidence, and thus the objections urged against the legality of the assessment and sale of the property in question are raised. These objections, specifically stated, are: (1) That it does not appear that the board of directors of the said irrigation district had, in proper form, and previously to the levying of the assessment, passed a resolution authorizing the assessment; (2) that the assessment roll and the delinquent list "are not certified"; (3) that "the assessment book and delinquent roll show that this property was not properly listed, being under the head of 'fractional or metes and bounds' rather than under 'city' or 'town' or 'city' or 'town lots'"; (4) that notice of delinquency is shown to have been published for one week only, whereas the statute requires that publication of such notice shall be for two weeks; (5) that the certificate of sale is void because it was dated on a date subsequent to the day upon which the sale was made.

The Modesto irrigation district was organized under the provisions of an act of the Legislature of 1897, entitled:

"An act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, and to provide for the acquisition or construction thereby of works for the irrigation of the lands embraced within such districts, and, also, to provide for the distribution of water for irrigation purposes." Stats. 1897, p. 254 et seq.

Section 43 provides for the sale by the tax collector of the district of all lands within the district upon which assessments duly levied under the act have not been paid. Section 45 provides that:

Upon a sale of real property for delinquent assessments being made the collector, after receiving the amount of the assessments and costs, "must make out in duplicate a certificate, dated on the day of sale, stating (when known) the name of the person assessed, a description of the land sold, the amount paid therefor, that it was sold for assessments, giving the amount and year of the assessment, and specifying the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed. The certificate must be signed by the collector, and one copy delivered to the purchaser, and the other filed in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the land is situated."

Section 48 of said act provides:

"The matter recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed, and such deed duly acknowledged or proved is prima facie evidence that: (a) The property was assessed as required by law. (b) The property was equalized as required by law. (c) That the assessments were levied in accordance with law. (d) The assessments were not paid. (e) At a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law and by the proper officer. (f) The property was not redeemed. (g) The person who executed the deed was the proper officer."

[1, 2] The action is, as seen, one to quiet title, in which the plaintiff alleges that he is the owner in fee of the property in dispute. The plaintiff having supported his claim of ownership by proof of a tax deed to the property, said deed containing all the matters recited in the certificate of sale, as required by the statute, and having been duly acknowledged, a prima facie case was thus made by the plaintiff, and the burden was thereupon devolved upon the appellant to establish her title to the property by a preponderance of the evidence. To do this it was requisite that she should show some defect or defects in the assessment or other proceedings leading to the sale and, finally, to the execution of the tax deed to the purchaser at the tax sale, fatal to the legality of the sale or said deed. As before stated, she made an attempt at such showing, but we think without success. The points made against the validity of the assessment we shall consider in the order in which they are above stated.

[3] 1. The act of 1897 authorizing the organization and government of irrigation districts nowhere expressly requires that the levying of an assessment by the board of directors for the purposes of the district shall be by or in the form of a resolution. The law, of course, requires the board of directors to levy an assessment, when necessary; but whether this act be done by a mere motion or in the form of a resolution is immaterial so long as it constitutes the action of the board and the proceeding is otherwise properly carried out and duly preserved in the records of the board or the books required to be kept for that purpose. Sections 34 and 39, Act of 1897, pp. 265, 267.

[4] 2. The reply to the proposition that the "assessment roll and delinquent list are not certified" is the same as the answer given above to the proposition that the board did not proceed to levy the assessment in the form of a resolution. Counsel have not pointed to any provision of the act in question requiring the assessment roll and delinquent list to be certified by any person or officer of the district, and, after a careful examination of the statute, we have found no such requirement. It ought not to be necessary to suggest that the governing body of the district was required to take no step in the tax proceedings not expressly or by necessary implication required by the statute.

[5, 6] 3. The next objection is that the assessment book and delinquent list disclose that the property was not properly listed. The specific objection is as above stated.

Section 35 of the irrigation act provides, inter alia: "That the assessor must prepare an assessment book, with appropriate headings, in which must be listed all real property within the district, in which must be specified, in separate columns, under the appropriate head: (a) The name of the person to whom the property is assessed; * * * (b) land by township, range, section, or fractional section, and when such land is not a congressional division or subdivision, by metes and bounds, or other description sufficient to identify it, giving an estimate of the number of acres, locality, and the improvements thereon; (c) city and town lots, naming the city or town, and the number and block, according to the system of numbering in such city or town, and the improvements thereon.

By stipulation of counsel on both sides, the memoranda of the map of the city of Modesto were received in evidence and considered in lieu of the map itself, and from the memoranda so received it appears that the lots in question were delineated on said map and described as lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, in block 123, in said city. It is admitted that that portion of the city of Modesto embracing said lots is included within the boundaries of the Modesto irrigation district. In the assessment book of said district for the year 1905, as well as in the delinquent assessment book of said district for said year, the property in dispute is listed and described as follows, under the heading: "Description of property": "Modesto, Bl'k 123, lots 1 to 5, inclusive." In the assessment book, the assessed value of the property is stated and in the delinquent assessment book the value of said property is given under substantially the same heading.

The description of the property as above shown was in substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute, and it was sufficiently clear and definite to facilitate the ready identification and location of the land by means of the deed itself, and therefore sufficient to apprise the owner that an assessment lien subsisted upon the lots and so enable her to discharge such lien.

If the designation of the land in the assessment book is such as to afford the owner the means whereby the land may readily be identified, or does not mislead or is not calculated to mislead him, it is sufficient. Coolley on Taxation, p. 745; San Gabriel Co. v. Witmer Co., 96 Cal. 635, 29 Pac. 500, 31 Pac. 588, 18 L. R. A. 465, 470; Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 733, 736, 78 Pac. 293; Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 569, 89 Pac. 352. As before suggested in another form of expression, the description of the lots here fully measured up to the test thus stated.

[7] 4. We cannot say that the trial court was not justified in finding, as impliedly it did so find, that the statutory requirement as to the publication of notice of delinquency was complied with. Section 41 of the statute provides that such notice must be published by the collector of the district in a newspaper published in each county in which any portion of the district may lie for the period of two weeks. The record here does not show in what particular newspaper said notice was ordered to be published. One of the attorneys for the appellant, however, was sworn as a witness and testified that he had examined several numbers of the "Weekly News" (presumably a newspaper) and that he had found the notice referred to published in one issue only of said newspaper. This constituted all the showing that was made which tended in any degree to disclose that the notice had not been published as prescribed by the statute; and it was wholly with the trial court to decide whether the showing so made was sufficient to overcome the prima facie showing through proof of the deed that the notice referred to was published as required. If the appellant had shown by clear and direct proof that the "Weekly News" was a newspaper published in Stanislaus county, in which the district is situated, that the notice had been by the collector, within 20 days after the delivery of the assessment book to him by the secretary of the board, given to said newspaper and no other published in said county for publication therein, and that said notice had not been published in said paper for and during the full time prescribed by the statute, there would then have been a sufficient showing of noncompliance with the requirement of the statute in that regard to have overcome the effect of the deed as prima facie proof of the due regularity of all the proceedings leading to the sale and the execution of the deed. It is very clear that no such showing was made by the appellant. Indeed, so far as we are given direct information to the contrary upon the subject by the record the collector might have ordered the publication of the notice in some newspaper published in Stanislaus county other than the "Weekly News," and that the notice was published in accordance with the mandate of the statute upon that subject.

[8] 5. The point that the certificate of sale is void because it was not dated on the day of the sale is without substantial merit. The point has its inspiration in the language of section 45 of the act. It will be recalled that that section reads, in part:

"After receiving the amount of assessments and costs, the collector must make out in duplicate a certificate, dated on the day of the sale, stating," etc.

The sale in this case was made on the 20th day of February, 1906, and the certificate of sale dated the 3d day of March, 1906.

The certificate, it is to be observed, recites that the property may be redeemed from said sale "within twelve months from the date of said purchase, viz. this 20th day of February, 1906, by the person and in the manner as provided by law," etc. Thus (the certificate being in duplicate, one of which to be recorded in the office of the county recorder) the most important object thereof was fully effectuated, viz. the giving of notice to the owner of the date of the sale and of the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed upon his (the owner's) default in redeeming the property within the time prescribed by the law and stated in the certificate. It thus must become clearly manifest that the mere dating of the certificate on some day subsequent to the day of the sale is not of material importance. It has so been held. The state of Idaho has a statute which contains a provision as to the dating of the certificate of a tax sale in the precise language of section 45 of the statute here in question. In McGowan v. Elder, 19 Idaho, 153, 113 Pac. 103, the tax sale was had on the 8th of July, 1904, and the certificate of sale was dated July 9, 1904. The Supreme Court of Idaho, replying to an objection to the certificate similar to that urged here, held that the language of its statute regarding the dating of the certificate was merely directory, and held the certificate in that case to be good. And in the recent case of Bruschi v. Cooper, 159 Pac. 728, this court, having a similar proposition before it, cited and approved McGowan v. Elder, supra, in so far as it held the language of the statute as to the dating of the certificate to be directory.

[9] Besides the objections to the assessment proceedings above considered, the point is made that the property was sold for less than the total amount actually due on the assessment. There is no real ground for the support of the point, it being made to appear that certain items which counsel for the appellant have added to the assessment and penalties as computed by the assessor were figured in lead pencil on the face of the assessment book and constituted no part of said book. The explanation, as shown by the record, is as follows: That the delinquent assessment involved herein showed the amount of the assessment to be $20.40, to which were to be added 5 per cent., amounting to $1.02, and costs amounting to 50 cents, making the assessment and penalties total the sum of $21.92; that the assessment book for the year 1905 contained three columns, entitled as follows: the first, "Amount of tax for semiannual interest bonds," second, "Amount of tax for redemption of bonds," and, third, "Amount of tax for general purposes"; that none of said three columns was used in the assessment of the property in question, and the same were blank and vacant; and that, in compiling and preparing said delinquent assessment, the assessor used the assessment book of the irrigation district and, for convenience, "used the said three blank columns for the purpose of computing and determining the amount of costs and five per cent. additional and the total assessment and the penalties," the same as stated, being figured in lead pencil on the face of the assessment book in said three columns. The figures so made appeared as follows: "$.50 in the column entitled, 'Amount of tax for semiannual interest on bonds'; $1.02 in column entitled, 'Amount of tax for redemption of bonds,' and $21.92 in column entitled, 'Amount of tax for general purposes.'" Quite clearly, the addition of the three amounts would make the total assessment $23.44, whereas, as the record unquestionably shows, the actual amount due on the assessment, including the amount of the assessment and the sums of fifty cents and one dollar and two cents, penalties, etc., was $21.92, for which sum the property was sold.

[10] It is further pointed out that the court found (finding 4) that the plaintiff had acquired title to the lots in controversy by adverse possession and that there is no evidence to support said finding. Assuming this to be true, it is also true that the court by its fifth finding found that the plaintiff obtained title to the property by the tax sale and deed, and this finding is sufficient to support the decree quieting plaintiff's title to said property. Finding 4 is further and otherwise criticized, but the judgment could stand secure on the fifth finding with finding 4 entirely eliminated, and it is therefore immaterial whether the last-mentioned finding is or is not justly amenable to the criticism referred to.

We have found nothing in the record which would warrant us in holding that the decree assailed by the appellant is not justified by the facts and the law.

The judgment is, accordingly, affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

31 Cal. App. 689

RICH et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR MENDOCINO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1595.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 14, 1916.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE $\S$ 159(9) — APPEAL—UNDERTAKING FOR COSTS—STATUTE.

An undertaking with sureties in the sum of \$248.70, securing costs on appeal to the superior court from a justice's judgment for \$115.35, taxing costs at \$8.75, which purported to be given to stay execution, was sufficient as a bond for the payment of costs on appeal under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 978, providing that an appeal from a justice or police court is not effectual unless an undertaking with sureties be filed in the sum of \$100 for the payment of costs on the appeal, and the superior court could not be divested of its jurisdiction, acquired by the filing of the bond, by appellants' failure to file stay bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 565; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 159(9).]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE $\S$ 159(1)—SUPERIOR COURT — DISMISSAL OF APPEAL FOR FAILURE TO FILE UNDERTAKING FOR COSTS—STATUTE.

The superior court has the right and power to pass upon and decide a motion to dismiss an appeal taken from a justice's judgment thereto, and where the motion is based on the ground that the undertaking for costs on appeal required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 978, has not been filed, it is the duty of the superior court to dismiss the attempted appeal if such is the fact, since the section makes the filing of the undertaking an essential and indispensable requisite for conferring upon the superior court jurisdiction to hear and determine an appeal from a justice or police court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 573; Dec. Dig. § 159(1).]

3. CERTIORARI § 28(1) — JURISDICTION — WHERE QUESTION FOR DETERMINATION IS OF JURISDICTION.

The rule that, where a court once obtains jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action, it then has jurisdiction to decide a question arising therein erroneously as well as correctly, and a jurisdictional writ, as writ of review, does not lie, has no application to a case where the question to be determined is whether the court has legal authority to hear and determine the matter before it, since the rule simply means that when a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and commits error during the course of the trial, or in its final decision, the error is correctible, not through a jurisdictional writ, but solely by appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. § 28(1).]

Petition for writ of review by E. F. Rich and Gertrude Rich against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Mendocino and the Honorable J. Q. White, Judge thereof, to annul an order dismissing an appeal. Order annulled, set aside, and vacated.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for petitioners. Frank W. Taft, of Willits, for respondents.

HART, J. One Harvey Carlton, on the 21st day of June, 1916, recovered judgment against the petitioners in the justice's court of Little Lake township, in the county of Mendocino, for the sum of $115.35, together with costs of suit, taxed at $8.75. Thereafter, and within the time allowed by law, the petitioners appealed from said judgment to the superior court in and for the county of Mendocino; said appeal being upon questions of both law and fact. The petitioners in due time filed the following undertaking:

"Whereas, on the 21st day of June, A. D. 1916, a judgment was entered in said justice's court against defendant in favor of plaintiff for $115.35, and costs. Defendant has appealed from said judgment to the superior court of the county of Mendocino; and he wants proceedings stayed pending appeal. Now the undersigned jointly and severally undertake in the sum of $248.70, that, if proceedings be stayed, appellant will pay the amount of the judgment appealed from, and will pay all costs if the appeal be withdrawn or dismissed, or the amount of any judgment and all costs that may be recovered against him in action in the superior court, and will obey any order made by the court therein.

"Dated this 26th day of June, A. D. 1916.

"E. F. Rich.

"Gertrude Rich.

"J. D. Barnwell.

"Louis Bilodeau."

Thereafter the respondent noticed a motion to dismiss the said appeal on the ground that no appeal bond, or deposit in lieu thereof, had been filed for the purposes of the appeal, and that the superior court therefore had failed to acquire jurisdiction of said appeal. Said motion came on for hearing and was heard on the 21st day of August, 1916, and on the 28th day of August, 1916, the respondents herein made and entered an order dismissing said appeal on the ground set forth in the notice of motion and above stated.

The petitioners claim that the undertaking filed by them and above quoted herein was and is legally sufficient to support the appeal, and that therefore the respondents, in ordering the appeal dismissed, exceeded their jurisdiction. The proceeding here is for a writ of review to secure an annulment of the order dismissing said appeal.

Section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "an appeal from a justice's or police court is not effectual for any purpose, unless an undertaking be filed with two or more sureties in the sum of one hundred dollars for the payment of the costs on the appeal." The same section provides that, if a stay of proceedings be claimed, there shall be filed a like undertaking, "In a sum equal to twice the amount of the judgment, including costs, when the judgment is for the payment of money," etc.

The undertaking in the case involved herein, it will be observed, is for a sum equal to twice the amount of the judgment and the costs, and while it is possible that its sole purpose might have been to effect a stay of proceedings, it obligates the sureties to pay all costs which may accrue by reason of the appeal, if the same be withdrawn or dismissed, or to pay "the amount of any judgment and all costs that may be recovered against him in the action in the superior court," and to "obey any order made by the court therein."

[1] It is clear that the sureties, by their undertaking, bound themselves to pay the costs on appeal, and the bond, being in an amount in excess of $100, is in all respects sufficient for that purpose. Whether it was also sufficient to stay proceedings is wholly immaterial, so far as the appeal is concerned. To perfect his appeal, the statute makes it indispensably necessary for the appealing party to file an undertaking in the sum of $100 for the payment of the costs on appeal, and when this is done, the court to which the appeal is taken acquires jurisdiction thereof, and obviously cannot be divested of such jurisdiction by the mere failure of the appellant to file a stay bond. Nor is its validity as an appeal bond destroyed by the fact that it also purports to be given to stay execution. Edwards v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 710, 714, 115 Pac. 649; Ward v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 519; Jones v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 589, 91 Pac. 505.

The undertaking in the case of Edwards v. Superior Court, supra, contained the following condition, between which and the condition of the undertaking herein involved it will readily be perceived no substantial difference exists:

"The condition of the above undertaking is such that * * * the said Edwards and others obtained a judgment * * * before James G. Quinn, justice of the peace of Oakland township, in and for the county of Alameda, state of California, on the 25th day of October, 1909, for $73.20, principal sum, and for $9.50 costs; and whereas the above-bounden F. E. Miller (defendant and appellant) is desirous of appealing from the decision of said justice to the superior court in and for the county of Alameda, and a stay of proceedings is claimed: Now, if the above-bounden shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid, the amount of the said judgment and all costs, and obey any order the said superior court may make therein, if the said appeal be withdrawn or dismissed, or pay the amount of any judgment and all the costs that may be recovered against the said appellant in the said superior court, and obey any order the said court may make therein, then this obligation to be null and void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

Chief Justice Beatty, who prepared the main opinion in that case, among other things, said:

"The latest decision of this court upon that point (Jones v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 589, 91 Pac. 505) is a conclusive affirmation of the sufficiency of the undertaking under section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It may be doubted whether the decision in that case successfully distinguishes the case of McConky v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 83, in which section 978 appears to have been differently construed, but if that case was not distinguishable it was certainly overruled, and, I have no doubt, properly overruled, for the construction there given to section 978 was only reached by disregarding the express terms of the statute; i. e., by the substitution of the word 'or' for 'and' with the effect of requiring two undertakings each containing the same condition, where one was amply sufficient for every conceivable purpose, and that in a class of actions where simplicity of procedure and economy are a most important desideratum."

In a concurring opinion the other members of the court said:

"We concur in the order denying a writ, on the ground that the bond is sufficient to confer jurisdiction on the superior court. The undertaking is in more than the sum of $100, and is conditioned for the payment of the costs on the appeal. It thus contains all that is required by section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure to make the appeal effectual. * * * Whether or not it is effectual to operate as a stay bond is not here involved. We express no opinion on this point, nor do we think it necessary for the decision of this case to question the correctness of McConky v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 83."

The Edwards Case "is a conclusive affirmation of the sufficiency of the undertaking" in "the present case," under section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as a bond for the payment of costs on appeal. The learned counsel for the respondents argue, however:

"It is elementary that, if a court has jurisdiction to decide a question correctly, it also has jurisdiction to decide it incorrectly, and to hold that a court exceeds its jurisdiction in granting a motion to dismiss would compel us to hold that it exceeds its jurisdiction in denying such motion. Therefore a rule which holds that the superior court exceeds its jurisdiction in either granting or denying a motion must, perforce, hold that the superior court cannot pass upon a motion at all. A litigant could, under such a rule, appeal to the superior court without filing any bond whatever and the superior court would be without jurisdiction to dismiss it."

[2, 3] The reasoning is clearly and wholly fallacious. The superior court has the right and the power to pass upon and decide a motion to dismiss an appeal taken thereto, and where the motion is based upon the ground that the undertaking required by section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the indemnification of the costs accruing by reason of the appeal has not been filed, it is not only within the power, but it is the duty, of the court to dismiss the appeal, or, speaking more accurately, the attempted appeal, since, as stated, the section named makes the filing of such an undertaking one of the essential and, indeed, indispensable requisites for conferring upon such court jurisdiction to hear and determine an appeal thereto from a justice's or police court. The rule that, when a court once obtains jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action, it then has jurisdiction to decide a question arising therein erroneously as well as correctly, has no application to a case where the very question to be determined is whether the court has the legal authority to hear and determine the matter before it. The rule simply means that when the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and makes error during the course of the trial or in its final decision, such error is correctible, not through a jurisdictional writ, but solely by appeal. Obviously, if the trial court is called upon to decide whether it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and determines the question erroneously, or, having no jurisdiction, nevertheless claims it, it can be prevented from proceeding to exercise the usurped authority or, having exercised it, its action may be annulled and vacated by means of the remedy appropriate thereto.

For the reasons herein given, the order made by the respondents in this proceeding dismissing the appeal by the petitioners herein from the judgment of the justice's court of Little Lake township, Mendocino county, in the action wherein said Harvey Carlton was plaintiff and the said petitioners were defendants, is hereby annulled, set aside and vacated.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

SMITH et al. v. SMITH. (S. F. 6883.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1916.)

1. DEEDS ⚡61—DELIVERY—ESCROW.

Where deeds to his sons were delivered by an aged father to his attorney with directions to hold them in escrow until his death, and then to deliver them to the sons, there was a valid delivery thereof, where previously thereto the attorney explained to the grantor that he would have no power thereafter to withdraw the deeds if he once delivered them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 140, 141; Dec. Dig. ⚡61.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1011(1)—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where a finding of the trial court is based on sufficient although conflicting testimony, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3983-3988; Dec. Dig. ⚡1011(1).]

3. DEEDS ⚡61—DELIVERY—ESCROW.

Whether, in any case of deposit of deeds in escrow, delivery is sufficient, depends upon the intention of the grantor at the time of giving the deed to the third person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 140, 141; Dec. Dig. ⚡61.]

4. DEEDS ⚡61—DELIVERY—DIRECTION—"DELIVER"—"THEN TAKE EFFECT."

Where deeds were deposited with third person, a direction to the depository to deliver them "upon my death," "so that they may then take effect," did not prevent the present passing of title, where the direction also used the technical language, "I herewith deliver to you two deeds," and where, in view of all the evidence, the court was justified in deciding that the word "deliver" used in the expression, "upon my death deliver them," was employed in its general sense, meaning "transmit," and that the expression "then take effect," referred not to vesting of title, but to the time of enjoyment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 140, 141; Dec. Dig. ⚡61.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Deliver.]

5. EVIDENCE ⚡417(17)—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONSTRUCTION OF WRITING—STATUTE.

Where it was claimed that a deed was delivered in escrow with written instructions which did not purport to be all the directions given, and oral testimony of the depository as to the circumstances was necessary to a full understanding and interpretation of his written instructions, such oral testimony was admissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 1860, as to construing written instruments in the light of surrounding circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1898; Dec. Dig. ⚡417(17).]

6. DEEDS ⚡61—DELIVERY—ESCROW—ATTORNEY OF GRANTOR.

An attorney of the grantor is not disqualified from assuming the duty of holding a deed in escrow for another grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 140, 141; Dec. Dig. ⚡61.]

7. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⚡244—NOTICE OF OTHER DEEDS—EVIDENCE.

A finding that a subsequent grantee had knowledge of prior deeds of the property by her grantor was supported by evidence that the attorney drawing the subsequent deeds questioned her grantor in her presence, as to whether he had straightened out the former deeds, and the grantor replied they had never been annulled.

8. WITNESSES ⚡199(2)—PRIVILEGES—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

Where two sons claimed title under earlier deeds by their father to them, which had been placed in escrow until the father's death, statements of an attorney employed by their father to draw a subsequent deed conveying the same land to the father's second wife, as to conversation had at the time which gave actual notice of the prior deed to the second wife, were not privileged so far as the sons were concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 750; Dec. Dig. ⚡199(2).]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1027—HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO MAKE FINDINGS.

The Supreme Court will not reverse a judgment because of failure to make findings which would not necessitate a different judgment, even if they were made and entered in appellant's favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4033; Dec. Dig. ⚡1027.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by N. De Forest Smith and another against Ella R. Dooley Smith. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. W. Waldorf and R. M. Wright, both of San Jose, for appellant. Chas. M. Cassin and James L. Atteridge, both of San Jose, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment against her and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The action had reference to a certain tract of land in the county of Santa Clara. On the 19th of October, 1907, Uriah Smith owned this property in fee simple. On that day he made two deeds purporting to convey the title to his two sons, N. De Forest Smith and Grove C. Smith. These deeds were delivered to B. Grant Taylor, Esq., his attorney, with written instructions as follows:

"Saratoga, California, Oct. 19, 1907.

"Mr. B. Grant Taylor, Attorney at Law, Saratoga, California—Dear Sir: I herewith deliver to you two deeds, one to each of my sons, N. D. Smith and G. C. Smith, and direct that you keep and hold the same in escrow during my lifetime, and upon my death deliver them to N. D. Smith and G. C. Smith so that they may then take effect. Uriah Smith."

Mr. Taylor accepted the deeds and held them in his custody until after the death of Uriah Smith, which took place on the 31st day of July, 1911. Shortly thereafter he delivered the deeds to the grantees named therein and by cross-conveyances they have fixed their ownership each of an undivided half interest in such title as passed by the original deeds.

Meanwhile the grantor, Uriah Smith, who was 85 years of age, had met and had proposed marriage to the defendant, then Mrs. Dooley, a woman many years his junior. On July 25, 1910, Uriah Smith deeded to Mrs. Dooley the greater part of the property described in the deeds which had been executed previously and delivered to Mr. Taylor. The old man and Mrs. Dooley were married on August 2, 1910, and on March 22, 1911, they separated.

The complaint states three causes of action. In the first are pleaded Uriah Smith's ownership of the property on October 19, 1907; the making and delivery in escrow of the two deeds to his sons; their ownership as tenants in common of the property; Uriah's unsoundness of mind at the time when he made the deed to Mrs. Dooley on July 25, 1910; and that by pretending great affection for him she took an unfair advantage and fraudulently induced him to make the deed to her. The court did not find upon the allegations of unsoundness of mind and undue influence. It was also set forth in the pleading of the first cause of action that prior to and at the time of the execution of the deed of July 25, 1910, from Uriah Smith to the defendant, she well knew of the execution and delivery in escrow of the conveyances to his sons.

The second cause of action was based upon a supposed conspiracy on the part of the defendant to marry the old man, Uriah Smith, and to quarrel with and annoy him for the purpose of securing a division of his property, and it is averred that in pursuance of this design she caused her husband to join in an instrument conveying this land to one Wright, who then executed two deeds, one purporting to convey the greater portion of it to Mrs. Smith, and the other being in form a conveyance of the rest of the land to her husband. The court made no findings upon the issues raised under the second cause of action.

The third cause of action was one to quiet title, pleaded in the usual form, and the court found the allegations therein contained to be true.

By her answer defendant put in issue the material averments of the complaint, and she filed a cross-complaint by which she sought to quiet title to the land.

Judgment was in favor of plaintiffs quieting their title and decreeing that they have and recover possession of the property.

Appellant's counsel insist that their demurrer to the complaint on the ground that several incompatible causes of action were joined therein should have been sustained, but, as their argument is based almost entirely upon matters regarding which the court made no findings and pronounced no judgment, we need not consider it. Their argument relative to the alleged ambiguity and unintelligibility of the complaint may be similarly disposed of.

[1-3] The most important attacks made upon the judgment of the superior court depend upon the contentions that the deeds from Uriah Smith to his sons are invalid: (1) As attempted testamentary disposition of the land; and (2) as wanting valid delivery during the lifetime of the grantor. We are of the opinion that the finding of the court supporting as valid the delivery of the deeds to Mr. Taylor is amply sustained by the evidence. Mr. Taylor testified, in substance, that on the 19th of October, 1907, Mr. Smith consulted him, stating a wish that N. De Forest Smith and Grove C. Smith should have in equal portions the old man's property at Saratoga but that he might live there during the rest of his lifetime. Under his instructions Mr. Taylor prepared deeds making what seemed to the grantor a just division of the land, and these, together with the written directions copied above in this opinion, were thereafter retained by the attorney. Before the manual tradition of these instruments from Mr. Smith to Mr. Taylor the latter explained to the grantor what was necessary to constitute a good delivery in escrow in the full legal sense, telling him that he must surrender all control over the documents, and that he would have no power thereafter to withdraw them or otherwise to command their disposal. We believe that this testimony and the letter of instruction are amply sufficient to establish the transaction as one falling within the rule announced in such cases as Moore v. Trott, 156 Cal. 353, 104 Pac. 578, 134 Am. St. Rep. 131; Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 755, 112 Pac. 544; Moore v. Trott, 162 Cal. 268, 122 Pac. 462; Husheon v. Kelley, 162 Cal. 656, 124 Pac. 231; and Bias v. Reed, 169 Cal. 33-44, 145 Pac. 516. It is true that some of the actions of Uriah Smith after the deposit of the deeds with Mr. Taylor might indicate either that he did not intend to deliver them and place them beyond his power of recall, or that the old man had forgotten the transaction with his attorney; but the finding of the court based upon conflicting testimony will not be disturbed if there is sufficient to support the conclusion that a delivery has taken place. The solution of the question of delivery or nondelivery in each case is based upon the intention of the grantor at the time of passing the deed to a third person. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631-639, 151 Pac. 1; Donahue v. Sweeney, 171 Cal. 388-391, 153 Pac. 708; Follmer v. Rohrer, supra; Cox v. Schnerr, 156 Pac. 509-514.

[4] Appellant places great stress upon the words contained in the written directions to Mr. Taylor: "Upon my death deliver them" (the deeds) and "so that they may then take effect." There is nothing in this language to prevent the present passing of title at the time of the giving of the deeds to Mr. Taylor, if the intention of the grantor was that it should then pass. Earlier in the letter of instruction Mr. Smith had used the technical language, "I herewith deliver to you two deeds." In view of all of the evidence the court was justified in deciding that the word "deliver," used in the latter part of the writing, was employed in its general sense meaning "transmit," and that the expression "then take effect" referred not to the vesting of title, but to the time of enjoyment. Haug v. Schumacher, 50 App. Div. 562, 64 N. Y. Supp. 310-313; Middleton's Heirs v. Middleton's Devisees (Ky.) 43 S. W. 677; Newberry v. Hinman, 49 Conn. 130-132; Chambers v. Chambers, 139 Ind. 111-119, 38 N. E. 334; Dove v. Torr, 128 Mass. 38-40.

[5] Appellant takes the position that the court erred in permitting oral testimony of the occurrences and circumstances surrounding the preparation of the deeds and the passing of them by Uriah Smith to Mr. Taylor. The course pursued was entirely proper. The written instructions did not purport to be all of the directions given, and the letter does not come under the rule that a written contract may not be varied by oral testimony. Mr. Taylor's testimony was necessary to a full understanding and interpretation of the writing. It was properly admitted therefore. Section 1860, Code Civ. Proc.; Clarke v. Eureka County Bank (C. C.) 123 Fed. 922-927. This court has recently declared the rule that, where the very question is whether or not the alleged grantor has parted with his title by making an efficient delivery of his deed, his acts and statements material to the question of delivery during the entire period of the escrow may be proven. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631-648, 151 Pac. 1.

[6] There is no force in the suggestion that because of his status as Mr. Smith's attorney Mr. Taylor might not occupy the position of the "third person" to whom a deed might be delivered in escrow for another grantee. In nearly all of the cases cited above, notably in Bury v. Young, the holder of the deeds was the attorney for the grantor, and we are aware of no rule of law disqualifying an attorney from assuming such a duty.

[7] Appellant attacks as without real or material support the findings that at the time of the execution of the deed to her on July 25, 1910, she had knowledge of the deeds held in escrow by Mr. Taylor. It is true that she vigorously denied such knowledge, but the court's finding is supported by the testimony of Mr. J. H. Russell, an attorney at law having an office in San Jose. Mr. Russell testified that Mr. Uriah Smith called upon him on July 24, 1910, and requested him to draw a deed in favor of Mrs. Dooley for the conveyance of the property here in dispute. On the following day he called again, accompanied by Mrs. Dooley. According to Mr. Russell's testimony, before the deed was executed he said to Mr. Smith:

"You have already conveyed this property in escrow, have you not, and has that matter been straightened out so that you have the entire title?"

Mr. Smith replied that the situation was just as it had been; that he had executed a deed in favor of his sons covering these properties; that these deeds were still in existence; and that they had never been annulled. Mrs. Dooley was present when this conversation between Uriah Smith and Mr. Russell took place. Later, when Mr. Smith and Mrs. Dooley returned for the documents, the former told Mr. Russell that his sons would not, he believed, claim any right under the escrow deeds if Mrs. Dooley would carry out her contract to marry him and to care for him in his old age. The sons were not present at that time, but the conversation about the deeds, as we have said, occurred in Mrs. Dooley's presence. It is suggested that this notice was not sufficiently precise to put appellant upon her guard. We cannot see how it could have been more definite unless the deeds themselves had been exhibited to defendant. Here was information by her intended grantor that he had previously dispossessed himself of the title to the land which he was about to give to her.

There is a further suggestion that it does not affirmatively appear that Mrs. Dooley heard these conversations. She was quite deaf, but Mr. Russell testified that both he and the aged Uriah Smith were hard of hearing, that the conversations took place within a few feet of Mrs. Dooley, and that they were conducted in very loud tones. Whether or not the alleged conversations occurred and whether they were heard by defendant or not were matters to be decided by the superior court, and we will not disturb the adjudication of that tribunal based upon the conflicting testimony.

[8] It is asserted also that Mr. Russell was attorney and common agent for both grantor and grantee named in the deed which he prepared, and that therefore the communications made to him when they were present were privileged so far as plaintiffs were concerned. There was no proof that Mr. Russell was acting for Mrs. Dooley. He was employed by Mr. Smith and acted under his orders. Nevertheless appellant contends that the statements of Mr. Russell come within the rule of privilege applying where, for example, an attorney acts for a husband and wife in preparing a declaration of homestead. In re Bauer, 79 Cal. 304-312, 21 Pac. 759. But that rule only operates against strangers. The sons claiming title under the deeds which had been placed in escrow were not within that category.

"It is generally considered that the rule of privilege does not apply in litigation, after the client's death, between parties, all of whom claim under the client." 40 Cyc. p. 2380.

Among the citations supporting this text are Kern v. Kern, 154 Ind. 29, 55 N. E. 1004; Phillips v. Chase, 201 Mass. 444-448, 87 N. E. 755, 131 Am. St. Rep. 406, and Glover v. Patten, 165 U. S. 394-406, 17 Sup. Ct. 411, 41 L. Ed. 760.

It will be remembered that in the Bauer Case the contest was between a son asserting title to property as an heir and his mother claiming under a homestead, and it was held that the statements of his father and mother, made to the attorney who prepared the declaration of homestead, were not privileged. In Murphy v. Waterhouse, 113 Cal. 467-470, 45 Pac. 866, 54 Am. St. Rep. 365, Mr. Justice McFarland, after citing the rule announced in the Bauer Case, used the following language:

"The rule, however, is the same where the witness is attorney for only one of the contracting parties. Where two persons are negotiating with each other in the presence of the attorney of one of the parties, the very nature of the transaction and the circumstances surrounding it are inconsistent with the notion of a confidential communication between one of the parties and his attorney who happens to be present."

In Harris v. Harris, 136 Cal. 384, 69 Pac. 23, the same rule was announced, and it was also followed in Gerety v. O'Sheehan, 9 Cal. App. 447-450, 99 Pac. 545. The testimony of Mr. Russell was admissible and was a sufficient basis for the finding that Mrs. Dooley took the deed from Uriah Smith with knowledge of the existence of the deeds to his sons.

[9] The court failed to find upon certain issues, namely upon Uriah Smith's mental condition in July, 1910; upon the matter of the alleged unfair advantage over the old man taken by defendant; upon the question of consideration for the deed to defendant; upon the motives of defendant in marrying Uriah Smith; and upon the subject of the alleged plan to obtain the property by evil designs. Findings upon these aspects of the litigation were not necessary in view of the judgment that there had been a valid delivery of the deeds to the plaintiffs in escrow, and that defendant then had full knowledge of that transaction. The determination of the last-named issues controlled the judgment. This court will not reverse a judgment because of failure to make findings which would not necessitate a different judgment, even if they were made and entered in the appellant's favor. Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617-622, 28 Pac. 557; Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 615-619, 30 Pac. 783, 19 L. R. A. 92; Merrill v. Merrill, 102 Cal. 317-319, 36 Pac. 675; Morrison v. Stone, 103 Cal. 94-97, 37 Pac. 142; Gould v. Adams, 108 Cal. 365-368, 41 Pac.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

LOCKWOOD. (S. F. 7346.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1916.)

1. CORPORATIONS — 314(2)—OFFICERS—INDIVIDUAL PROFITS FROM CORPORATE BUSINESS.

The liability of the president of a corporation to account to the company for compensation paid him under a secret contract with a firm for assisting it in selling the corporation's stock is not affected by the fact that his services were reasonably worth the sum paid him.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Western States Life Insurance Company against Arthur D. Lockwood, as executor. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Short, of Fresno, and Titus, Creed & Dall and A. E. Bolton, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Otto Irving Wise, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by defendant on the judgment roll from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. It is the second appeal in the case, a former judgment given on the pleadings in favor of the estate of Mr. Briggs on the theory that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, having been reversed by this court. 166 Cal. 185, 135 Pac. 496. As stated in the opinion then filed, the case made by the complaint was as follows:

"Plaintiff is a corporation incorporated on October 11, 1909, under the law of this state, to do a life insurance business therein. Its articles of incorporation provided for a capital stock of $1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares, of the par value of $10 each. On October 16, 1909, it entered into a written agreement with the partnership firm of Pratt & Grigsby, by which said firm agreed to sell all the capital stock of plaintiff within one year from the date of its incorporation, and to pay plaintiff therefor $13 per share for the first 50,000 shares sold and issued, and $15 per share for the remaining 50,000 shares, making in all $1,400,000, said sale to be without expense of any kind to the plaintiff. On October 19, 1909, said Arthur R. Briggs, defendants' testator, was elected president of plaintiff corporation, and from that day to and including October 11, 1910, was a director and the president of said corporation. In January, 1910, 'he demanded of said Pratt & Grigsby a sum equal to 22½ per cent. of the net profits earned, or that would be earned by said Pratt & Grigsby from the sale of the capital stock of plaintiff corporation under and by virtue of the agreement between said Pratt & Grigsby and plaintiff,' and 'threatened to resign as president of plaintiff, and that he would not render further service as such president in aiding said Pratt & Grigsby in the sale of the capital stock of plaintiff' if Pratt & Grigsby refused to pay him said amount. Pratt & Grigsby, 'well knowing that, without the aid, assistance, and co-operation of said Arthur R. Briggs, they would be unable to sell the entire capital stock of plaintiff within one year from the date of the incorporation of plaintiff as provided in their agreement and by law,' thereupon agreed to pay him the percentage demanded. They did sell all the stock as provided in the agreement between them and plaintiff, and prior to October 11, 1910, paid to plaintiff therefor the sum of $1,400,000. They sold the same at such price that they 'earned a net profit of $180,000,' and in pursuance of their agreement with defendants' testator paid to him at various dates between March 7, 1910, and September 22, 1910, amounts aggregating $40,500, being 22½ per cent. of their net profits of $180,000. Plaintiff and its board of directors never knew anything about the transaction between Mr. Briggs and Pratt & Grigsby until after the death of the former, which occurred October 24, 1910, and never authorized, consented to, or acquiesced therein."

The action was subsequently tried, and the findings of the trial court were in complete accord with the allegations of the complaint, except that it was substantially found that the amount received by defendant's testator from Pratt & Grigsby on account of the matters referred to in the complaint was $38,100, instead of $40,500. This was because, as found by the trial court, Mr. Briggs, in accord with his agreement with Pratt & Grigsby, paid the latter 60 per cent. of his salary of $1,000 per month as president, paid him by plaintiff for June, July, August, and September, 1910. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff against appellant, as the surviving executor of the will of deceased, for $38,100, with interest from June 13, 1911. The appeal being on the judgment roll alone, the findings of fact are necessarily conclusive on this appeal, and, in view of the ruling on the former appeal, it must be held that such findings support the judgment. The alleged errors assigned on this appeal are that the trial court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the first, second, and third separate answers and defenses of the defendant, and in granting in so far as one part of the answer was concerned, a motion to strike out. An examination of the matter stricken from the answer and the matters set forth in the separate answers and defenses, discloses no good ground for holding, in view of what was said on the former appeal, and has become the law of this case, that the trial court erred in any of these rulings.

In the opinion on the former appeal it was shown that the situation was that, the contract of Pratt & Grigsby with plaintiff corporation being unexecuted, the same being a contract of employment to secure subscriptions to the full amount of the fixed capital within one year, paying $13 per share on the first 50,000 shares and $15 per share on the remaining 50,000 shares, and receiving as their compensation all sums they could obtain in excess of said amounts, Mr. Briggs, being a director and the president of plaintiff corporation, secretly became a partner of Pratt & Grigsby in the net profits received and to be received by them under said contract, the consideration therefor being such aid, assistance, and co-operation as he might be able to give them in completing their undertaking, and under this arrangement, while still director and president of plaintiff, received the profits sued for to his own use, all without notice to or knowledge of the plaintiff or any of its directors. It was held for reasons stated in the opinion that in acquiring this interest in the contract of Pratt & Grigsby, Mr. Briggs acquired an interest that was possibly adverse to his fiduciary duty, and that, in so far as pecuniary interest was concerned, he secretly placed himself in a position that was hostile to the interests he was bound to protect as an officer of the corporation, and in a position where conflict might arise between his trust duty and his personal interest. The court said:

"The rules we have referred to do not allow the president of a corporation to occupy such a position. For him to do so is a violation or disregard of the obligations incident to the fiduciary or quasi trust relation that he occupies. It matters not that the officer is entirely free from any intent to injure the corporation in the slightest degree, acting in fact in the highest good faith throughout, or that his actions really advantage the corporation. No inquiry may be made into such matters. The inquiry in this regard is stopped when the relation is disclosed."

It was further said that by acquiring this interest in the net profits of Pratt & Grigsby, Mr. Briggs clearly placed himself in a position antagonistic, so far as pecuniary interest was concerned, to the interests of those who were to subscribe for the stock, for it immediately became to his pecuniary interest to assist in obtaining from them as high a price as possible for the stock over and above the net amount that was to go to plaintiff corporation. It was held that the duty of securing subscriptions to the full amount of the fixed capital was one enjoined by the law upon the directors, that no director could lawfully make any secret profits for himself in the matter of such subscriptions, and that in the discharge of this trust they were practically "promoters of the corporation forbidden to make any secret profit." It was said:

"Whatever work any of them actually did in that behalf they must be held to have done as directors, in execution of the trust confided to them."

It was squarely held, for reasons stated in the opinion, that Mr. Briggs being the president and director of a corporation actually engaged in obtaining the subscriptions to its capital stock necessary under the law to enable it to commence and continue its business, stood in such a relation to those who subscribed and thereby became stockholders, that he was absolutely precluded from assuming any such position without a full and fair disclosure. It was substantially held that any secret profits obtained by Mr. Briggs under his arrangement with Pratt & Grigsby could be recovered by plaintiff corporation, and that it was entirely immaterial that the corporation may not have been damaged by the transaction, such secret profits belonging to the corporation for the benefit of its stockholders.

[1] Of course, as stated in the opinion, the ruling on the former appeal was upon the assumption that the complaint stated the facts correctly. That the allegations of the complaint were in all respects true is now established by the findings of the trial court. That the "work, labor, services, and assistance" of Mr. Briggs in connection with the carrying out of the Pratt & Grigsby agreement "were fairly and reasonably worth the said sum of $40,500," which was alleged in the portion of the answer stricken out by the trial court, is clearly immaterial, in view of the opinion on the former appeal. It remains only to determine whether there is anything material alleged in the separate answers and defenses to change the situation. Substantially the matters alleged are as follows:

Mr. Briggs was president of the California Development Board, and while also president and a director of plaintiff "was not required or expected to render any services as such, * * * except such mere formal services as were required of him to be performed by law as such, until said Pratt & Grigsby should have sold said stock so as to enable said corporation to do the business for which it was incorporated." Prior to the agreement between him and Pratt & Grigsby it had become apparent to them (Briggs and Pratt & Grigsby) that the latter could not perform their part of the contract "without the active aid, time, assistance, and co-operation" of Briggs. For this reason the agreement was entered into between them, Briggs to devote "his time, energies, services, and abilities" to the work. Briggs thereupon resigned his position as president of the California Development Board, giving up "the salary connected with said position," and performed his part of his contract with Pratt & Grigsby, giving his entire time thereto, and expending "large and considerable sums of money for his expenses in so doing and in necessary travel * * * on said business." The fact that he was doing all this was known to plaintiff, its officers, directors, and members, and they made no objection thereto, and his services and the benefit thereof were desired, and knowingly accepted and received, by plaintiff and its officers. His services and efforts were indispensably necessary to the carrying out of this contract by Pratt & Grigsby. The services of Briggs were reasonably worth $40,500, and were worth that amount to plaintiff corporation. Plaintiff corporation has not in any way paid or compensated Briggs for such "work, labor, and expenditure." Plaintiff corporation settled with Pratt & Grigsby upon the completion of their contract, with full knowledge of these facts, affirming and ratifying said contract between it and Pratt & Grigsby, and allowing them to receive the full amount of the compensation expressed therein. Plaintiff never offered to pay the executors of the will of Mr. Briggs any sum of money for his services. Because of the payment to him by Pratt & Grigsby, Briggs never made any claim against plaintiff corporation for compensation.

[2, 3] To our minds, in view of what was said on the former decision, there is nothing in all this to affect the case made by the complaint in so far as profits received by Mr. Briggs by reason of his arrangement with Pratt & Grigsby are concerned. It clearly enough appears from the opinion that it was in view of the duties and obligations held to be imposed on the directors by the law, and existing solely because of the fact that they were directors, duties and obligations in no degree lessened by their agreement employing Pratt & Grigsby to assist them in obtaining subscriptions, that it was held that in the matter of obtaining these subscriptions, they were practically promoters of the corporation, forbidden to make any secret profit, and that, whatever work any of them did in that behalf, he must be held to have done in execution of his trust as such director. In the face of this ruling, we cannot see any force in the attempted allegation that Mr. Briggs "was not required or expected to render any services," etc., in connection with the obtaining of subscriptions. It is a mere conclusion of the pleader, opposed to what was said in the former opinion as to the law applicable in such matters. It was held that in view of the law a director of the corporation could not make any secret profit in the matter of obtaining such subscriptions, and especially that Mr. Briggs, who was both president and a director, by reason of his consequent relation to those who were to subscribe for the stock, was by the law absolutely precluded from the enjoyment of secret profits as the result of what was practically a partnership agreement with Pratt & Grigsby in the matter of their contract with plaintiff corporation. That he gave up another position the better to enable him to carry out his undertaking with Pratt & Grigsby, that Pratt & Grigsby could not have completed their contract with plaintiff corporation without his aid, that it was to the best interests of plaintiff corporation that Pratt & Grigsby should fully perform their contract, that the services, etc., of Mr. Briggs were reasonably worth $40,500, appears to us to be absolutely immaterial, in view of what is declared in the former opinion to be the law applicable to such a situation as is here presented. The mere fact that it was known that he was actively co-operating in the effort to obtain the necessary subscriptions, giving his entire time thereto, and even expending sums of money for traveling and other expenses, is likewise immaterial. The important thing is that nobody knew that there was an agreement of partnership between him and Pratt & Grigsby, under which he, the president and a director of the plaintiff corporation, was to share, and did share, in the profits of the contract between them and the corporation. There was never any disclosure as to this, and the circumstances were such, in view of what was said in the former appeal, that in the absence of a full and fair disclosure he could not participate in the profits made by Pratt & Grigsby under their contract, and that, to the extent to which he did participate by reason of his secret agreement with them, he was receiving "secret profits" which must be held to belong to the corporation.

It is to be noted that we have not in this case any basis for the application of authorities to the effect that even if there be a violation of the obligation resting on an officer of a corporation, nevertheless the corporation must pay for the value of the thing which it receives. As was said in the former opinion, these cases have no application here, the case being one in which "the plaintiff corporation is simply seeking to recover such secret profits as were made by one of its officers in a transaction wherein he was forbidden to make any such secret profits, and which profits, in view of the rules we have discussed, belong to the corporation."

We cannot regard as material in this inquiry the value to Pratt & Grigsby, in the carrying out of their contract, of the co-operation of Mr. Briggs, the reasonable value of his time and service in performing his part of his agreement with them, or even the amounts of money expended by him for traveling and other expenses in so performing. As to expenditures there is only the most general sort of allegation without any statement of amount, and learned counsel for appellant do not strongly contend for any real distinction between moneys advanced and services rendered. The real contention is that there is no "secret profit" within the meaning of the rule applicable here where the services given for the money received were reasonably worth the amount received and the amount was honestly and fairly earned. We think there can be no question but that any moneys received by Mr. Briggs by virtue of his agreement with Pratt & Grigsby for a definite percentage of the net profits of their contract with the corporation, in consideration of his proposed active personal co-operation in the matter of carrying out such contract, were "secret profits" within the meaning of the rule, regardless of the value of his services, etc., given in carrying out his agreement with them.

As substantially already said, we think that the claims of learned counsel for appellant were substantially disposed of by what was said on the former appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILLS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(Civ. 1829.)

1. RAILROADS — 411(10) — INJURIES TO ANIMALS ON TRACKS — FENCE LAWS.

Civ. Code, § 485, prior to amendment of 1915, requiring fences and making railroads liable for animals killed from absence of such fences, was not intended to be for the benefit of owners of stock running at large, but the right of action given existed only in favor of one having some interest in land adjoining the right of way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1426; Dec. Dig. 411(10).]

2. RAILROADS — 441(6) — INJURIES TO ANIMALS — FENCES — STATUTE — INTEREST OF LESSOR.

Under such statute a lessee of premises adjoining and separated by a fence from a railroad right of way could not recover because horses kept on such premises were killed by escaping to the right of way through a gate in the fence carelessly permitted by the railroad company to remain open, without showing that the lessor had title to the premises, or owned an interest therein or was in possession of it, and that such lessee obtained possession through his lessor.

3. RAILROADS — 413(4) — INJURIES TO ANIMALS — FENCE — GATES.

Under such statute a railroad company maintaining a sufficient gate was required to use only reasonable diligence in keeping the gate closed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1465; Dec. Dig. 413(4).]

4. RAILROADS — 440(9) — INJURIES TO ANIMALS — FENCE — GATES — ACTION — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Under such statute, in action for killing animals on railroad right of way because they escaped through gate in railroad fence, whether the railroad company used reasonable diligence in keeping the gate closed was for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Mary Wills against the Southern Pacific Company. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for appellant. Edwards & Smith, of Dinuba, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Pursuant to the verdict of a jury, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $600 damages on account of the loss of certain horses of the plaintiff which were killed on the defendant's railroad track. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

[1] There is in the complaint an allegation of negligence by the defendant in running and managing its train whereby the horses were killed. The evidence shows that they were killed by a collision with one of defendant's trains. But there is no evidence of carelessness or negligence in the running of the train, and the judgment cannot be sustained unless a cause of action has been established upon another theory of the case arising from the provisions of section 485 of the Civil Code. We refer to that section as it existed prior to the amendment of 1915. It is therein enacted that:

"Railroad corporations must make and maintain a good and sufficient fence on either or both sides of their track and property. In case they do not make and maintain such fence, if their engine or cars shall kill or maim any cattle or other domestic animals upon their line of road which passes through or along the property of the owner thereof, they must pay to the owner of such cattle or other domestic animals a fair market price for the same, unless it occurred through the neglect or fault of the owner of the animal so killed or maimed. * * *"

The provisions of the foregoing section are not intended to be for the benefit of the owners of stock running at large, but the right of action there given exists only in favor of one having some interest in land adjoining the right of way of a railroad. It has been held that the interest of a lessee in the land constitutes a sufficient ownership under the statute. Walther v. Sierra Ry. Co., 141 Cal. 288, 74 Pac. 840. And there are intimations that a licensee in possession of land under a license from the owner is included in the benefit of the statute. McCoy v. Southern Pacific Co., 94 Cal. 568, 29 Pac. 1110, where it was said that such license (in that case derived from lessees) did not confer upon the licensee any rights as against the railroad company which the licensors themselves did not possess; that he stood in the place of the lessees and possessed only such rights as they could have enforced.

In the present action it is alleged in the complaint that on the 26th day of January, 1914, the plaintiff was the owner and possessed of certain horses, and that said horses were lawfully upon certain described land, from which land the horses strayed in and upon the track and ground occupied by the railroad. It is alleged that the defendant so carelessly and negligently permitted its gates in its fences to remain open that it permitted said horses to go from the pasture of the plaintiff upon the said railroad track. These are the only facts alleged which in any way connect the plaintiff with any ownership or right of occupancy of land adjacent to the railroad. Unless such allegations can be construed as declaring that the plaintiff owned the land or was in occupancy thereof as tenant or licensee, it must follow that the complaint does not state a cause of action. Without deciding that the complaint is sufficient in this respect, we will assume its sufficiency for the purpose of considering the evidence bearing upon the supposed issue. And we will here note that the complaint was unverified, and that all of its allegations are denied.

[2] It was shown that there was a fence separating the railroad right of way from the land described in the complaint, that there was a gate in the fence, and that on and before the date of the killing of the horses they were kept by the plaintiff in the field upon which that gate opened. The plaintiff testified that she leased the premises described in the complaint from one P. T. Clark, and the court received in evidence a document identified by the plaintiff, which was in terms a lease of those premises by Clark to her. All of the foregoing evidence was received over objections duly made by defendant's counsel. No effort was made by the plaintiff to show that Clark owned the land or owned any interest therein, or that he was in possession of it, or that plaintiff obtained possession through him. So far as the record shows, Clark may have been in every respect an absolute stranger to said premises both as to title and possession.

There is evidence sufficient to establish the facts that the defendant negligently permitted the gate to remain open, and that the horses strayed from the field to the railroad tracks and were killed without any fault of the plaintiff. We have stated the evidence merely for the purpose of considering whether it is sufficient to establish any right of the plaintiff in or to the land on which she was keeping her horses. We are of the opinion that it is wholly insufficient for that purpose. As the record does not show who was the owner of the land or where he was at any time, it may be that the plaintiff's occupancy there was entirely without his knowledge or consent, and that she was a mere trespasser. If so, the statute upon which she must rely in this case gives her no cause of action against the defendant.

[3, 4] With regard to the errors claimed in the refusal of instructions and in the giving of instructions by the court to the jury, it seems necessary to refer here to instruction No. 1 given by the court, as follows:

"You are instructed that the laws of this state require railroads to maintain fences beside their tracks, and if they make a gate in the fence, it is a part of the fence, and when there is a road across their track with a gate in the fence across it, they are under the same duty to keep it in repair when erected as it is regarding any other part of the fence, and also it is their duty to keep such gate closed at all proper occasions to prevent stock from adjoining lands from passing upon the right of way of said roadbed."

The objection urged is that the instruction imposes upon the defendant the absolute duty to keep the gate closed, whereas in fact its only duty was to use reasonable care to keep it closed. In Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 11 Cal. App. 278, 285, 104 Pac. 713, 716, the court said:

"Had the defendant erected and maintained a good and sufficient gate, it would have been required only to exercise reasonable diligence in keeping the gate closed"—citing and quoting from Thompson on Negligence, § 2059.

In the case at bar no claim has been made that the gate was insufficient or out of repair. On the contrary, the testimony of the plaintiff's own witnesses proves that the fence was sufficient to turn stock and that the gate was better than the fence. It seems that the horses strayed out of the field because some person whose identity was not ascertained left the gate open on the afternoon preceding the night when these horses were killed. Therefore clearly the question for the jury to determine was as to whether the defendant had used reasonable diligence in the matter of keeping its gate closed. Therefore the instruction as given was not only erroneous, but also it was seriously prejudicial to the defense.

The judgment and order are reversed.

TRACY v. SUMIDA. (Civ. 1904.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—174(10)—APPEAL—JURISDICTION—AMENDMENT.

Where, upon appeal by plaintiff to the superior court from judgment in action brought in justice court upon a contract to recover $171, an amended complaint was filed wherein the cause of action based on the contract was stated in the sum of $990, upon which judgment was asked, the superior court had no jurisdiction, since, the action being originally upon a contract for recovery of less than $300, it had no jurisdiction except on appeal, and the effect of the amendment was to convert the action into one over which the justice court had no jurisdiction, thereby depriving the superior court of its jurisdiction by appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 672; Dec. Dig. 174(10).]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR—20—APPELLATE JURISDICTION—COURT OF APPEAL—JUSTICE COURT CASES.

Erroneous assumption of appellate jurisdiction by the superior court over a justice court case for recovery of less than $300 on a contract cannot be reviewed by appeal to the Court of Appeal, since it has no appellate jurisdiction over such justice court cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Marvin G. Tracy against K. Sumida. From judgment for plaintiff in superior court upon appeal by plaintiff from justice court, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Earl A. Bagby and Farnsworth & McClure, all of Visalia, for appellant. Bradley & Bradley, of Visalia, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action was commenced in the justice's court to recover a balance of $171.80 alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant for wood furnished by plaintiff to defendant under a contract so to do. Defendant answered, denying all the allegations of the complaint, and also filed a cross-complaint wherein he asked judgment against plaintiff. The case was tried by the justice, who gave defendant a judgment for $6.85 and costs, from which the plaintiff appealed to the superior court. After perfecting the appeal plaintiff, by leave of court, filed an amended complaint in said action wherein the cause of action based upon the contract was stated in the sum of $990.40, for which he asked judgment. Defendant demurred to this amended complaint upon the ground, among others, that the court had no jurisdiction of the action set out in said amended complaint. The demurrer was overruled; whereupon defendant filed his answer, consisting of a general denial, and a cross-complaint upon which he asked for judgment against plaintiff in the sum of $842.45. Trial was had by a jury which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $150, and from the judgment entered thereon defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] Clearly the action as brought, since it was upon a contract to recover a sum of money less than $300 (section 112, Code of Civ. Proc.), was one over which the superior court had no jurisdiction, except upon appeal. The effect of the amendment made in the superior court was to convert the action into one over which the justice's court had no jurisdiction; hence the case was one over which the superior court could not, by virtue of its appellate powers, derive jurisdiction by the procedure of an appeal. In Heath v. Robinson, 75 Vt. 133, 53 Atl. 995, it is said:

"An amendment which, had it been made before the justice, would have ousted that court of its jurisdiction, * * * must consequently oust the county court of its appellate jurisdiction upon the same condition."

To the effect that, where jurisdiction of an action is derived from a justice's court on appeal from a judgment rendered therein, the superior court may not, by permitting an amendment of the complaint, acquire jurisdiction in excess of that of the justice's court from which the appeal is taken, see Pecos & N. T. Ry. Co. v. Canyon Coal Co., 102 Tex. 478, 119 S. W. 294; M. & T. Ry. Co. v. Hughes, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 436, 98 S. W. 415; Rose v. Christinet, 77 Ark. 582, 92 S. W. 866; Flanagan v. Reitemier, 26 Ind. App. 243, 59 N. E. 389. In our opinion, since the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace in an action to recover money upon contract is limited to an amount not in excess of $300, the jurisdiction of the superior court on appeal from a judgment rendered therein is likewise limited to such an amount. In other words, the superior court by virtue of the appeal acquires only such jurisdiction as the justice of the peace had.

[2] Conceding, however, as claimed by appellant, that the superior court erred in its rulings and erroneously assumed jurisdiction to try and render judgment upon the cause of action over which it had no jurisdiction, nevertheless such rulings cannot be reviewed by this court on appeal from the judgment rendered. Cases of this character originating in justice's courts cannot be brought by appeal to this court. Williams v. Mecartney, 69 Cal. 556, 11 Pac. 186; Pool v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. App. 533, 84 Pac. 53; Cox v. Southern Pacific Co., 2 Cal. App. 248, 83 Pac. 290.

We agree with respondent's contention that the appeal should be dismissed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

NATIONAL BANK OF BAKERSFIELD v.
WILLIAMS, State Superintendent of Banks. (Civ. 2042.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING §77(5)—SALE BY SUPERINTENDENT OF BANKS—DEED—IMPLIED COVENANT.

The superintendent of banks in making sale of lands of a bank in his charge having, under Banking Act (St. 1909, p. 115) § 136, only such power as was given the order of court, which was to execute a deed conveying "all the right, title and interest" of the bank in the property, the covenant ordinarily implied from the word "grant" in the deed must be deemed limited by the subject-matter of the conveyance, and so not one against the incumbrance of the taxes for the year, which were at the time a lien on the property; but the deed is to be construed as a conveyance of such interest as the bank had, subject to defects in title, liens, or incumbrances of whatever nature.

2. BANKS AND BANKING §77(5)—SALE BY SUPERINTENDENT—"JUDICIAL SALE."

Sale by the superintendent of banks, under Banking Act, § 136, of property of a bank, is a judicial sale, so that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies, it being on order of the court on his petition, and the provision thereof that he execute a deed to the party who had made the only offer being a sufficient confirmation of the sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by the National Bank of Bakersfield against W. R. Williams, Superintendent of Banks of the State of California. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. L. Clafin, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., of San Francisco, and A. A. De Ligne, of Sacramento, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of defendant upon the court sustaining a general demurrer to the former's amended complaint, without leave to amend.

Briefly stated, the facts so far as pertinent are as follows: At the times in question the business and assets of the Kern Valley Bank, a corporation organized for the purpose of conducting a banking business, were in charge of defendant as superintendent of banks, and in process of liquidation.

In accordance with section 136 of the banking act of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 115), which provides that "the superintendent of banks shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and upon the order of the superior court may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all real and personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct," defendant filed a petition in the superior court praying for an order of court empowering and directing him to sell certain real estate therein described to plaintiff for the sum of $31,000. After due notice, the petition was heard, at which time the court called for other bids, and, none being received, the court "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said W. R. Williams, superintendent of banks of the state of California, and trustee of the Kern Valley Bank, a corporation in liquidation, be and he is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to accept the offer of said the National Bank of Bakersfield to sell the property hereinafter described for the sum of $31,000, and he is hereby authorized, empowered and directed to execute unto said the National Bank of Bakersfield a deed conveying to said the National Bank of Bakersfield all the right, title, and interest in said Kern Valley Bank, a corporation in liquidation, to all that certain real property commonly known as the banking premises of said Kern Valley Bank [followed by description of property], upon the payment to said W. R. Williams for and in behalf of said Kern Valley Bank, a corporation in liquidation, the sum of $31,000." Pursuant to this order directing him so to do, defendant sold and conveyed to the plaintiff all the right, title, and interest of the Kern Valley Bank to said real estate, which property at the time was subject to state, county, and municipal taxes (not then due) for the then current year, the lien for which had attached in March preceding. No reference to taxes was made in the deed or in the order pursuant to which it was made, and, defendant refusing to pay them, plaintiff, in order to protect the property from sale on account of delinquency, paid the same and brought this action to recover upon implied covenants contained in the deed.

[1] It is conceded the superintendent of banks, in the absence of such order, had no power to make the sale and conveyance. Hence, since he was acting as an instrument of the court, the duty of which was to direct the sale upon such terms as it might specify, the power of such agent must be measured by the terms of the order under which he acted. Looking to the order, it appears that he was directed to accept the offer of plaintiff and authorized "to execute unto said the National Bank of Bakersfield a deed conveying * * * all the right, title, and interest in said Kern Valley Bank * * * to all that certain real property," etc. The deed followed the language of the order; the words of transfer used, however, being "grant, bargain, and sell all the right, title, and interest" of the Kern Valley Bank. While the use of the word "grant" in a conveyance implies a covenant against incumbrances made or suffered by the grantor (section 1113, Civ. Code), and while taxes for the fiscal year, which were at the date of the grant a lien upon the property, are embraced therein (McCrake v. Heaton, 131 Cal. 109, 63 Pac. 179, 82 Am. St. Rep. 335), nevertheless the covenant implied from the use of the term "grant" must be deemed limited by the subject-matter of the conveyance. The order of court, which is the measure of defendant's power, directed a conveyance only of such right, title, and interest as the grantor had in the property, and the deed transferring such interest must be construed as a conveyance of such interest subject to defects in title, liens, or incumbrances of whatsoever nature. Sweet v. Brown, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 175, 45 Am. Dec. 243.

"Where a deed purports to convey only the right, title, and interest of the grantor, the scope of the covenant of warranty may be limited by the subject-matter of the conveyance." 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 931.

[2] Moreover, we are of the opinion that the transaction possesses every element of a judicial sale, to which, if true, the doctrine of caveat emptor applies. Webster v. Hawthorn, 8 Cal. 21, 68 Am. Dec. 287; Freeman on Executions, vol. 3, § 335; 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 1010.

Appellant claims that, conceding the sale and conveyance were required to be made upon an order of the superior court, no provision is made in the law for an order confirming the same, and hence it is lacking in one of the essential elements of a judicial sale. In our opinion, there is no merit in this contention. It is conceded that the sale could not have been made in the absence of an order of court. As appears from the record, respondent presented a petition showing that he had received an offer for the property; whereupon notice was given of the hearing of the petition, and at the hearing thereof the court itself called for bids thereon, and, none being received, directed that the sale be made to plaintiff, and directed defendant, upon the payment of the purchase price, to execute a deed conveying the grantor's right, title, and interest therein to plaintiff. The order itself constituted a confirmation of the sale thus directed to be made, and there remained nothing to confirm. In Freeman on Void Judicial Sales, § 1, it is said:

"The true test is that it [the sale] must be one which is, in contemplation of law, made by the court, and there may be circumstances when such is the case, though there is no pre-existing order directing or authorizing the sale, as where the property is in the hands of a receiver appointed by the court and given power by law to make sales thereof, or of an executor upon whom a power of sale is conferred by the will, if the sale must be reported to, and confirmed by the court."

A "judicial sale" is defined in the American & English Encyclopedia of Law, vol. 17, p. 953, as follows:

"A judicial sale is a sale made under the process of a court having competent authority to order it, by an officer duly appointed and commissioned to sell, which sale, as a general rule, becomes absolute only upon confirmation by the court."

Here the sale was made by the court through an officer by law designated in such cases to make the conveyance of the property when so ordered by the court and upon the terms specified therein. It was made under a procedure authorized by law, and in substance is the same as that adopted in effecting sales of property by receivers of national banks as provided by section 5234, Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 9821) which transactions are held to constitute judicial sales. Thus in Schaberg's Estate v. McDonald, 60 Neb. 493, 83 N. W. 737, it is said:

"A sale made by a receiver of a national bank under an order of a court of competent jurisdiction is a judicial sale."

And in Re Third National Bank (D. C.) 4 Fed. 775, it is said:

"A sale by a receiver of the property of a national bank, under an order of court, in accordance with the provisions of section 5234 of the Revised Statutes, constitutes a judicial sale."

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Charles J. Pease against J. F. Fitzgerald and others. From an adverse judgment, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brittan & Raish and W. E. Davies, all of Marysville, for appellant. Robert R. Moody and Edwin L. Forster, both of San Francisco, for respondent Pease. Franklin T. Poore, of San Francisco, for respondent Withoft.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the sum of $1,000 and interest alleged to be due upon the promissory note of the defendant J. F. Fitzgerald, and from an order denying said defendant's motion for a new trial.

The facts out of which the action arose were these: On the 8th day of February, 1912, the defendant J. F. Fitzgerald executed and delivered to the California Mail Order House, a corporation, a promissory note for the sum of $1,000 as the purchase price of 1,000 shares of its capital stock, for which he subscribed on that day. The transaction was conducted on behalf of the corporation by one Hugh Wyncoop as its agent, who is alleged by the said defendant Fitzgerald to have made to him certain false and fraudulent representations as to the assets and solvency of the corporation. The said defendant, however, at the time of making his said subscription, signed a memorandum attached thereto to the effect that his subscription was based upon the printed literature and printed statements of the corporation, and that no representations made by its agents not in accordance therewith should be binding upon the corporation. On April 20, 1912, the California Mail Order House executed and delivered to the American National Bank of San Francisco its promissory note for the sum of $2,500, and at the same time assigned and delivered to the said bank as security for the same the promissory note of the defendant Fitzgerald. On April 30, 1912, the California Mail Order House paid to the bank $1,435.82 on account of its note, but no further sum, and on May 11, 1912, the bank indorsed and delivered to the plaintiff and respondent in this action the Fitzgerald note. On May 24, 1912, the California Mail Order House was adjudged a bankrupt, and one T. W. Withoft was appointed trustee. On October 30, 1912, the present suit was brought.

In his answer the defendant Fitzgerald set forth several defenses, chiefly relying, however, both in his pleading and at the trial, upon the defense that the note had been procured through the false and fraudulent representations made by said Wyncoop at the time of his stock subscription, upon the discovery of which he had taken steps to rescind the transaction. Upon the trial he was permitted to testify fully as to these matters. The court gave judgment in plaintiff's favor, and from such judgment, and the order denying a new trial, the defendant Fitzgerald prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first point urged by the appellant is that the assignment and transfer of his promissory note by its pledgee, American National Bank, to the plaintiff, was illegal and void, for the alleged reason that a pledgee of commercial paper has no right to sell the same, but must collect the amount due thereon at maturity, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the principal debt. Whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions from which the appellant draws for authority supporting his contention, the rule is well settled in this state that a pledgee of commercial paper may assign and deliver the same, and in the event of such transfer the assignee holds the same in the same capacity as the original pledgee, and may bring suit to collect the collateral note when due. Cushing v. Building Ass'n, 165 Cal. 731, 134 Pac. 324; Brittan v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 124 Cal. 282, 57 Pac. 84, 71 Am. St. Rep. 58; Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 180, 43 Pac. 595; Dewey v. Bowman, 8 Cal. 145.

The appellant in his closing brief herein practically admits that this is the settled rule in this state, but urges that in the event of such transfer the assignee takes the note subject to all of the defenses which the maker might have urged against the original payee. It is not necessary, however, to discuss or decide this point, for the record discloses that the appellant was permitted upon the trial of the cause to fully present his defenses to the note, and that the court found that neither of the two chief defenses to the payment of the obligation was sufficiently made out. We think the evidence sufficiently sustains the finding of the court in that regard.

[2] The defendant was not entitled to rely on the oral statements of the agent, Wyncoop, in the face of his own express written agreement that only the printed statements of the corporation were to be regarded in making subscriptions to its stock. The effort of the appellant to rescind his agreement after his discovery that Wyncoop's statements were false was clearly not sufficiently carried into effect to work a rescission of his agreement or furnish a defense to the payment of his note.

We discover no error in the record before us.

Judgment and order affirmed.

VRAGNIZAN v. SAVINGS UNION BANK & TRUST CO. (Civ. 1924.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 19, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 18, 1916.)

1. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL ⚡52 — CHARACTER OF ACTION—TORT AND CONTRACT.

Though, if an action arises out of tort alone, it abates with the death of the wrongdoer, yet, if virtually founded upon contract, though nominally in tort, it survives against the tortfeasor's legal representatives.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. §§ 248-254; Dec. Dig. ⚡52.]

2. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL ⚡55(3)—CHARACTER OF ACTION—TORT AND CONTRACT.

Where a wife sued for divorce, alleging good cause, and was therefore entitled under Civ. Code, § 146, subsec. 2, to one-half of the community property at least, but settled with the husband for less than that amount on his false and fraudulent representations that he had a lesser amount of property than he did have, her action for the fraud did not abate on his death, but she could recover from the executor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. §§ 257, 258, 274-276; Dec. Dig. ⚡55(3).]

3. DIVORCE ⚡171—JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—RES JUDICATA—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

In such case, the division of property in the divorce case having been reached by stipulation, the decree of divorce was not res judicata of the wife's rights in the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 554-558; Dec. Dig. ⚡171.]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚡443(3)—ACTIONS—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

An allegation in an action against an executor that letters testamentary were duly issued to the executor, who then duly qualified and acted as such, is not objectionable as a mere conclusion of law, in the absence of special demurrer, especially where admitted in the answer, thus rendering allegation of more specific facts unnecessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1800, 1842-1845; Dec. Dig. ⚡443(3).]

5. FRAUD ⚡9—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—NECESSITY OF COMMUNICATION.

Where, in an action for divorce, a husband took false oath that he had only a certain amount of property, and further urged his wife through his son to make a settlement, the representations as to the amount of property, though not actually made and addressed to the wife, were yet sufficient basis for an action for deceit.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Marcel E. Cerf, Judge.

Suit by Augusta Vragnizan against the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, as executor of one Vragnizan, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro and Felix T. Smith, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action based on a claim presented against the estate of the decedent for approximately $6,000, of which sum the plaintiff alleges she was defrauded in a settlement of property rights had between herself and the decedent during the pendency of a suit for divorce in which they were the parties. Plaintiff obtained judgment, and the defendant appeals.

After the plaintiff and the decedent had been married and living together as husband and wife for a period of about 30 years the decedent on September 11, 1908, culminated a long course of cruel treatment of the plaintiff by threatening to kill her and by driving her and their children from home. The next day, in anticipation of a divorce proceeding being brought against him by his wife, he withdrew from two savings banks, where he had on deposit community funds to the amount of $10,100, the sum of $6,000, and placed the same in a safe deposit box which he rented that day. A few days thereafter the plaintiff commenced an action against decedent for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. In a counter affidavit upon a motion for counsel fees, costs, and alimony, as well as in his verified answer to the plaintiff's complaint and by testimony in open court, the decedent represented that the only money he had was the $4,100 remaining on deposit in the said savings banks. He also represented in his affidavit, answer, and oral testimony that a partnership in which he had been theretofore interested had been dissolved, and that he was no longer interested in that business, whereas it was admitted at the trial of the present action that such representations were untrue, and that in fact his partnership in such business continued to the time of his death, and it was also stipulated by the parties to this action that during all the time between the commencement of said proceeding in divorce and his decease he was in receipt from the partnership of a net income of $40 per month. On the 12th day of April, 1909, the plaintiff, believing these representations of the decedent, entered into an agreement of settlement of their property rights with him, under the terms of which they divided equally all the money which he had on deposit at the time in the savings banks above mentioned, viz. $4,100. At about three months after the making of this contract the decedent redeposited the $6,000 with an additional $900 in the banks from which the $6,000 had been withdrawn. The decedent by the terms of his will left $5 to each of his two children. He was of a secretive nature, and consequently the plaintiff knew little concerning his business affairs. Plaintiff herself is unable to read or write the English language, and for years has suffered from an incurable deafness. In her complaint, among other things, she alleges that she was induced to enter into the agreement of settlement by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the decedent; that she did not learn the falsity of his representations until shortly after his death; that if she had known the facts with reference to the property owned by the decedent at the time of the agreement she would not have accepted the property delivered to her in settlement of her property rights. In her prayer she asks judgment for one-half of the value of the property concealed from her by decedent.

[1] In support of the appeal the defendant claims that this is an action based on fraud and deceit, and that therefore it abated with the death of the decedent. It is sometimes said that at common law all causes of action ex contractu survive, whereas all those based on tort die with the person. But neither of these statements is strictly accurate. As to the former, for example, a breach of promise of marriage is an action arising ex contractu; yet it does not survive. Nor do all actions in tort die with the person. The true test is not so much the form of the action as the nature of the cause of action. When the action arises out of a tort, unconnected with contract, and which affects the person only, and not the estate—such as assault and battery, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, personal injuries—the action is purely personal, and abates with the death of the wrongdoer. But when the action is virtually founded upon contract, though nominally in tort, it survives against the tort-feasor's legal representatives. 1 Cyc. 60; 1 C. J. 340, 362; 1 R. C. L. 22; Lee v. Hill, 87 Va. 497, 12 S. E. 1052, 24 Am. St. Rep. 666; Payne's Appeal, etc., 65 Conn. 397, 32 Atl. 948, 33 L. R. A. 418,

48 Am. St. Rep. 215. And in the case of a tort resulting in the wrongful acquisition of personal property, the law imposing on the wrongdoer the duty of returning that property to the owner, the obligation at common law might be treated as quasi contractual, and the neglect to perform it a breach of such contract, in which case the damage resulting from the tort is substantially the value of the property, and the damage resulting from the breach of contract is measured substantially in the same way. Similarly, in determining the question of survival at common law the substantial cause of action might properly be treated as founded in contract. 1 R. C. L. 24.

[2] In the present case, it appearing from the allegations of the complaint that the plaintiff was entitled to a divorce from the decedent on the ground of extreme cruelty, she was entitled at the very least to one-half the community property (Civil Code, § 146; Gorman v. Gorman, 134 Cal. 378, 66 Pac. 313); and she settled with her husband apparently on the theory that she was receiving one-half of the community personal property, and that the agreement of settlement recognized this right. Later, and after his death, on discovering that she had been deceived as to the amount of money decedent had on hand at the time of the settlement, she promptly commenced this action to recover one-half of the property which decedent had thus concealed from her. Such an action is not purely a personal action for tort. It may be treated under the authorities as founded upon contract; and certainly it is in the nature of an action for the recovery of an interest in property. If one believes a false statement of another, and such false statement is the direct means of obtaining the property of such person, there is a legal injury to the rights of property, and the owner has an action for the property or its value based on the fraud, and also in some jurisdictions on the implied contract to return the property or the proceeds thereof, which legally or equitably belong to the original owner. In the case at bar the plaintiff at the time of settlement was entitled to at least one-half of the community property, and if the divorce proceeding had included an adjudication of property rights the court could not have awarded her less (Gorman v. Gorman, supra), but, believing a false statement of the decedent as to how much community property there was, and receiving by agreement with her husband one-half thereof, she took less than she would have been entitled to receive under an adjudication by the court. Accordingly it would appear that she has been injured in a right of property, and has an action to recover the amount of which she was defrauded.

In Henderson v. Henshall, 54 Fed. 320, 4 C. C. A. 357, the facts constituted an action for damages for false representations concerning real property, and to the contention that the cause of action did not survive the death of the plaintiff the court said:

"There may be some question as to the survival of a thing in action arising out of a personal injury, but the thing in action in this case arises out of the violation of a right of property, which, by the express language of section 954 of the Civil Code [of California], passes to the personal representatives of the deceased," for that section provides that "a thing in action, arising out of a violation of a right of property, or out of an obligation," and "may be transferred by the owner." Upon his death it "passes to his personal representatives."

And it necessarily follows that, if the thing in action would pass to the legal representatives of plaintiff on her death, it would survive the death of the defendant. The court further said:

"The wrong which is the subject of the action was not merely a personal injury inflicted upon the decedent, and the damages claimed the measure of her bodily or mental suffering, but the wrong was to the estate of the original plaintiff, whereby it became diminished in value."

Here the court quotes from Pomeroy's Remedies and Remedial Rights, § 147, as follows:

"It is now the general American doctrine that all causes of action arising from torts to property, real or personal—injuries to the estate by which its value is diminished—do survive and go to the administrator or executor as assets in his hands."

In the case of Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 108 Cal. 478, 41 Pac. 328, the defendants were charged with a conspiracy to defraud a mining company in which the plaintiff was a stockholder, and one of the defendants died after judgment against him, but before the entry thereof; and on the subject of the abatement of the action with the death of that defendant the court said:

"The right of the plaintiff to 'maintain' the action against the executors of Hobart is fully recognized by section 1584 of the Code of Civil Procedure. See, also, Coleman v. Woodworth, 28 Cal. 567. It falls within the rule given by Lord Mansfield in Hambly v. Troutt, Cowp. 371: 'Where the property is acquired which benefits the testator, there an action for the value of the property shall survive against the executor.'"

See, also, Shiels v. Nathan, 12 Cal. App. 604, 108 Pac. 34, which is a case very similar in its facts to this case, except that there the contract of settlement itself expressly provided that the plaintiff should receive one-half of the community property, which provision of the contract having been broken, it was held that an action for damages for the breach would lie.

[3] Passing to the next question, it must be held, we think, that the decree in the suit for divorce of Vragnizan v. Vragnizan is not a bar to this action. The pleadings in that case placed in issue the question of the property rights of the parties, but thereafter the plaintiff and defendant, as the Code permitted them, withdrew that question from the consideration of the court, and prior to the entry of the decree made the agreement upon which this action is founded. The plaintiff therefore is not estopped by the decree in the divorce proceeding from maintaining this action. That decree is final, it is true, as to every point which either expressly or by implication was in issue and the decision of which is essential to support the judgment; but the decree in this instance dealt only with the status of the parties; and certainly no decision with respect to their property rights was essential to sustain such a decree. 1 Freeman on Judgments, 465, 468; Senter v. Senter, 70 Cal. 619, 625, 11 Pac. 782; Coats v. Coats, 160 Cal. 671, 679, 118 Pac. 441, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844; Tabler v. Peverill, 4 Cal. App. 671, 679, 88 Pac. 994; In re Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 397, 44 Pac. 734.

[4] Defendant complains that the allegation in the complaint that on the 5th day of June, 1913, letters testamentary were duly and regularly issued to the defendant executor, who has ever since and now is the duly qualified and acting executor of the will in the estate of said Vragnizan, deceased, is a mere conclusion of law, and that the complaint therefore must be held insufficient. We think this allegation of the official capacity of the defendant sufficient in the absence of a special demurrer. Moreover, the allegation is admitted in the answer, which is in effect a stipulation of the fact; and this rendered the allegation of more specific facts unnecessary. Collins v. O'Laverty, 136 Cal. 31, 68 Pac. 327. See, also, S. F., etc., Land Co. v. Hartung, 138 Cal. 223, 71 Pac. 337.

[5] Defendant also contends that the complaint fails to show that the representations upon which the plaintiff relies were addressed to her, and therefore it is argued that they cannot be the basis of an action for deceit. In the main the complaint depends upon statements made by the decedent, as before stated, in his oral testimony and in his affidavit and verified answer, and therefore were not made directly to her; but it is reasonable to assume that they were made with the intention of deceiving her, and she, believing these representations, was induced thereby to make a settlement with the decedent for less than she otherwise would have accepted, and certainly for less than she was entitled to; the property being community property, and the decedent having treated her with extreme cruelty. Under these circumstances how can it be successfully asserted that the representations upon which she acted were not addressed to her? However this may be, it is alleged in the complaint in so many words:

"That said decedent repeatedly communicated with plaintiff through their son, and urged her to make a settlement of their property rights, and stated that he had no other money save and except the sum of $4,100 in the two savings banks, and that, if plaintiff would agree to make a settlement of their property rights, he would give her one-half of said money," etc.

It is further argued that, so far as the plaintiff depends upon affidavits and statements made by the decedent in court, they are privileged, and cannot be made the foundation of an action of deceit, and that it is not alleged in the complaint that decedent, by his representations in the former action, intended to induce any action on the part of the plaintiff. It is further contended that nowhere is it alleged in the complaint that the testator had any reason to believe that the representations made by him were false. We think these and other points made by the defendant cannot be seriously urged, and it is not necessary to specifically discuss them.

For the reasons heretofore stated, the judgment is affirmed.

et al. (S. F. 7859.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 8, 1916.)

1. RAILROADS ⇐9(1)—RAILROAD COMMISSION—JUDICIAL REVIEW.

Under Const. art. 12, §§ 22, 23, creating the Railroad Commission and declaring the authority of the Legislature to confer powers germane to the subject of the regulation and control of public utilities upon the Railroad Commission to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of the Constitution, Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, p. 161) § 67, providing that no court of this state, except the Supreme Court, to the extent herein specified, shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any order or decision of the commission or to suspend or delay the execution or operation thereof, or to enjoin, restrain, or interfere with the commission in the performance of its official duties, provided that the writ of mandamus shall lie from the Supreme Court to the commission in all proper cases, cannot be questioned by reason of any other provision of the state Constitution.

2. RAILROADS ⇐9(2)—CONTROL AND REGULATION—SUPERVISION BY PUBLIC OFFICER—STATUTE—"OFFICIAL DUTIES."

In Public Utilities Act, § 67, in the use of the words "official duties," meaning any duty defined by the act, is a valid and effective limitation of the power of the state courts to the actions specifically authorized by the act, so that the superior court has no power to enjoin the Railroad Commission or render any judgment that would interfere with it in the performance of its official duties, and hence has no right on the suit of a stockholder to enjoin a railway company and its directors from complying with the provisions of section 11 of the act, providing for free passes on railroads for the commission and its officers and employes.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by J. E. Sexton against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. From judgment for defendant sustaining demurrers to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McNair & Stoker, of San Francisco, for appellant. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, for respondent Railroad Commission of California. E. W. Camp and U. T. Clotfelter, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Demurrers to plaintiff's complaint were sustained in the superior court and judgment was thereupon given in favor of defendants. This is an appeal by plaintiff from such judgment.

The action was by plaintiff as a stockholder of the defendant railway company against such railway company and its directors and the members of the Railroad Commission of the state to obtain a decree restraining the railway company and its directors from issuing or honoring free transportation over its lines in the state to the Railroad Commission, its officers and employes, and restraining the Railroad Commission from instituting or prosecuting any action, civil or criminal, as against said railway company or any of its officers, agents, or employes for failure to comply with the provisions of the Public Utilities Act relative to such transportation. The Public Utilities Act provides in section 11 as follows:

"The commissioners and the officers and employes of the commission, shall, when in the performance of their official duties, have the right to pass, free of charge, on all railroads, cars, vessels and other vehicles of every common carrier * * * subject in whole or in part to control or regulation by the commission, between points within this state, and such persons shall not be denied the right to travel upon any railroad, car, vessel or other vehicle of such common carrier, whether such railroad, car, vessel or other vehicle be used for the transportation of passengers or freight, and regardless of its class." Stats. 1915, p. 121.

It further provides in subdivision 3 of section 17 that:

"The members of the Railroad Commission, their officers and employes, shall be entitled, when in the performance of their official duties, to free transportation over the lines of all common carriers within this state." Stats. 1915, p. 126.

It is in pursuance of these provisions that the directors of the railway company have authorized and caused the issuance of free transportation to the members, officers, and employes of the Railroad Commission, and caused the same to be honored, and will continue to do so unless restrained. Under other provisions of the Public Utilities Act, any railway company failing to comply with any provision of the act, including these provisions, and its officers, are subject to severe penalties, each day's continuance of such a failure being declared a separate and distinct offense, and it is substantially alleged that the penalties are so drastic that neither the company nor its directors can reasonably afford to refuse to comply with the provisions for the purpose of testing the validity of the same. It is further alleged in the complaint that in the event of any such failure the Railroad Commission will institute proceedings against the company and its officers to enforce the civil and criminal penalties prescribed by the act.

It is claimed that these provisions of the act are unconstitutional, null, and void, in that their enforcement deprives the railway company of its property without due process of law, and denies to said company the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and of section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state. It is also claimed that they violate section 19 of article 12 of the state Constitution. The question whether a state may lawfully, in view of the provision of the federal Constitution referred to, require free transportation at the hands of a railway company for the Railroad Commission and the officers and employes of such commission, when in the performance of any of their official duties, especially when, as here, those duties include not only the supervision of railroads, but also of gas companies, electric light companies, pipe line companies, telephone, telegraph, and water companies, etc., is not discussed in the briefs, and is, as we look at the matter, one that we cannot properly decide on this appeal.

Section 67 of the Public Utilities Act provides, among other things, as follows:

"No court of this state (except the Supreme Court to the extent herein specified) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order or decision of the commission or to suspend or delay the execution or operation thereof, or to enjoin, restrain or interfere with the commission in the performance of its official duties: Provided, that the writ of mandamus shall lie from the Supreme Court to the commission in all proper cases." (The italics are ours.)

In Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman et al., 166 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822, it was held by all the six justices participating: First, that by virtue of certain provisions of sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of our Constitution substantially declaring the authority of the Legislature to confer any powers germane to the subject of the regulation and control of public utilities upon the Railroad Commission to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of the Constitution, the validity of any such grant of power by the Legislature cannot be questioned by reason of any other provision of the state Constitution; and, second, that the provision of section 67 hereinbefore quoted is therefore a valid and effective limitation on the courts of the state, the theory, as substantially stated in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Sloss, being that to limit the power of review by the courts of orders of the Railroad Commission or to limit the power of courts to restrain or interfere with the commission in the performance of its official duties was quoad hoc to confer upon the Railroad Commission a greater or more absolute power. While that case involved questions as to the review of an order of the Railroad Commission, the reasoning is equally applicable to that portion of the provision of section 67 relative to the matter of enjoining, restraining, or interfering with the commission in the performance of its official duties. It is unnecessary here to restate or attempt to add to the learned and exhaustive discussion of the question contained in the opinion of Mr. Justice Henshaw and the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Sloss. Briefly stated, the conclusion of Mr. Justice Henshaw, concurred in by Justices Lorigan and Melvin, was substantially that such deprivation of jurisdiction of the courts of the state as is made by section 67 of the Public Utilities Act may not be questioned; and the conclusion of Mr. Justice Sloss, concurred in by Mr. Justice Shaw and the writer of this opinion, was that there could be no objection under the Constitution of the state to said section 67, and that, by reason of said section, no court of the state other than the Supreme Court has any power to review the orders of the commission, or to control its official action.

It is urged that said section 67 has only to do with the matter of review and enforcement of orders and decisions of the commission, and is not concerned with the matter of the enforcement of the provisions of the Public Utilities Act by the commission. It is further urged that there can be no official duty within the meaning of that term as used in the section to enforce a provision of the act that is in violation of a constitutional provision, as is claimed to be the situation with relation to the provisions of the act regarding free transportation, and that it was not the design of the section to interfere in any way with the jurisdiction of the superior court to inquire as to the validity of any provision of the act and to prevent by injunction the attempted enforcement by the commission of the provision if it found it to be invalid. The first of these claims is not very earnestly pressed, and, of course, could not be in view of the language of the section. The matter of orders and decisions of the commission is dealt with in the first portion of the provision; while the latter portion, in language that cannot be read otherwise, prevents any such interference as is therein declared with any official duty of the commission. We are satisfied that the second claim is equally untenable. The plain design of the provision was to prevent any interference with the commission by the courts, except as prescribed in the act itself, in the performance of any duty defined by the act. The term "official duties," as used therein, cannot reasonably be given any other meaning, especially when considered in connection with the first portion of the provision, as it must be. Concededly no review of any order or decision of the commission on the alleged ground that it is violative of any constitutional provision or on any ground is permitted to any court, except as provided in the act itself. The clear intent of the provision as a whole is to place the commission, in so far as the state courts are concerned, in a position where it may not be hampered in the performance of any official act by any court, except to the extent and in the manner specified in the act itself. To the extent deemed necessary to accomplish this the jurisdiction of state courts is limited by the provision; that of the superior court apparently being entirely taken away except as to certain actions specially authorized by the act itself to be brought therein at the instance of the commission to enforce penalties or to compel compliance with the provisions of the act. That such special provision is made for certain proceedings in the superior court, and that therein questions as to the validity of certain provisions of the act may be presented and determined, in no wise indicates that the construction we give the provision before us is not correct. This particular jurisdiction is simply left in the superior court by the act itself. The question presented is simply one of construction, and we entertain no doubt as to the plain meaning of the provision.

[1, 2] It seems clear, in view of what has been said, that the superior court has no power to enjoin the commissioners, or to render any judgment herein that would "interfere" with them in the performance of the official duties purported to be cast upon them by the Public Utilities Act, the validity of any provision of which so far as germane to the subject of the regulation and control of public utilities cannot be questioned, as we have seen, by reason of any provision of the state Constitution other than those relative specially to the Railroad Commission. They are authorized to proceed in accord with the provisions of the act unhampered in any way by any injunction of the superior court. It would appear to follow that the superior court has no right on the suit of a stockholder to enjoin the railway company and its directors from complying with the provisions of the act. The learned trial judge said as to this:

"I do not think that it could be claimed under the statute and the telephone case that this court would have any power to enjoin the commissioners, but the same object is accomplished by enjoining the directors of the railway company from issuing the free passes. The language of section 67 is broad enough to cover a proceeding of this sort. The judgment asked for here would necessarily be an interference with the commission in the performance of its official duties, if not in effect an injunction and restraint forbidden by the statute."

We see no necessity for saying anything further on this point.

The judgment is affirmed.

LARRABEE v. WESTERN PACIFIC RY. CO.
(No. 2287.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1916.)

1. NEGLIGENCE $\S$ 136(26) — ACTIONS — QUESTION OF LAW OR FACT — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 4, declaring a disputable presumption that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns, the question of contributory negligence becomes a question of law only when the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of plaintiff contributing to his own injury.

2. RAILROADS $\S$ 327(2) — OPERATION — ACCIDENTS AT CROSSING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where the driver of a team and wagon was within sight of an approaching train 1,500 feet before reaching a crossing and did not stop, look, or listen, he was guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery for his death in collision with the train at the crossing.

3. RAILROADS $\S$ 330(4) — OPERATION — ACCIDENTS AT CROSSING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The conduct of the driver of a wagon approaching a railroad crossing, otherwise negligent, is not relieved from fault by virtue of his right to presume that the railroad would not run its train at an excessive speed in approaching the crossing.

4. RAILROADS $\S$ 327(6) — OPERATION — ACCIDENTS AT CROSSING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

That a train by which the driver of a wagon was struck at a crossing was a special train did not relieve the driver of the imputation of contributory negligence.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Ellen Larrabee, administratrix of the estate of E. F. Larrabee, against the Western Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Warren Olney, Jr., of San Francisco, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and A. R. Baldwin and John S. Partridge, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Edward B. Stanwood and E. Ray Manwell, both of Marysville, and Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to recover damages from defendant for causing the death of plaintiff's intestate. Trial was had before a jury which gave its verdict for plaintiff, and from the judgment which followed and from the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it prosecutes this appeal.

The case is a railroad crossing case. The deceased, while traveling southward in a horse-drawn hay wagon along the county road, which road crosses the track of defendant's steam railway at an acute angle, was struck by defendant's train coming from the north and moving in the same direction as was deceased's wagon. Mr. Larrabee, the deceased, was a farmer, whose home was about five miles south of Marysville. The county road upon which he was traveling was the only road leading from Marysville to his home. Larrabee had traveled the road many times, was perfectly familiar with it and with the railroad crossing. Upon the morning of the accident he had gone from his home to Marysville with a load of hay. He was returning from Marysville in his empty hay wagon. The railroad tracks were built on an embankment about seven feet above the normal grade of the county road, which ran, facing southerly, along the left-hand side of the railroad tracks. The county road approach to the railroad crossing was by an easy grade. Weeds were growing along the top of the railroad embankment. The time was midday. An officers' train of defendant, a "special," was traveling from Marysville southward at a speed of from 55 to 60 miles an hour. The deceased and his wagon were seen by the engineer of this train some 2,000 feet northerly of the crossing. It was observed that the deceased was traveling toward the crossing, but was in a place of perfect safety. The whistle of the engine was sounding continuously, and its noise was a loud screech. Such is not only the testimony of the engineer and his fireman, but of Miss Jaques, who, at a greater distance from the train than was the deceased, heard and testified to this continuous whistling. The horses of Larrabee were traveling at a walk. Larrabee was in a semirecumbent position, and when the engineer discovered that he paid no attention to the approaching train, he immediately applied his emergency brakes. It was impossible, however, to stop the train before it reached the crossing, and it passed the crossing at a speed of about 40 miles an hour, striking the horses and front end of the hay wagon, tossing them to the left or east of the track, and killing Larrabee. The driving wheels of the engine were flattened where they slid after the application of the emergency brakes, and the testimony is that everything possible was promptly done by the engineer to avoid the collision from the moment that he observed that Larrabee was passing with his team from a place of safety to one of danger. Larrabee drove upon the track without either stopping or looking or listening, or, if he did look and listen, and under these circumstances heard the whistle and observed the approach of the train, as he must have done, for admittedly the train would have been visible to him while still in a place of safety at a distance of 1,500 feet from the crossing, the unescapable conclusion is that he drove upon the track in wanton recklessness.

We may pass over without consideration the first proposition argued by appellant, namely, that the evidence fails utterly to disclose that it was negligent, and consider the single question of the asserted contributory negligence of the deceased. Contributory negligence, of course, presupposes a primary negligence upon the part of defendant, and, for the purposes of this consideration only, it will be assumed that defendant was so negligent.

[1, 2] What then is to be said of the conduct of the deceased? Respondent contends that the question whether that conduct did or did not constitute contributory negligence is peculiarly and exclusively a question of fact for the jury. And herein it is said, first, that the jury was at liberty to infer that the deceased exercised ordinary care and diligence. Code Civ. Proc. 1963, subd. 4; Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 153; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Landrigan, 191 U. S. 462, 24 Sup. Ct. 137, 48 L. Ed. 262. In the latter case the court had instructed the jury that "in the absence of all evidence tending to show whether the plaintiff's intestate stopped, looked, and listened before attempting to cross the south track, the presumption would be that he did." Respondent invokes this evidentiary presumption to rebut contributory negligence and to establish that the deceased did all things which should be done by a prudent man situated as he was. It is true that in by far the greater number of cases the question of contributory negligence is, as it has been frequently declared to be by this court, a question of fact for the determination of the jury, and it becomes a question of law only "when the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury." Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513. But, touching the presumption that the deceased exercised ordinary care, it is to be noted that that presumption is given weight only in the absence of evidence on the subject of the deceased's conduct. It has been declared to be "an artificial presumption of so weak a character that it is not to be allowed to have the effect of evidence before the jury where the uncontradicted evidence of the circumstances attending the accident overthrows it." Thompson, Negligence, § 401. In this case the positive and uncontradicted evidence discloses that the deceased did not exercise ordinary care; for, if he had done so, he could easily have escaped his fatal accident. The testimony of the continuous sounding of the whistle has been adverted to, as has also the fact that it was heard by a disinterested witness, Miss Jaques, at a much greater distance from the train than was the deceased. It is said that a wind was blowing from the southward which, taken with the noise of the rattling wagon, might have impaired the deceased's ability to hear the train. But to this the twofold answer is: First, that Miss Jaques, similarly situated so far as concerns the location of the wind, distinctly heard the whistle; and second, if the deceased's sense of hearing was thus interfered with, it became the more incumbent upon him to use his sense of vision. It is said that his vision was obstructed by weeds growing along the railroad embankment. It is in evidence, however, that the engineer of the train saw him at a distance of at least 1,500 feet, and, conversely, he could have seen the approaching train at that distance. Moreover, as he ascended the slight grade of the county road approaching the track, he was beyond peradventure of doubt above the obstruction of the weeds while still in a place of safety. He was familiar with the crossing and its environment, he knew of the weeds, and their presence, and if they did interfere with his sight, this, so far from justifying him for his failure to use other precautions imposed upon him the duty of doing so. For, as is said in Green v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 254, 64 Pac. 255, where it was shown that the traveler's view was interfered with by corn growing to an average height of 9 feet, and where the traveler was sitting upon the seat of his wagon which brought his eyes to a point less than 8 feet above the ground:

"His knowledge that the track was hidden by the corn was a reason for his taking more than ordinary precautions against meeting the train."

And in Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651, it is said:

"If the view of the track is obstructed, he should take greater pains to listen. If, taking these precautions, he would have seen or heard the approaching train, the very fact of injury will raise a presumption that he did not take the required precautions."

There is thus an abundance of direct evidence to show that the deceased did not observe the legal requirements of ordinary care—the requirements of stopping and looking and listening—before he essayed the fatal crossing. The evidence to this effect is direct, positive, and uncontradicted. The uncontested facts themselves speak convincingly to the same effect. The man was driving in a slow-moving wagon in broad daylight, was approaching a crossing with which he was perfectly familiar, and approaching it under circumstances where he could with perfect safety have stopped his progress and looked back to see whether or not a train was approaching him from behind, his view of that train was unobstructed for at least 1,500 feet. These very facts overcome the presumption of the exercise of due care, and, as said by this court in Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, "raise a presumption that he did not take the required precautions."

[3, 4] Nor is it true, as respondent argues, that the deceased's conduct, otherwise clearly negligent is relieved from this reproach by virtue of his right to presume that the defendant would not run its train at an excessive rate of speed in approaching this crossing. Nor does the added circumstance that this was a special train in the slightest change the deceased's legal responsibilities. Railroads are entitled to operate special trains and to operate them at high rates of speed. Their regular trains cannot be and no one expects them to be always on schedule. With all this the deceased was, of course, familiar. The statements in Strong v. Sacramento & Placerville R. R. Co., 61 Cal. 326, and in Whalen v. Arcata & Mad River R. Co., 92 Cal. 669, 88 Pac. 833, to the effect that the deceased had the right to rely upon the "performance by those on the locomotive of every act imposed by law upon them when approaching a crossing," cannot be considered to be the law of this state as affecting the rights and duties of one about to venture to make a railroad crossing. Such a one is not entitled to rely upon such a performance of duty so as to relieve him from the necessity of looking if he does not hear, and of stopping if he cannot see. Suffice it upon this to cite the later case of Koch v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 680, 84 Pac. 176, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 521, 113 Am. St. Rep. 332, 7 Ann. Cas. 795; Griffin v. San Pedro, L. A. & Salt Lake R. R. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842.

Upon this proposition the court directly instructed the jury that, if they found "that at and just prior to the accident defendant's train was running at an unusual rate of speed, this would not relieve the deceased from the duty resting upon him upon approaching said crossing to stop and look and listen for such approaching train, and if he failed so to do, and such failure contributed directly and proximately to the accident, then, regardless of said speed of said train, your verdict must be for the defendant." The conclusion is unescapable that the jury ignored this instruction in reaching its verdict and that its verdict is therefore against law. Declez v. Save, 71 Cal. 552, 12 Pac. 722; Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 518, 39 Pac. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87.

[5] In contemplation of the reversal which must be adjudged, some further matters command attention. The court refused to instruct the jury to the effect that:

"In the absence of any statute or ordinance regulating the speed of its trains, a rate of 60 miles per hour was not of itself negligence."

This instruction should have been given. There was no law nor ordinance controlling the rate of speed of this train. It was traveling in a rural district and crossing a country road. The rate of speed of a train, the place and circumstances under which it is traveling, may all be considered by the jurors where no law limits the speed, to aid them in determining whether or not at the place and at the time of the operation of the train its rate of speed was negligent. But with this they should have been told that the rate of speed alone—even an excessive rate of speed—was not negligence per se. Such is the precise declaration of this court in Bilton v. Southern Pacific Co., 148 Cal. 447, 83 Pac. 442, where it is said:

"It is true that, in the absence of any statute or ordinance on the subject, no rate of speed is negligence per se."

To the same effect is Green v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68.

[6] The court instructed the jury as follows:

"Whenever highways are laid out to cross railroads, canals, or ditches, on public lands, the owners or corporations using the same must, at their own expense, so prepare their roads, canals, or ditches that the public highway may cross the same without danger or delay."

This instruction, touching the facts in this case, was inappropriate and misleading. No question here is presented of a highway "on public lands laid out to cross a railroad." The section of the Political Code (section 2694) from which this instruction is taken, has no bearing upon the situation here presented.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE §304—ABANDONMENT—STATUTE.

Pen. Code, § 270a, providing that a husband having ability to provide for his wife's support, who willfully abandons and leaves her in a destitute condition, unless justified by her misconduct, is punishable by imprisonment, does not authorize punishment of a husband for neglect to provide for his wife, who has been living in another state, before he knows of her presence within this state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Milton A. Smith was convicted of crime, and his motion for new trial denied, and he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Homer E. Johnstone, of Bakersfield, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the defendant has been convicted of the offense described in section 270a of the Penal Code, in that on or about March 24, 1916, in the county of Kern, he did willfully, etc., neglect, refuse, and omit to provide his wife with necessary food, clothing, shelter, and medical attendance; he having the ability to so provide and not being justified in so refusing or failing to provide for her "by any misconduct on the part of the said wife." The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant and the prosecuting witness, Florence E. Smith, were married in the state of Washington in August, 1907, and lived together in that state until September, 1911, when the defendant moved to Portland, Or. Some time later he came to California and for a year or two prior to March 24, 1916, and on that date was living at Bakersfield in Kern county. There was some correspondence between the husband and wife while he was in Portland. Afterward it appears that for some time she did not know where he was living, but in the latter part of the year 1915 she learned that he was living in Bakersfield. She did not then communicate with the defendant, but after waiting some five or six months she came to California and arrived at Bakersfield on March 24, 1916. Without any delay she made the complaint upon which this prosecution is founded, and the defendant did not know of her presence in California until he was arrested on this charge. The only evidence that Mrs. Smith at any time prior to the commencement of this action was without means of support is found in her testimony wherein she states that during the time of their separation she never received any money from the defendant, and in her affirmative answer to a question inquiring whether during the time of their separation she had "at any time been in want."

[1, 2] The defendant is not prosecuted for having abandoned and left his wife in a destitute condition, for if such offense was committed by him at all it was not in the state of California. Also, it may well be doubted whether any refusal or neglect of the defendant to provide his wife with the necessities of life while she was absent from California can be construed into an offense committed at the place of the husband's residence and against the laws of California. If the defendant had received information of her presence in this state and then if, without legal justification, he had refused or neglected to provide his wife with food, clothing, etc., she having need of such support from him, such facts no doubt would constitute an offense against the provisions of the Penal Code. But it seems clear to us that the provisions of the Code under which the defendant is prosecuted in this action are not intended to authorize a punishment of the husband for neglecting to provide for his wife before he knows of her presence within the state. Neither do we think the judgment can be sustained without evidence that the wife was without other sufficient means of support at the time of the alleged offense. People v. Selby, 20 Cal. App. 796, 148 Pac. 807.

Having reached the conclusion above stated, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the numerous propositions urged in the brief of defendant's counsel wherein he claims errors in the rulings of the court and in the instructions given, and in the refusal to give instructions requested by the defendant.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Proc. § 690, subd. 4, the appellate court cannot review the evidence and make a finding different from that of the superior court on the issue of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by the Development Building Company, a corporation, against F. B. Woodruff. From an order vacating and setting aside a levy, under writ of attachment, on defendant's personalty, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

Williams, Goudge & Chandler, of Los Angeles, and F. Walton Brown, for appellant. F. B. Woodruff, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Under a writ of attachment duly issued in this action the sheriff levied upon certain personal property of the defendant. Thereafter, upon motion of the defendant, the court made an order vacating and setting aside the levy made against said property, from which order the plaintiff appeals.

The defendant is an attorney at law, and the motion was made upon the ground that the personal property seized was his professional and necessary law office furniture and as such exempt from execution or attachment, Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 4. In support of this motion respondent presented to the court an affidavit in which he stated that on the day of the levy, and for several years prior thereto, he was in the actual possession and enjoyment of said property and was using the same in the actual practice of his profession, the same being his necessary office furniture as described. A counter affidavit was filed wherein an agent of the plaintiff stated that on the date of the levy and for some time prior thereto the described property was used by persons other than the defendant and during that period of time was not being used by the defendant and was not necessary to him in his business as an attorney at law. Omitting further facts detailed in the affidavits, it is sufficient to observe that they present a conflict of evidence upon the issue as to whether or not the property in question was necessary office furniture then in use by the defendant in the practice of his profession. The superior court having determined that issue of fact in favor of respondent upon evidence definitely tending to support respondent's claim, we are not authorized to review the evidence and make a different finding. From the facts found the conclusion necessarily followed that the property was exempt from attachment.

The order is affirmed.

Ralph H. Walker, of Visalia, and Edwards & Smith, of Dinuba, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. [1, 2] The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder, and by the verdict of the jury his punishment was fixed at imprisonment for life. Judgment in accordance with that decision was regularly made. A motion for a new trial, being presented, was denied by the court, and an appeal was taken from the judgment and order. The transcript on appeal was filed on May 13, 1916. No brief was offered to be filed on the part of appellant until October 17th. At the last-mentioned date a brief was deposited in the office of the clerk of this court. At the time set for oral argument on the calling of the calendar on October 24, 1916, appellant's counsel did not appear, and the Attorney General moved for an affirmance under the provisions of section 1253 of the Penal Code. The motion was properly made under the sanction of the statute, and it would have been altogether appropriate that the judgment asked for be entered. However, as the charge is that of murder and the defendant was convicted of the first degree of that crime, we have felt it fitting that some examination be made of the record in order to determine as to whether the defendant was properly convicted. There was a former trial in this case, and, upon an appeal being taken, a new trial was ordered to be had because of certain errors committed by the trial court. It was from the judgment pronounced and order made after the second trial that this appeal was taken. We have carefully examined the record and are convinced that the evidence heard by the jury fully sustains the verdict, and that no material errors were committed by the trial judge which would entitle defendant to have the judgment set aside. The facts of the case, as disclosed by the evidence, were in brief as follows: Defendant in January, 1915, was one of a party of woodchoppers engaged on a ranch in the county of Tulare. On about the 9th day of January, their work at the ranch being finished, they prepared to go to Visalia. The deceased happened by their camp, riding in a country wagon and driving a mule. He stopped and talked with the men, all of whom were Mexicans, and offered them wine which he had in a jug, of which all partook. Deceased assisted them in repairing a wagon and then requested the defendant to accompany him while he went to secure more wine. The defendant at first demurred, but was finally persuaded to go, and the two men rode away together. They visited an Italian, who sold them more wine, and later left his place. Cook, the deceased, was not seen again alive, but on the following morning his dead body was found in a road. The post mortem examination disclosed that Cook had been struck on the back of the head, where the blow had cut the scalp and slightly fractured the skull; there were two bruises upon his face, a bruise upon a shoulder, and a bullet wound near one of his ears. The bullet which produced this wound was found lodged in the brain of the deceased near the side of the head opposite from the point of its entrance. The defendant was arrested in another county. After being brought back to Tulare he made a statement to the sheriff in which he admitted having killed Cook, but said that Cook had gotten out on the ground and, after abusing him (the defendant), had pulled him roughly out of the wagon and kicked him in the side; that he (the defendant) had thereupon shot Cook and had immediately gone away. This statement was shown to have been repeated in the presence of other persons, and it was shown to have been voluntarily made. Taking all of the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, including the condition of the body of the deceased and the statements made by the defendant, the jury was fully authorized to conclude that the use of the deadly weapon by defendant was unjustified and that his act in shooting Cook was malicious.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

That the one of two judges of a superior court to whom a motion to quash an execution is presented is not the judge who was presiding when the execution was ordered to be issued does not deprive him of jurisdiction to quash the writ.

Code Civ. Proc. § 182, providing that if an application for an order is refused or granted conditionally, no subsequent application for the same order shall be made except to a higher court, does not deprive the superior court of jurisdiction, after it has ordered the issuance of an execution, to order the quashing of the execution for failure to conform to the judgment.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 1149—CORRECTION OF JUDGMENT—VERDICT.

The Supreme Court is without jurisdiction to correct a judgment to make it conform to the verdict in respect to the amount recovered; appellant's remedy in such case, if any, being by proper application to the lower court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs and Clarence A. Raker, Judges.

Action by L. A. Harbaugh against the Lassen Irrigation Company, a corporation. From an order granting defendant's motion to recall and quash an execution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed, and rehearing denied.

See, also, 24 Cal. App. 773, 142 Pac. §47.

F. A. Kelley, of Susanville, for appellant. Pardee & Pardee, of Susanville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order granting defendant's motion to recall and quash an execution. The judgment in the cause was rendered October 16, 1907. An attempt was made to have this judgment reviewed by the appellate court, but the appeal was dismissed on August 12, 1914. On May 20, 1915, the superior court of Lassen county, Hon. J. O. Moncur, judge presiding, made an order, directing execution to issue on said judgment, and the clerk of said superior court issued an execution under the seal of said court on the 27th day of November following. A copy of this writ is set out in the transcript. It recites that "$586.95, with interest, is now (at the date of this writ) actually due on said judgment," and contains the usual direction to the sheriff to satisfy said judgment. Then follows in the transcript a copy of the "order granting motion to settle and quash execution." It recites:

"The defendant's motion, issued in the above-entitled court and cause, to recall and quash execution, coming on regularly to be heard on Monday, April 3, 1916, at 2 o'clock p. m., Pardee & Pardee for the motion, and no one appearing for plaintiff, the evidence on said motion being presented, * * * the said motion was then submitted, and, the same being by the court duly considered, it is ordered that the motion be, and the same is hereby, granted, and the said execution be, and the same is hereby, recalled and quashed. Clarence A. Raker,

"Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Modoc, Presiding in the Above-Entitled Court and Cause on the Hearing of Said Motion."

It is apparent that the transcript is quite incomplete, as it does not contain a copy of the notice of said motion or of the papers used on the hearing in the court below as required by section 951 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Nor is there any bill of exceptions or other document setting forth in any way the evidence upon which the court below acted. We may therefore accept as true the statement of other facts by respondent. Indeed, appellant does not question the accuracy of said statement. It seems that the only language in said judgment which purported to be an adjudication of the matters at issue was as follows:

"Wherefore, by virtue of the law, and by reason of the premises aforesaid, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the plaintiff do have and recover from defendant plaintiff's costs and disbursements incurred in this action, amounting to the sum of $86.95."

As we have seen, the execution, issued November 27, 1915, recites that the judgment was for the sum of $500 and costs, $86.95, or a total of $586.95. In the meantime, L. A. Harbaugh, the plaintiff, died on or about the 23d day of July, 1915, and at the time the order appealed from was made, no proceedings had been taken for administration of his estate. The grounds of the motion were fully stated in the notice, and included the following:

"That the writ contained an erroneous statement that the judgment in the case was for $500, together with $86.95 costs; whereas, the judgment was for $86.95 costs, only," and "that, owing to the death of the plaintiff prior to the date when the execution was issued, the attorney for plaintiff had no authority to cause an execution to be issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff."

We must presume that said motion was supported at the hearing by competent evidence, and we are not required to go further than to base the decision upon said first ground mentioned.

[1] It is undoubtedly the rule that an execution issued on a judgment which does not authorize it may be quashed on motion. 17 Cyc. 1154. The judgment being for $86.95, and the execution for $586.95, the latter, of course, was unauthorized.

[2] We can see no merit in the contention that the court was without jurisdiction for the reason that one judge was presiding when the writ was ordered to be issued, and a different judge when the writ was recalled. It was the same court and both judges had the same authority. It is not disputed that Judge Moncur could have quashed the writ. It must follow that Judge Raker had power to do the same, since his jurisdiction was co-extensive with that of the former. Indeed, in either case, the act was that of the court rather than of the judge.

[3] Section 182 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application to the condition herein revealed. That section provides:

"If an application for an order, made to a judge of a court in which an action or proceeding is pending, is refused in whole or in part, or is granted conditionally, no subsequent application for the same order shall be made to any court commissioner, or any other judge, except of a higher court."

The subsequent application here was manifestly not for the same order. The fact is that its purpose was to prevent a violation of the first order. This latter was in effect, of course, to have an execution issued in accordance with the judgment. This was not done, and it was for the correction of this error that the second application was made.

There is nothing in this proceeding, we may state, that would prevent the issuance and operation of a proper writ of execution in accordance with said judgment.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] In his petition for rehearing, appellant calls attention to a certified copy of the judgment entered in the superior court in the above-entitled cause. Said copy was filed herein after our former opinion was rendered and without any suggestion of diminution of the record. Under the recognized practice, we would be justified in disregarding said document. However, we have examined it and we find that the said judgment was radically defective, and through some one's carelessness it utterly failed to determine and decree the amount to which plaintiff was entitled under the verdict of the jury. It does, indeed, recite said verdict, but the judgment is as follows:

"Wherefore, by virtue of the law and by reason of the premises aforesaid, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff do have and recover from said defendant plaintiff's costs and disbursements incurred in this action, amounting to the sum of $86.95."

It may be that upon proper application the lower court may be warranted in correcting the mistake and making the said judgment conform to the verdict. But there seems no way open to us in this proceeding to accomplish the desired result, although, if legally possible, some remedy should be afforded.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE v. GORMAN. (Cr. 638.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 1, 1916.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §814(17)—APPLICABILITY OF INSTRUCTIONS.

Requested instructions on the law of circumstantial evidence, where the prosecution did not rely on circumstantial evidence alone or chiefly to obtain conviction, were properly refused, not being applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1883, 1979; Dec. Dig. §814(17).]

2. CRIMINAL LAW §814(2)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY.

In manslaughter trial, there being little or no evidence offered to support a suggested theory of the prosecuting officer in his opening statement as to conspiracy to commit robbery, and a police officer testifying that he saw accused strike the fatal blow, it was proper to refuse an instruction for accused upon conspiracy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1979, 1982-1984; Dec. Dig. §814(2).]

3. HOMICIDE §287—INSTRUCTION—ABSENCE OF MOTIVE.

It was proper to refuse instruction that, if the evidence failed to show any motive on the part of defendant consistent with reason and soundness of mind to commit the crime charged, this was a circumstance in favor of his innocence to be considered by the jury.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §941(1)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—CUMULATIVE.

Where affidavits offered by accused for new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence were merely cumulative and largely negative in their averments, the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Edward Gorman was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals from the judgment and order denying new trial. Affirmed.

J. K. Ross and John W. Elwell, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant of the crime of manslaughter, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The defendant was charged with murder in the killing of one Eugene Kelly in a brawl on Third street, in the city and county of San Francisco, during the early morning hours of September 8, 1915. It is the first contention of the appellant that the court erred in its refusal to give certain instructions requested by the defendant relating to the law of circumstantial evidence, and presented upon the theory that the case of the prosecution was based upon circumstantial evidence alone; but an inspection of the record discloses that the prosecution did not rely upon circumstantial evidence alone or chiefly to obtain the defendant's conviction, and, this being so, it is obvious that the instructions which the defendant requested, however correctly they may have stated the law of circumstantial evidence, had no application to the case, and were therefore properly refused by the trial court.

[2] The same reasoning applies to the instruction asked by the defendant upon the subject of conspiracy. The charge was murder; and while it is true that the prosecuting officer in his opening statement to the jury had something to say about a conspiracy of several of the participants in the embroglio to commit a robbery, there was little or no evidence offered to support this view of the case; while, on the other hand, there was the direct testimony of a police officer to the effect that he saw the defendant strike the fatal blow. Under these conditions the matter of a possible conspiracy between several of the participants in the brawl to rob some one involved in it was not a sufficient factor in the case to warrant the giving of an instruction upon that subject.

[3] The appellant's next contention is that the court erred in refusing to give the jury the following instruction at the defendant's request:

"If the evidence fails to show any motive on the part of the defendant consistent with reason and soundness of mind to commit the crime charged, this is a circumstance in favor of his innocence, and should be considered by the jury in connection with the other evidence in the case."

The appellant cites no direct authority supporting his contention that this instruction should have been given while, on the other hand, it has been expressly decided that it is not error in the trial court to refuse to give a requested instruction in substantially the form of that presented by the defendant herein. People v. Glaze, 139 Cal. 154, 72 Pac. 965.

The appellant further contends that the evidence is insufficient to warrant a conviction, and devotes considerable space in the brief of his counsel to certain alleged inconsistencies and uncertainties in the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution. We are satisfied, however, upon a careful reading of the record, that there was sufficient evidence presented which, if believed by the jury, would have warranted a verdict of manslaughter, and, this being, so, the judgment of conviction will not be disturbed.

[4] The next contention of the appellant is that the court erred in its refusal to grant him a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. The affidavits offered by the defendant at the hearing of his motion for a new trial were merely cumulative, and, besides, were largely negative in their averments; and, in our opinion, the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the defendant's motion upon that ground.

As to the final charge of the appellant, that the court and the prosecuting officer were guilty of certain acts of misconduct which materially and improperly prejudiced the defendant's case before the jury, we find this contention to be entirely without merit.

Judgment and order affirmed.

GOLDEN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.
(Civ. 1990.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, Oct. 28, 1916.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 1199—MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT AFTER AFFIRMANCE.

In action to have declared a lien upon stock pledged to defendant and enjoin an absolute sale thereof, the superior court, after affirmance by the District Court of Appeal of its final judgment declaring such lien and enjoining sale absolutely, had no jurisdiction to strike the injunctive part of the judgment entirely, such judgment not being conditioned on plaintiff's paying the pledge within a reasonable time, although the court might have modified the injunction to permit defendant to sell the stock as pledgee and in no other way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4674-4676; Dec. Dig. 1199.]

Application for writ of review by Albert E. Golden against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco. Order of Superior Court annulled, vacated, and set aside.

James H. Boyer, of San Francisco, for petitioner. T. C. West, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of review directed against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, for the purpose of having set aside and annulled a certain order of that court, by which a final judgment, after its affirmance by the District Court of Appeal, was modified in a material respect, by striking therefrom an order for an injunction, restraining the defendant in that action from making a sale of certain stock. The action had been brought for the purpose of having declared that the defendant held certain shares of stock as pledgee; the stock having been given as security for a loan of $1,125. The defendant appearing by answer, set up the claim that he was the owner of the stock absolutely. The court, however, decided against him on that issue, made its findings accordingly, and entered a judgment that the plaintiff should have the stock surrendered to him upon payment to the defendant of the sum of $1,125, the amount of the loan; and as a part of the judgment the court enjoined the defendant from making any sale of the stock to any person save the plaintiff. The judgment was appealed from, and was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, and a petition to the Supreme Court for a rehearing was denied. Subsequently, when the remittitur went down, the defendant went into the court below and moved that the judgment be modified by striking therefrom the order for injunction, which motion the court granted upon the theory that the judgment originally was a conditional one, that is to say, that the note representing the loan and the stock involved in the suit should be surrendered to the plaintiff and the note canceled upon condition that he pay the sum of $1,125, and that the plaintiff not having made said payment within a reasonable time the court was justified in striking out from the judgment that part of it relating to the injunction.

The court, we think, was in error in believing that it was a conditional judgment. As stated before, the action was simply one to have declared a lien upon the stock that had been pledged to the defendant, and to prevent the defendant in the meantime from making an absolute sale of it. That purpose was plainly indicated by the complaint, the answer, and the findings of the court. While the judgment is too broad in the sense that it prevents a sale of any kind, the very evident intent of the action was to prevent a sale by the defendant save and except as a pledgee, and the court below would have had a right to modify the phraseology of the injunctive part of the judgment to the extent of making it clear that the defendant might sell the stock as a pledgee and in no other way; but in striking out the injunctive part of the judgment entirely it made a material modification of the judgment itself, and thereby deprived the defendant in that action of a very substantial right which he had secured by the litigation. This the court had no jurisdiction to do, and for that reason we are of the opinion that the order complained of should be annulled, vacated, and set aside.

It is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Bruce Wing was convicted of burglary of the first degree, his motion for a new trial denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. B. Conlin, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of burglary of the first degree, and appeals from a judgment of imprisonment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence showed that during the month of October, 1915, the appellant visited the salesroom of an automobile dealer in the city of Los Angeles and remained about the place for an hour or so. He made inquiries regarding the purchase of a machine stating that a physician named McLaughlin desired to buy a car, and that if it was purchased that he (appellant) would be employed to drive it. He particularly looked over an "Enger" automobile which was standing on the floor, that machine being painted a cream color. He inquired as to whether it was in running order and ready to be used, and something about the method of operating it. He left the place late in the afternoon, and the salesroom was closed up that evening as usual; that being Saturday of the week. On the following day one of the salesmen returned to the place and found that the cream colored machine at which appellant had been looking was gone. A tire had also been taken from another machine standing in the place. About six months later officers who had been working on the case found an automobile in a closed garage in the lower part of the city which answered the description on the "Enger" automobile. The machine, however, had been painted black, and even the hub caps, which had borne the name "Enger" cut in the metal, had been covered with some substance so as to obliterate the lettering, and the caps, which had been nickel, were also painted black like the rest of the machine. The number had been removed from the automobile, and generally it had been disguised as much as could be. The under part of the hood, however, which was not exposed to view, still remained a cream color. The officers watched this garage for a day or so before any one came to take out the machine. Appellant then appeared and, opening the garage, busied himself about the machine. The officers appearing casually to pass by, stopped, and inquired of appellant what kind of a machine it was, and he replied that it was a "Pilot." They then asked him to whom it belonged, and he said that it belonged to a Dr. McLaughlin who lived at a certain number on Ditman street. The officers thereupon disclosed their official identity and requested appellant to take them to the doctor's residence. Appellant replied that he had an engagement with the doctor to meet him there at that time. After waiting a half hour or more, the officers got into the machine with appellant and he drove them to Ditman street. They searched carefully on both sides of the street in the block containing the number which appellant had given them, but failed to find that any such person as McLaughlin lived in that neighborhood. Thereupon, after having the automobile identified by the owners, they conducted appellant to the jail, where he thereafter remained. Soon after his arrest the appellant was brought into the presence of the detectives and questioned regarding how he came into possession of the machine. The officers testified that the statement was free and voluntary and not induced by any threats, intimidation, or promises of any sort. While the questions were being asked, one of the officers operating a typewriter took down the questions and answers. In this statement, which was afterwards signed by the appellant, the appellant stated that on the day preceding the taking of the automobile he had visited the salesroom where the automobile was kept, and on the same night at about 11 o'clock he had returned there, entered through a window, and, after opening the large rear door which was barred, had taken an extra tire from another machine and had driven the "Enger" automobile away and secreted it in a garage, where it remained for some time; that during the time he first had it in the garage he repainted and disguised it; that thereafter he used it in livery service for the purpose of earning money.

[1] It is contended on the part of appellant that the evidence was insufficient to establish the corpus delicti, and that therefore the admission of the confession of appellant was error. We do not agree with appellant in this contention, for it seems to us that the facts which we have first briefly stated establish fully that the automobile was unlawfully taken from the possession of the owner and from a building which had been closed and fastened on that night. Three witnesses who were employed about the automobile salesroom all testified to facts from which an irresistible inference would arise that the machine was taken without the consent of any person authorized to give it. The circumstances tended to show, also, that it was taken during the nighttime.

[2, 3] There was no error in the admission of the alleged confession of appellant upon the ground that the confession was not shown to have been voluntary, for the officers testified that no inducement, threat, or other improper influence was exerted upon the appellant to induce him to make the statement. In the statement, which was reduced to writing, defendant was shown to have been asked this question, "All of these statements you have just made have been free and voluntary, have they?" to which the answer was given, "Yes." He was then asked as to whether any threats had been made, or any offers of reward or immunity, and he answered in the negative. The evidence clearly supports the verdict of the jury.

[4] It is complained that an instruction which the trial judge gave, and which contained a statement which suggested to the jury that the defense of an alibi was occasionally fabricated and that temptation to resort to it might be great in cases of importance, was erroneous, in that it invaded the province of the jury. The instruction as a whole, a part of which only we have referred to, was copied verbatim from one approved by the Supreme Court in the case of People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 183. In that case the Supreme Court held that such an instruction did not violate any substantial right of the defendant. No other ground for reversal is urged.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CITY STREET IMPROVEMENT CO. v. LEE,

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇨297(1) — CHARTER—CONSTRUCTION—IMPROVEMENTS.

Under Charter of City of Santa Rosa, § 72, providing that the filing of written objections to the proposed improvement of one block or more of a street by the owners of two-thirds of the frontage within 20 days from the posting of notice of intention to order such improvement will bar further proceedings for six months, but when not more than two blocks remain ungraded or unimproved, and a block or more has been so improved, the council may order improvement, notwithstanding such objections, where a portion of a street had been improved under the law authorizing such improvement and thereafter it was proposed again to improve it under the same authority, the proceedings must be treated as for a first improvement, although after the original improvement other parts of the street had been improved, so that timely written objections filed by the owners of the prescribed amount of frontage will bar further proceedings for the period of six months.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Mandamus by the City Street Improvement Company against Charles E. Lee, Mayor, in which Nellie Furgerson and others intervene. From a judgment dismissing the writ, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

L. M. Hoefler, of San Francisco, and George F. Snyder, for appellant. John T. Campbell, of Santa Rosa, for respondent Charles E. Lee. R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for respondents Nellie Furgerson and others.

HART, J. The petitioner, a corporation, filed a petition in the court below for a writ of mandate to force the mayor of the city of Santa Rosa, a municipal corporation, to enter into a contract with the said petitioner for doing certain street work on Santa Rosa avenue, in said city. The respondent mayor answered the petition, and certain property owners, whose property abuts upon said streets and which would, as a consequence, be assessed for the improvement which had been proposed to be made on said avenue, providing the proceedings were legal and valid, filed a complaint in intervention. The court, upon the trial of the issues made by the answer and the complaint in intervention, rendered and entered a judgment dismissing the writ. The petitioner brings the case to this court on an appeal from said judgment.

On the 21st day of September, 1915, the council of the city of Santa Rosa, proceeding in accordance with the provisions of the charter of said city relating to the public streets thereof and their improvement (see Stats. 1905, pp. 891-898, inclusive), passed a resolution of intention to order the improvement of Santa Rosa avenue, a public street in the said city, from the south side of the bridge over Santa Rosa creek, southerly to the south city limits, where not already paved and improved, by grading the roadway thereof and constructing thereon an asphaltic pavement of a character fully and clearly described in said resolution. The said resolution of intention and notices of the passage of the same were duly and regularly posted, as required by section 72 of the charter.

On the 9th day of October, 1915, and within 20 days from the first day of the posting of said notices, the owners of more than two-thirds of the frontage of the property fronting on said proposed work, which embraced portions only of said avenue not already improved, filed written objections to the said proposed work. The complaint, in this connection, alleges:

"That not more than two blocks of the said Santa Rosa avenue, including street crossings, remained ungraded to the official grade and unimproved; that a block or more on both sides of the unimproved portions of said Santa Rosa avenue was, at all times herein mentioned, and now is, improved with the same character of improvements specified in the said resolution of intention."

Thereafter, and within due time, and after the posting of notice as required calling for the same, sealed proposals or bids for doing the work according to the plans, specifications, and estimates previously made and filed by the city engineer and which were approved and adopted by the council, were received and the council on the 27th day of October, 1915, opened and examined and publicly declared said proposals, and rejected all said proposals or bids except that of the petitioner herein, who was then by said council declared to be the lowest responsible bidder for the doing of said proposed work and awarded to it the contract.

Thereafter, and within three days after the expiration of the five days within which the owners of a majority of the frontage of the property upon the line of the proposed work might themselves have taken the work at the same price or bid at which the contract was awarded to the petitioner, the latter signed and presented to the respondent mayor for his signature, a form of written contract for the performance of said work and improvements at the prices specified in its said bid; said form of contract providing in detail that the petitioner would do all the work according to the specifications adopted for that purpose. With the said form of contract, the petitioner presented to the mayor a bond duly executed by it, and sufficient in all respects, conditioned for the faithful performance of the said contract. The said mayor, without specifying or suggesting any objections to the form of the contract presented to him by the petitioner, or to the bond offered at the same time, refused to execute said contract or any contract for the doing of said work.

The respondent mayor answered the complaint, admitting all the allegations thereof, but alleged, in the nature of a special plea in bar, that in the year 1888, by due proceedings had by the city council of said city of Santa Rosa in pursuance of the provisions of the then existing charter of said city, Santa Rosa avenue was regularly ordered to be improved in accordance with certain plans and specifications adopted by said council for that purpose; that said avenue was, in said year, improved as so ordered after proceedings regularly had for the letting of the contract to do said work; that, in due course, the street commissioner reported to the council that the work and improvement had been completed, and the council thereupon accepted the street as so improved; that, on the 6th day of July, 1893, the city council of said city, acting in pursuance of the provisions of section 20 of the general street law of 1885, known as the "Vrooman Street Law" (St. 1885, p. 160), passed an ordinance, numbered 150, accepting, as improved in the year 1888, as above indicated, Santa Rosa avenue, from the south bank of the Santa Rosa creek southerly to the city line.

The complaint in intervention also pleads said ordinance No. 150, and further points out a number of objections to the proceedings leading to the ordering of the work to be done on the portions of Santa Rosa avenue described in the resolution of intention adopted by the council on the 21st day of September, 1915, and, finally, to the awarding of the contract to do the work described in said resolution to the petitioner.

We do not conceive it to be necessary to consider all the points urged by the respondents against the validity of the proceedings leading to the awarding of the contract by the council to the petitioner. We think the judgment should be sustained for the reason that, in our opinion, the council never acquired jurisdiction to order the work proposed to be done, and this proposition will now be considered.

According to the complaint, the resolution of intention described the work or improvement proposed to be done or made substantially as follows:

"To improve Santa Rosa avenue, a public street in the City of Santa Rosa, Sonoma county, California, from the south side of the bridge over Santa Rosa creek, southerly to the south city limits, where not already paved and improved, by grading the roadway thereof and constructing thereon an asphaltic pavement consisting of three (3) inches of asphaltic concrete foundation covered with an asphaltic concrete wearing surface two (2) inches in thickness, the finished surface of which shall be to official grade."

The court made the following finding:

"That on the 11th day of May, 1888, the council of said city of Santa Rosa, by an order in due form, did order that Santa Rosa avenue should be graded and graveled, with common gravel, to the established grade, under plans and specifications therefor to be adopted and furnished by the city engineer of said city, and further ordered the sidewalks to be graveled, with common gravel, to the official grade and curbing for sidewalks to be placed; that thereafter a contract was duly let for the doing of said work, and the said Santa Rosa avenue, from the south side of the bridge to the southerly city limit, was graveled with common gravel, curbs for sidewalks were laid, and the sidewalks were graveled, with common gravel, all to the official grade, as required by ordinance, and said street work was thereafter accepted by said city of Santa Rosa as herein set out; that thereafter an assessment was made in due form of law against the owners of property fronting on the line of said work for the costs, and expenses of said work, and the contractor collected from the owners of the property the several amounts against them, as shown in said assessment."

[1] The appeal here is upon the judgment roll alone. Therefore, notwithstanding that there is neither by the defendant nor the intervenors a denial of the allegations of the complaint "that not more than two blocks of the said Santa Rosa avenue, including street crossings, remained ungraded and unimproved," from which allegation it is to be implied that there were two blocks on said street ungraded and unimproved, it must be presumed that there was evidence which justified the above finding, and that Santa Rosa avenue was in the said year 1888 improved under due proceedings by the city council in the manner described by said finding from the south side of the bridge southerly to the south limits, which embraced the two blocks designated or specified in the resolution of intention of September 21, 1915.

[2] Section 72 of the charter of the city of Santa Rosa provides (among other things) that the filing of written objections to the proposed improvement of one block or more of a street by the owners of two-thirds of the frontage of the property fronting on the proposed work within twenty days from the first day of the posting of notice of the resolution of intention to order such improvement will operate, ipso facto, to bar further proceedings in relation to the doing of said work for a period of six months. The said section then proceeds:

"When not more than two blocks, including street crossings or intersections, remain ungraded to the official grade, or otherwise unimproved, in whole or in part, and a block or more on one or both sides upon said street has been so graded or otherwise improved, said council may order such work or improvement mentioned to be done upon said ungraded or unimproved part of said street notwithstanding such objections, and said work shall not be stayed or prevented by any written objections, unless the council shall deem the same proper."

Counsel for the petitioner contend that the case here comes within the exception thus made by said section 72 with reference to the effect of written objections by the property owners upon the power of the council to order the work to be done. This position is doubtless founded on the allegation of the complaint, and expressly admitted by the answer of the mayor and not denied in the complaint of the intervenors, that "a block or more on both sides of the unimproved portions of said Santa Rosa avenue was at all times herein mentioned, and now is, improved with the same character of improvements specified in said resolution of intention," etc.

We cannot agree to the contention. As we have shown, it must be accepted as an established fact in this case that at least that portion of Santa Rosa avenue embraced within the resolution of intention had once been improved after proceedings regularly had by the city council under the then existing law empowering the municipality of Santa Rosa to coerce the improvement of its streets at the expense of the property owners; and our judgment is that, where a street or any part thereof has once been improved under a law containing provisions similar to those of section 72 of the charter in question, and, after such improvement has been made, proceedings are taken by the governing body of a municipality to again improve said street, timely written objections filed by the owners of the prescribed amount of the frontage of the property fronting on the line of the proposed improvement will have the effect of barring further proceedings in relation to the proposed improvement for the period of six months. In other words, we think that in such a case the provision of section 72 of the charter first above referred to applies. That provision is fashioned after or the same as the provision upon that subject in the Vrooman Act. We think it is not reasonable to suppose that, a street having been once improved at the expense of the property owners and to their satisfaction, the Legislature, or, in this case, the framers of the charter or the people who ratified and so made it the organic law of the municipality, intended that the governing body of the latter should be vested with an unhampered or a discretionary power of again ordering such street to be improved at the expense of the property owners in the face of a protest regularly filed by the latter against the proposed improvement. The provision that further proceedings shall be barred for six months upon the due filing of written objections by the property owners was doubtless inspired to some extent by the consideration that owners of property subject to taxation for street improvements might not be prepared at the particular time at which streets were called up for improvement to meet or discharge the burden thus to be imposed upon them, and that a postponement of the work for the period designated might be sufficient to enable them to do so; or, it may be, that the framers of the act, in incorporating that provision into the law, conceived that the judgment of the property owners as to the necessity of the improvement at the particular time should be deferred to. But whatever might be the underlying motive for the provision, whether one or the other of the two above suggested or both combined, there can be no less reason or propriety for applying the provision to the case where, as here, the street has once been improved under the direction of the municipal authorities and it is proposed to again improve it, than to the case where a street has been called up for the first time for improvement. Indeed, we think there is a much stronger reason for applying the provision to the situation presented here, since the proceedings involved here, if consummated, will result in taxing the property owners the second time for the improvement of said street.

We have found no direct authority which supports the above views and the conclusion declared. But there is in the case of City Street Imp. Co. v. Babcock, 139 Cal. 690, 693, 73 Pac. 666, an expression, which involves, however, a mere dictum, the question not being directly before the court, that would seem to indicate that the Supreme Court leaned to the conclusion to which we have been led. Speaking of that part of section 3 of the Vrooman Act which, like the latter part of section 72 of the charter involved here, makes an exception, where similar conditions exist, to the rule that written objections duly filed by property owners will bar further proceedings in relation to the proposed improvement of a street, the Supreme Court in that case said, although expressly disclaiming any intention to decide the question therein:

"It is certainly doubtful if this exception applies at all to a block which has been previously improved."

The position above taken cannot be affected by a consideration of the fact, which is alleged in the complaint and nowhere denied, thus imparting to it the dignity of a finding, that at some time since the year 1888, not definitely stated or disclosed, a block or more on both sides of the blocks proposed to be improved had been improved by the construction thereon of asphaltic pavement, etc., and that the blocks proposed to be improved are to be in like manner and character improved. To repeat, what we believe to be the true meaning or intent of section 72 of the charter, so far as it relates to the effect of the due filing of written objections to work proposed to be done, is that where a street or any part thereof has once been improved under the law authorizing such improvement, and thereafter it is sought again to improve it under the same authority, the proceedings looking to the second improvement must be regarded and treated as the same in all essential particulars as those necessary for the improvement of a street in the first instance or where a street or no part thereof has ever theretofore been improved, notwithstanding that at some time subsequent to the first or original improvement other parts of said streets had been again improved.

Our conclusion, as stated in the outset, is that, since the property owners on the parts of Santa Rosa avenue proposed to be improved by the resolution of intention of September 21, 1915, in due time filed sufficient objections to the proposed improvements, the council was wholly without authority or jurisdiction to order the work to be done, and, consequently, its action in awarding the contract to the petitioner to do the work was absolutely void.

The judgment appealed from is, accordingly, affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW — § 829(1)—APPEAL AND ERROR—REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Harry Duncan was convicted of manslaughter, his order for a new trial denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur E. T. Chapman, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant in this action was accused of the crime of murder and found guilty of manslaughter, for which he has been sentenced to a term of eight years in the state prison at Folsom. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

There are no briefs. The present attorney for appellant was substituted in the place of the former attorneys a few weeks before the appeals came on for hearing, and the case has been presented upon his oral argument. No attack is made upon the sufficiency of the evidence, which shows that one J. F. Toolen, a police officer, came to his death by means of a shot fired from a revolver by the defendant.

Appellant's first proposition is that the defendant was prejudiced by certain alleged misconduct of the district attorney; it being claimed that that officer asked an improper question for the sole purpose of prejudicing the defendant in the minds of the jurors. Defendant's objection to the question was sustained by the court, and we cannot say that the district attorney was not acting in good faith. The record does not show any persistent course of action by the district attorney such as has sometimes been held to constitute prejudicial misconduct.

Appellant next complains of the court's refusal to give two requested instructions. The record does not show by whom those instructions were requested, but we will assume that they were proposed by defendant's counsel. The subject-matter of those instructions was covered correctly by the court in other instructions given to the jury, and the refusal to give them in the precise form requested by the defendant did not deprive him of any right.

At the oral argument appellant's counsel suggested that the court erred in giving six of the instructions that were given. As to three of these he stated no reasons why they were erroneous, and was unable to refer us to the pages of the clerk's transcript where they would be found. Subsequently he sent to us a memorandum of the pages. In two of the three instances there are two instructions on each page, and we do not know to which instruction counsel referred. Solving the doubt in his favor, we have examined all of them without discovering any valid objection thereto.

This leaves for consideration the instructions considered by counsel and designated as points 4, 5, and 6. Under point 5 his claim is that the instruction assumes the defendant to be guilty, and thereby invades the province of the jury. In our opinion, the instruction contained no such assumption. Under points 4 and 6 the only objection was that those instructions had no application to the case as presented by the evidence. The point appears to be well taken with respect to one of those instructions, but it related to a minor matter, and the instruction was not at all likely to have affected the verdict.

As none of the points suggested have raised any doubtful question which seems to call for discussion and explanation of the law of the case, we deem it unnecessary to extend this opinion by setting forth the language of the instructions or stating our opinion in detail concerning them. Upon the record in this case, it appears that the defendant is fortunate in that he was convicted of manslaughter, the lowest degree of the offense charged.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CURTIN v. KATCHINSKI et al. (Civ. 1645.)
(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 2, 1916.)

1. BANKRUPTCY — 363 — DISCHARGE — LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

The fact that the plaintiff in an action presented his claim against the defendant therein to the bankruptcy court, and received dividends thereon in excess of the sum in which an undertaking to dissolve an attachment in the action was given, did not operate to discharge the sureties upon the undertaking.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. §§ 550-554; Dec. Dig. — 363.]

2. ATTACHMENT — 344 — RELEASE OF PROPERTY ON BOND — LIABILITY OF SURETIES — DEMAND FOR REDELIVERY.

Where property of defendant released from attachment had been sold by the order of a referee in bankruptcy and the sale approved by the bankruptcy court, no demand upon the defendant, or the sureties on the undertaking to dissolve the attachment, for the redelivery of the attached property, was necessary before bringing an action against the sureties on the undertaking.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1238-1240; Dec. Dig. — 344.]

3. ATTACHMENT — 344 — LIABILITY ON UNDERTAKING — CONDITION PRECEDENT — EXECUTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 555, providing that a suit may be commenced on an undertaking to dissolve an attachment when execution be returned in whole or in part, although defendant in an action was adjudicated a bankrupt after attachment was dissolved upon undertaking but did not obtain his release within one year, there being no inhibition in the National Bankruptcy Act against the issuance and levy of execution in such a case, the issuance and return of an execution unsatisfied is a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action against the sureties on the undertaking.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by D. A. Curtin against B. Katchinski and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for appellant. M. H. Wascowitz, of San Francisco, for respondent Katchinski. Joseph H. Mayer and George D. Perry, both of San Francisco, for respondent Helfronn.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal on behalf of the plaintiff in an action brought to recover the sum of $1,000 alleged to be due upon an undertaking by the defendants as sureties for the release of certain personal property from attachment.

The facts, which are substantially undisputed, are briefly these: The plaintiff and appellant herein commenced an action against the firm of Leipsic Bros. to recover the sum of $3,284.03, and caused to be attached certain personal property owned by said firm. Thereupon the defendants herein as sureties for Leipsic Bros. executed an undertaking for the release of said attached personal property in the sum of $1,000, and the property was released from the attachment. Subsequently the firm of Leipsic Bros. filed a petition in bankruptcy and were adjudged bankrupts, and the property which had theretofore been under attachment was taken into possession by the trustee, and sold under the order of the referee in bankruptcy for the sum of approximately $1,000 and the sale confirmed. Plaintiff presented his claim for the sum of $3,284.03 against said bankrupts, and in due course received dividends thereon aggregating the sum of $2,189.34. He also prosecuted his said action against Leipsic Bros., and recovered judgment against the firm for $3,713.13, upon which nothing was paid except the above dividends. He then began this action against said sureties upon the attachment bond. Leipsic Bros. were not made parties to this action for the reason that they had not joined in the execution of the attachment bond. The undertaking sued upon was given in conformity with section 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by its terms the respondents herein "undertake in the sum of one thousand dollars and promise that in case the plaintiff recover judgment in said action the defendants (Leipsic Bros.) will upon demand redeliver the attached property so released to the proper officers to be applied to the payment of the judgment, or in default thereof that the defendants and sureties will on demand pay to the plaintiff the full value of the property so released not exceeding the sum of one thousand dollars." Prior to the commencement of the action upon this undertaking, the plaintiff demanded of the sureties the sum of $1,000 claimed to be due thereon, but he made no demand upon Leipsic Bros. for the redelivery of the attached property or the value thereof, nor did the plaintiff cause to be issued an execution upon the judgment obtained in the original action against Leipsic Bros., nor has such execution ever been issued or returned unsatisfied in whole or in part. It further appears that the firm of Leipsic Bros. have not obtained their discharge in bankruptcy, and that more than one year had elapsed between the adjudication of their bankruptcy and the institution of the present action.

Upon the foregoing facts the trial court gave judgment in the defendants' favor and denied the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, whereupon he prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] We are inclined to agree with the contention of the appellant that the fact that as plaintiff in the original action he presented his claim against Leipsic Bros. to the bankruptcy court, and received dividends thereon in excess of the sum in which the undertaking involved in the pending suit was given, did not operate to discharge the obligation of the sureties upon said undertaking; and also with his contention that no demand for the return of the released property was necessary in view of the fact that said property had been sold and the sale confirmed by the bankruptcy court, and hence that the making of such demand either on Leipsic Bros. or the defendants herein would have been an idle and useless act.

But conceding this much to the appellant, the insuperable objection to the maintenance of this action consists in the admitted fact that no execution was issued or returned unsatisfied in whole or in part prior to the institution of the present suit. Section 552 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under the title of "Attachment," reads as follows:

"Sec. 552. When suits may be commenced on the undertaking. If the execution be returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the plaintiff may prosecute any undertaking * * * pursuant to section 540 or section 555, or he may proceed, as in other cases, upon the return of an execution."

[3] It has been expressly held that under this section of the Code the issuance and return of an execution unsatisfied in whole or in part is a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action upon an undertaking given under the terms of section 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Brownlee v. Riffenburg, 95 Cal. 447, 30 Pac. 587. It is urged, however, by the appellant that the issuance and return of an execution was rendered unnecessary, and therefore excused, by reason of the fact that Leipsic Bros. had gone into bankruptcy, and that the issuance or attempted levy of an execution would be a fruitless and useless proceeding; and they cite the case of Rosenthal v. Perkins, 123 Cal.

240, 55 Pac. 804, as sustaining this view. An examination of that case, however, shows that it differs from the case at bar in this essential respect: That in that case the principal debtor, for the release of whose property the undertaking had been given, had taken the benefit of the state insolvent act then in force, by the terms of section 45 of which act the issuance and levy of executions was forbidden against insolvents who had come within its provisions. The Supreme Court, in distinguishing that case from the case of Brownlee v. Riffenburg, supra, held that this inhibition against the issuance and levy of an execution against insolvent debtors of necessity rendered section 552 of the Code of Civil Procedure inapplicable to such a case; for to hold otherwise would have rendered impossible an action on an undertaking given under section 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure after the principal debtor had taken advantage of the insolvent act. But the national bankruptcy act contains no such inhibition against the issuance and levy of executions after the lapse of one year as against debtors who have not obtained their discharge within that time; and this being so, and the entire proceeding being statutory, we are of the opinion that the rule laid down in the case of Brownlee v. Riffenburg, supra, must be given full application to the case at bar.

Judgment and order affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1916.)

1. NEGLIGENCE ~~§~~44—DANGEROUS PREMISES—DUTY TO INVITEES.

A lumber company was not under a duty to deceased, its invitee and a member of a railroad switching crew working in its yards, to maintain its premises in a perfectly safe condition, but owed him only duty of reasonable care to see that the premises were in a safe condition, and hence the maintenance of a drawbridge which leaned over railroad tracks in the yard, the dangers of which were known to deceased, did not constitute negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. ~~§~~44.]

2. RAILROADS ~~§~~278(3)—INJURY TO INVITEE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where an experienced brakeman and switchman, an invitee in yards of defendant lumber company, attempted to board a moving flat car in momentary forgetfulness of the known danger of a leaning drawbridge over the track, and was struck by the bridge and killed, such forgetfulness was negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 898; Dec. Dig. ~~§~~278(3).]

3. RAILROADS ~~§~~278(3)—INJURY TO INVITEE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If deceased, knowing of the danger of the leaning drawbridge, took the chance that he was agile enough to board and reach the top of a moving box car before it passed under the bridge, and was struck thereby and killed, he was negligent as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 898; Dec. Dig. ~~§~~278(3).]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ~~§~~238(3)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

When a safe way has been provided an employé for the performance of an act, and he chooses to take another and dangerous way and is injured, he is negligent as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 745; Dec. Dig. ~~§~~238(3).]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇐101, 102(8)—INJURY TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

It is not the duty of an employer to furnish his employé with an absolutely safe place to work, but only to use reasonable care to make it reasonably safe in view of the nature of the employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. ⇐101, 102(8).]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇐240(3)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If an experienced railroad brakeman and switchman after throwing a switch left his position of safety, not in the performance of any duty, and climbed on the side of a moving box car when near a leaning drawbridge which he knew came dangerously near the car and was struck thereby and killed, he took a visible unnecessary risk, and was negligent as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 753; Dec. Dig. ⇐240(3).]

7. NEGLIGENCE ⇐101—INJURY TO SERVANT—COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE—STATUTE.

St. 1911, p. 796, providing that the fact an employé was negligent does not bar recovery when his negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison, had no application to a case where a railroad switchman was guilty of gross negligence in leaving a place of safety and boarding a moving box car when near to a dangerously projecting drawbridge which caused his death, and the negligence of the railroad if any was extremely slight.

Department 2. Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Edith E. Hontz, as administratrix of the estate of George A. Hontz, deceased, against the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company and the Southern California Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from the order denying their motions for a new trial, defendants take separate appeals. Judgment and order reversed as to each appeal.

James E. Kelley and Wilfred M. Peck, both of Los Angeles (A. S. Halsted, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant San Pedro, L. O. & S. L. R. Co. E. S. Williams, of Los Angeles, for appellant Southern California Lumber Co. Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. George A. Hontz, an experienced brakeman, in the employ of defendant San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company, while a member of a switching crew engaged in moving cars in the lumber yard of defendant, Southern California Lumber Company, was killed. His administratrix sued both corporations for damages. Trial before a jury resulted in a verdict in her favor. From the judgment which followed and from the order denying their motions for a new trial the defendants have taken their separate appeals. Certain of the legal questions presented upon these appeals are common to both cases.

Others arising out of the fact that the deceased was the employé of one of the defendants and was but a licensee under invitation upon the premises of the other defendant are different. But as, of course, the facts in both cases are identical, the appeals for convenience may be considered together.

Deceased, as has been said, was an experienced brakeman and member of a switching crew, whose duty it was to go upon the premises of the lumber company, place empty cars at desired positions for loading in the lumber yard, and carry away onto the main line the loaded cars. The tracks of the railway company, for convenience in the handling of the lumber, were sunken below the surface of the lumber yard in a trench or pit or open subway. This was at such a depth as to bring the flat cars to about the level of the lumber yard floor, the box cars of course standing many feet above it. Across this pit was a drawbridge which, when the railroad operations were not under way, was lowered to facilitate the transportation of lumber from one part of the yard to the other. The pit extended in an easterly and westerly direction; the drawbridge in a northerly and southerly direction. It was hinged upon its southerly side and was raised to an upright position when the switching was in progress. At times it sagged somewhat and leaned a trifle out over the pit. This sagging presented no feature of peril when flat cars only were being handled, but it brought the bridge in perilous proximity to the sides of box cars. This was all known and thoroughly understood by the switching crew, including the deceased, and had been a matter of not infrequent conversation and comment between them. What may be called the main line of the switching track lay to the east of this bridge. A short distance to the west of the bridge this main line switch track forked into spur tracks known as 3 and 2. The switch which was thrown to shift the cars from one spur to the other was to the west of the bridge, and the switch bar was in a pit also to the west of the bridge, but on an open platform north of the track. The bridge at the time of the accident was raised. There was evidence that it leaned slightly toward the track. Facing east the track curved to the left hand or northerly, and one standing upon the north platform opposite the bridge was therefore visible from the engine. The switch train on spur track 3 began, under orders, to move easterly. It was composed of the engine, two flat cars, and a box car. It was to carry these cars past the switching point. The switch was then to be thrown and the cars backed down on spur track 2, where the train was to pick up other cars. The deceased, in the performance of his duty, was standing upon the open platform on the north side of the track, some distance to the west of the bridge and near to the switch pit. He was alone there and when the rear box car had passed the switch could have signaled to the train to stop and could have thrown the switch, thus enabling the train to back down onto the spur track 2. He was the only man there, and it is in evidence that his duty called upon him to do these things. However, for some reason utterly unexplained, as the train was thus moving slowly eastward, the deceased ran across one of the flat cars and proceeded to climb the ladder on the southerly side of the box car. It was broad daylight. Hontz had been engaged in this occupation for several months and in switching for 25 years. It was the fact, and he knew the fact, that the switching operations, so far as track 3 were concerned, were conducted from the switching lever and pit on the north platform. He knew of the bridge. Indeed, it was conspicuously before him as he stood upon the north platform. He knew that when raised it sometimes sagged or leaned forward. He had himself spoken of the danger to be anticipated from this. He had talked with other members of his crew about it. Nevertheless, under no sudden stress of excitement or fear—indeed, under no call of duty—he left this position of absolute safety, where he both could signal to the engineer and throw the switch, and attempted to climb up the ladder of the box car which was moving toward the bridge. The foreman of the switching crew, who was present and in charge of the crew, and who last saw the deceased upon the north platform, declared that:

"There was no duty I could conceive or that I knew of that called upon Mr. Hontz at the time of the accident or immediately before to be on the south platform of track No. 3."

Hontz himself gave the signal that set the train in motion. He was at that time standing approximately 80 feet west of the switch. Thereafter he must have crossed to the south side over a moving loaded flat car and then have essayed to climb the ladder of the box car which was upon the south side of that car at the end nearest to the bridge. His distance from the bridge when he made this attempt necessarily was much less than 80 feet. He had not reached the top when he was struck by the leaning bridge and killed.

Los Angeles No. 3761.

[1-3] Appellant contends that absolutely no negligence upon its part is shown in this case; that even if the raised drawbridge could be said to be a danger, it was, first, an obvious danger well known to deceased, and, second, it was only a danger to one recklessly attempting to mount to the top of a box car under the circumstances here presented, and appellant owed him no duty other than to exercise reasonable care and caution to see that the premises were in safe condition. Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 Pac. 256, 5 L. R. A. 580; Means v. Southern Cal.

Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 Pac. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206. So unanswerable is this that the case of the lumber company may well be rested upon this single proposition and a reversal ordered accordingly. For it was not incumbent upon this appellant to maintain its premises in a perfectly safe condition, and conceding that the drawbridge presented a danger, it was a danger known to the deceased—a danger whose risk he accepted and a danger for which injury could befall him only because of his own heedlessness. But even if it be assumed, as for the purposes of the consideration to follow, it will be assumed, that the lumber company was negligent in the maintenance of this bridge, still it must be equally clear that deceased's negligence, amounting to recklessness, was a direct and contributing cause to his death. Of course, as against this, respondent presents the familiar argument that the question whether or not one has been guilty of contributory negligence is usually a question of fact for the jury, and that in this case it was for the jury to say whether or not the deceased was so guilty. It is quite natural, indeed it is necessary, that this contention should be advanced. But if, in cases such as this, it is to be said that the question of contributory negligence is one of fact, it is extremely difficult to conceive of a case where it could be one of law. Here the material facts are absolutely without conflict, and it is impossible to see how a rational mind can from that evidence draw any other conclusion than that the uncalled for action of this experienced brakeman in thus running a race with the moving train to reach the top of this car—an act which from all the evidence it was wholly unnecessary for him to perform—could be anything but negligence. Omitting from consideration the untenable proposition that the deceased's act was prompted by a desire for self-destruction, only one of two other views is at all possible. He either attempted to mount the box car in momentary forgetfulness of the presence of the drawbridge, with which he was familiar and which a few moments before was confronting him, or, with memory of the situation, he took the chance and risk that he was agile enough to reach the top of the car before its ladder passed under the drawbridge. Respondent contends for both propositions and insists further that the question whether the deceased was negligent, if he made the attempt under either view, was a problem to be resolved by the jury. Touching momentary forgetfulness, respondent concedes the general rule to be, as unquestionably it is, that such forgetfulness is in and of itself contributory negligence. But it is sought to place this case within the category of exceptions to this general rule—as in a case where the contributory negligence of a trainman was held to be a matter of fact for the jury when the man was injured by climbing the ladder of a car and was injured by a cattle chute which the train was passing. But in that case the court, indulging in some general discussion as to whether or not as matter of law such a trainman should be charged with the duty of carrying in his mind every real and possible danger along a main line track, rested its decision upon the proposition that it was debatable under the evidence whether the injured man knew of the danger, and approved an instruction to the following effect:

"But if, on the contrary, you find that he did not know of this structure and its risks, and did not have sufficient means of knowledge so as to charge him with the consequences of actual knowledge—in other words, that the structure was unknown to him, and he had not sufficient opportunity to learn of it, and the danger that it occasioned to operatives—then you ought to find for the plaintiff." Dorsey v. Phillips & Colby Con. Co., 42 Wis. 591.

Such reasoning manifestly can have no applicability to the case at bar. Nor can the case of Jacobson v. Oakland Meat, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 430, 119 Pac. 655, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1194, upon which also respondent relies. The general rule is there declared that momentary forgetfulness is no excuse. The cases so holding are cited, and the Jacobson Case is differentiated and distinguished from them in the following language:

"Undoubtedly there was one element in all of those cases which is missing in this one, and that is the plaintiff's familiarity with the danger which he forgot. Plaintiff in this case had relied on his understanding with Monson that the guard would be replaced, and lulled by his confidence in the performance of a clear duty by his superior [officer] had forgotten its removal."

But that the Jacobson case was not pronouncing and was not meant to pronounce any different rule from the familiar one is made manifest by the later cases of Ergo v. Merced Falls Gas & Elec. Co., 161 Cal. 334, 119 Pac. 101, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 79, Brett v. Frank & Co., 162 Cal. 735, 124 Pac. 437, and Reynolds v. Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co., 162 Cal. 327, 122 Pac. 962, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 34.

Upon the second proposition respondent contends that if the deceased took the chance and risk, it was still for the jury to say whether he was negligent in so doing. Herein respondent argues that it would not be disputed that "if a man was a quarter of a mile away in boarding the train, under such circumstances he would be in the exercise of ordinary care," and that therefore whether he was in the exercise of such care, having boarded it at a lesser distance from a known danger, was a matter of fact for the jury. The argument is self-destructive. If he boarded the car at a distance that made it safe for him to do so, neither he nor the lumber company was guilty of any negligence. If he boarded it at a distance which entailed risk, then manifestly this was his negligence, since he knew that risk and took the chance of avoiding it. For it is to be borne in mind that it was no call of duty which put the deceased under any compulsion to do the act which caused his death.

[4] It is a universal principal that when a safe way has been provided for an employé for the performance of an act, and another and dangerous way exists, if the employé chooses to take the dangerous way and is injured he is guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Kenna v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 101 Cal. 26, 35 Pac. 332; Douglas v. Southern Pac. Co., 151 Cal. 242, 90 Pac. 538; Richmond, etc., Co. v. Bivens, 103 Ala. 142, 15 South. 515. Directly in point upon this proposition is the case of Ramsay v. Eddy & Sons, 123 Mich. 158, 82 N. W. 127. It is unusual to find a case which so closely parallels a case at bar. In that case, quoting from the syllabus:

"Lumber in defendant's yard was piled close to the railroad track, leaving only a small space between it and the sides of passing cars, and plaintiff, an experienced brakeman and switchman, threw the switch to enter the yard, and climbed on the side of the car when it was within a short distance of the lumber, and was injured by being crushed between the car and the lumber."

It was held that he was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Such, also, is the declaration in Baugham, Plaintiff in Error, v. N. Y., P. & N. R. R. Co., 241 U. S. 237, 36 Sup. Ct. 592, 60 L. Ed. 977. In that case the deceased was a brakeman, between 18 and 20 years of age. On the second day of his employment, while mounting a freight car that was being transferred from the wharf of the company to a barge moored at the wharf he was killed by being crushed between that car and other cars upon the barge. The car tracks on the barge converged. By reason of this convergence the moving cars came in close and deadly proximity to each other. It was under these circumstances that deceased was caught and killed. The company pleaded as special defenses that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence and had assumed the risk. The trial court held as matter of law that these pleas were well taken, and the judgment of the trial court was affirmed by the Supreme Court without dissent.

It follows herefrom that the judgment and order against the appellant Southern California Lumber Company must be and is hereby reversed.

Los Angeles No. 3759.

[5] This is the appeal of the railroad company, the employer of the deceased. The only circumstance differentiating this case from the appeal of the lumber company arises from the fact that the deceased was in the employ of this appellant. Touching the duty of the employer to furnish this employé with a safe place to work, it should be unnecessary to point out that this duty bears intimate relation to the nature of the work itself. It is not a part of the duty of the employer to furnish his employé with an absolutely safe place to work. It is to be reasonably safe so far as reasonable care can make it in view of the nature of the employment. Here the employé had an exceptionally safe place for the performance of his duties. He could throw the switch from the north platform. He could have crossed over to the south platform by way of the flat cars, or crossed the pit after the cars had passed, or he could have mounted a flat car and remained thereon until the train was brought to a stand beyond the bridge. He was under no compulsion of duty, as has been said, to climb the box car ladder. This appellant was therefore not negligent, but upon the other hand the deceased took a visible, obvious, and unnecessary risk from which his death resulted. To the authorities above cited upon this proposition may be added Kanawha & Mich. R. R. Co. v. Kerse, 239 U. S. 576, 36 Sup. Ct. 174, 60 L. Ed. 448; Reese v. Phil. & Reading R. R. Co., 239 U. S. 463, 36 Sup. Ct. 134, 60 L. Ed. 384; Jacobs v. Southern Ry. Co., 241 U. S. 229, 36 Sup. Ct. 588, 60 L. Ed. 970.

[6, 7] Something is said in respondent's brief touching the applicability to the facts of this case of the Roseberry Act. Stats. 1911, p. 796. The particular provision relied upon is that:

"The fact that such employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery therein where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison."

It is clear that this provision can have no applicability where, if the employer was guilty of negligence at all it was extremely slight as compared with the very gross negligence of the employé.

It follows herefrom that the motions of this appellant for nonsuit and for a directed verdict should have been granted, and that the verdict rendered by the jury does violence to the instructions which the court gave to the jury, and is therefore against law. Declez v. Save, 71 Cal. 552, 12 Pac. 722.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

STRAND IMP. CO. v. CITY OF LONG BEACH. (L. A. 3750.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1916.)

1. JUDGMENT — 567 — CONCLUSIVENESS — TITLE TO LAND.

A judgment by a court having jurisdiction of the city, entered by consent in an action against the city to quiet title, which declared plaintiff therein owner of land claimed by the city by virtue of an alleged dedication for public use, was as conclusive to establish title in fee in the plaintiff as if the city had held the land in its proprietary capacity, or as a natural person, even if erroneous in point of law, and bars both the city and the state.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT — 70 — AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY — PRESUMPTION.

In the absence of evidence of fraud or want of authority, the authority of an attorney is presumed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. — 70.]

3. NAVIGABLE WATERS — 44(3) — GRANT BY STATE — PROPERTY CONVEYED.

St. 1911, p. 1304, by which the state granted to the defendant city all tidelands and submerged lands, whether filled or unfilled, within the present boundaries of the city, and situated below the line of mean high tide, in trust for purposes of navigation, being a present grant and referring to conditions existing in 1911, did not convey to the city land claimed by plaintiff, consisting of accretions between the time of the issue of patent to an adjoining ranch and the grant of 1911 to the city and lying above the mean high tide line in 1911, and the city, having no title, is not prejudiced by a prior judgment that plaintiff is the owner of the land in fee.

4. NAVIGABLE WATERS — 44(1) — ALLUVION — STATUTES — SEASHORE.

Civ. Code, § 1014, establishing the law on the subject of alluvion in rivers, but not purporting to apply to alluvion on the seashore, cannot be so extended by construction, either under the maxim, "expressio unius exclusio est alterius," or under section 4, declaring that the rule of common law that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed has no application to this Code, and that the Code establishes the law respecting the subject to which it relates, and is to be liberally construed.

5. NAVIGABLE WATERS — 44(3) — ALLUVION — COMMON LAW — SEASHORE.

In view of Pol. Code, § 4468, declaring that the common law shall be the rule of decision where not repugnant to Constitution or statutes, and the absence of state law providing for the ownership of alluvion and accretions on the seashore, the upland owner of land abutting on the ocean is entitled to additions by alluvion or accretions.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by the Strand Improvement Company against the City of Long Beach. From an order denying its motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Jamison and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, and Stephen G. Long, of Long Beach, for appellant. Joseph H. Call, and Call, Variel & Call, all of Los Angeles (John E. Daly, of Long Beach, on the brief), for respondent. William, Goudge & Chandler, of Long Beach, amicus curiæ.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The case concerns the ownership of a parcel of land in the city of Long Beach situated on the sand beach above the line of ordinary high tide, and between that line and a bluff a few hundred feet north of it, near the ocean front. Two main questions are presented by the appellant in opposition to the claims of the plaintiff. The first question is whether or not the particular tract in controversy was dedicated to public use as a street, park, or pleasure ground by the former owners of the property and is still subject to such use. The second question is whether or not the doctrine that land added to the upland by accretion, or alluvion, applies to land bordering upon the ocean.

1. The asserted dedication to public use is based on a map filed for record in 1882 by the former owners, showing a survey and subdivision into blocks, lots, streets, and alleys of a large tract of land now comprising a part of the city of Long Beach. The land was a part of a Mexican grant patented by the United States and known as Rancho de Los Cerritos, bounded on the south by the Pacific Ocean. The southern boundary of the map was a reproduction of the meander line of the United States patent, surveyed to indicate the approximate position of the line of ordinary high tide forming the real boundary of the rancho. The line of actual high tide was not shown. Between this meander line and the southern lines of the tier of blocks nearest to it the map showed a space of irregular width, varying, according to the map scale, from 200 to 300 feet. Along this space there was a crooked line from 120 to 200 feet, by the scale, south of the south lines of the first tier of blocks. The map did not contain any legend or words denoting the purpose of this line. There was parol evidence that it was intended to indicate the line of a bluff 15 to 20 feet high extending along the ocean front north of the land in controversy. In the space between this bluff line and the tier of blocks there were the words "Ocean Park Avenue." Nothing further appears that tends to define the width of the space intended to be embraced in Ocean Park avenue, except a note on the margin that, "All streets running east and west are 80 ft. wide." As all the other east and west streets are denominated "streets" and the one in question as an "avenue," the map leaves the width of the avenue in doubt.

The contention of the city is that the filing of this map and the sale of lots referring to it, by the owners of the subdivision, under whom the plaintiff derives its title, operated as an offer to dedicate to public use, as a street and park, or pleasure ground, the whole of the space between the front tier of blocks and the line of ordinary high tide. In March, 1886, before the incorporation of Long Beach, the board of supervisors of the county passed a resolution that the "streets and alleys" in Long Beach shown on this map, "are hereby declared public highways." It is claimed that by this offer and acceptance the space above described became dedicated to the aforsaid public use. The city of Long Beach was incorporated in February, 1888. Soon afterwards the same claim was made by the city against the Long Beach Land & Water Company, the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff, and who then held the record title to the space in question. The company claimed that the dedication included only a strip 100 feet wide, adjoining the lines of said tier of blocks.

Said company, in February, 1889, began an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the city of Long Beach to quiet its title, alleged to be in fee simple, to all of the space between said tier of blocks and the ocean, except the strip 100 feet wide, which it designated as Ocean Park avenue. After this action was begun the dispute was settled by agreement between said company and the city, whereby the city was to abandon the claim that the entire space, or any more than the northerly 100 feet of it, was dedicated to public use, and the company was to convey to the city certain strips of land between the 100-foot street and the bluff, to be used as a public park or pleasure grounds, and not to be obstructed by structures which would cut off the view of the ocean from the front lots in said tier of blocks. This agreement was not in writing, and it was not directly proven, but it is fairly inferable from the evidence. In pursuance of this settlement, the city, by its attorneys, appeared in the action and filed an answer disclaiming any interest in the land claimed in the complaint, and stipulating that judgment might be given for the plaintiff. Judgment was thereupon entered on May 13, 1889, declaring that the said company was the owner in fee of all of the space between said 100-foot street and the ocean and quieting its title thereto against all claims of the city for public purposes or otherwise. On the same day the said company executed to the city a deed purporting to convey to it, upon the conditions above stated, the strips of land above mentioned lying between the street and the bluff. Thereafter the company continued to assert title to the land, except that conveyed by it to the city, and has conveyed parcels of it to divers persons who have used the same for private purposes exclusively. The plaintiff has succeeded to one of these parcels, being the land here in controversy.

[1] The judgment is a determination, conclusive upon the city and the public, that the land in question is free from public use, and that it then belonged to the Long Beach Land & Water Company, to whose title plaintiff has succeeded. A judgment by a court having jurisdiction of the city as one of the parties operates to divest the public use and establish title in fee in the plaintiff, as fully as if the city held the land in its proprietary capacity, or as if it were a natural person, and even if the judgment is erroneous in point of law, upon the facts shown. It bars both the city and the state. People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 251, 29 Pac. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186; San Francisco v. Holladay, 76 Cal. 22, 17 Pac. 942; People v. Smith, 93 Cal. 490, 27 Pac. 57, 247.

[2] The attack on the judgment was on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, and was given on the consent of attorneys who had no authority from the city. There was no evidence of fraud, nor of the want of authority of the attorney. In the absence of such evidence, the authority of the attorney is presumed. The objections on these grounds are completely answered by the decision in Carpentier v. Oakland, 30 Cal. 446. See, also, Deegan v. Deegan, 22 Nev. 197, 37 Pac. 360, 58 Am. St. Rep. 742; Wandling v. Straw, 25 W. Va. 703; 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 128; Code Civ. Proc. § 283.

[3] 2. The court found that the land claimed by the plaintiff consists of accretions along the seashore made since the year 1882. The evidence indicates that the land lies south of the high tide line as it existed in 1867 when the Cerritos rancho was patented. By the act of May 1, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1304), the state granted to the city of Long Beach "all the tidelands and submerged lands, whether filled or unfilled, within the present boundaries of said city, and situated below the line of mean high tide of the Pacific Ocean," in trust for purposes of navigation. The city claims title under this grant. Counsel assert the doctrine that the patent for the Cerritos rancho, although it established the line of mean high tide as the southern boundary thereof, granted only the lands lying north of said tide line as it was then situated; that all lands then lying below mean high tide line were the property of the state; that accretions subsequently formed, or, in any event, all that have been formed along the ocean front since the adoption of section 1014 of the Civil Code in 1872, remain the property of the state, and did not become the property of the owner of the adjacent upland, and that the grant from the state to the city in 1911, included not only the land lying below said tideland at that time, but also all of the land that lay below said line in 1872, and since then converted into upland by accretions or alluvion.

It must be admitted that the language of the granting act does not have that effect. It purports to be a present grant and to refer to conditions existing in 1911, and it is limited to lands "situated below the line of mean high tide of the Pacific Ocean." This means the line as it was situated at that time. The land claimed by plaintiff was then situated above the mean high tide line, and it was therefore not included in the grant to the city from the state. If the city has no title, the judgment that the plaintiff is the owner of the land in fee is not prejudicial to the city. The state alone could complain, if it has any right or interest under the doctrine above referred to, and it is not a party to the action. This action was begun on May 23, 1911, three weeks after the passage of the act granting the tidelands to the city. The evidence shows that no accretions were made in the interval.

There was evidence showing that after the action was begun and before the trial was ended accretions were made adding several feet to the land above mean tide line. The judgment was entered on January 6, 1913. It declares the line of mean high tide to be the south boundary of the land adjudged to plaintiff. It, therefore, becomes necessary to determine whether accretions formed since the passage of the act of May 1, 1911, belong to the plaintiff or to the city.

The claim of the city to such accretions is based entirely on the proposition that the law of this state is that land formed by alluvion along the shore of the sea does not belong to the owner of the adjoining upland, but remains the property of the state in virtue of its sovereignty, as it was while the tides flowed over the space covered by the alluvion. The proposition, considered in the light of its practical application and consequences, is certainly a most extraordinary one. California has more than 1,000 miles of seashore to which land is continually being added by alluvion, and from which land is continually being taken away by reliction. The actual line of mean high tide, as it existed when the state was formed, or as it was in 1872, when the Civil Code was enacted, has never been surveyed, and in places where relictions or alluvions have changed the shore line, the original line is unknown, and cannot be ascertained with any degree of certainty. If the doctrine is correct, the state is the real owner of innumerable parcels of land added to the shore by alluvion which hitherto have been supposed to belong to the respective owners of the upland to which they have been added, and the boundaries of which cannot now be ascertained. It is not difficult to see that great uncertainty, confusion, and much litigation would ensue if such doctrine were established and enforced.

The proposition is contrary to the great weight of authority. The act of April 13, 1850, declared that the common law of England shall be the rule of decision in this state, where it is not repugnant to the federal or state Constitution or to the statutes of the state. Stats. 1850, c. 95. This provision is now a part of our Political Code. Section 4468. The law of alluvion is thus stated by Blackstone:

"And as to lands gained from the sea, either by alluvion, by the washing up of sand and earth, so as in time to make terra firma, or by dereliction, as when the sea shrinks below the usual water marks; in these cases the law is held to be that if the gain be by little and little, by small and imperceptible degrees, it shall go to the owner of the land adjoining. For 'de minimus non curat lex'; and besides, these owners being often losers by the breaking in of the sea, or at charges to keep it out, this possible gain is, therefore, a reciprocal consideration for such possible charge or loss." 2 Bl. Com. 262.

This is practically the universal rule. 3 Wash. Real Prop. (6th Ed.) § 1884, p. 74; 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 468; Camden, etc., Co. v. Lippincott, 45 N. J. Law, 410; Mulry v. Norton, 100 N. Y. 434, 3 N. E. 581, 53 Am. Rep. 206; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 35, 14 Sup. Ct. 548, 38 L. Ed. 331; St. Clair v. Lovington, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 57, 23 L. Ed. 59; Hagan v. Campbell, note, 33 Am. Dec. 277. There is a statement of Chancellor Kent that land gained by accretion belongs, "in the case of the sea or navigable rivers, to the sovereign." 3 Kent, Com. 428. This is part of a passage defining the law of accretion. It is directly contrary to the cases cited by the author to support it. In a footnote to the fourteenth edition, Mr. Gould, the annotator, cites Zeller v. Southern Yacht Club, 34 La. Ann. 837, as sustaining the doctrine. The opinion in that case is not clear on the question whether the land in controversy was upland made by accretion, or was land under the waters of Lake Pontchartrain. So far as it refers to the right to accretions, it appears to be based on the authority of article 510 of the Louisiana Civil Code, which it gives as declaring that the right of the upland owner to land left dry by derelictions "does not take place in case of derelictions of the sea." That state has not, so far as we are aware, adopted the common law. The case is therefore, not in point here. It is contrary to all common-law authority.

[4] The city relies on the application of the maxim, "Expressio unius exclusio est alterius," to section 1014 of the Civil Code. This section is as follows:

"Where, from natural causes, land forms by imperceptible degrees upon the bank of a river or stream, navigable or not navigable, either by accumulation of material or by the recession of the stream, such land belongs to the owner of the bank, subject to any existing right of way over the bank."

The argument is that since this section mentions the banks of a "river or stream," and does not mention the seashore, it must be taken as abrogating the common law, so far as alluvion upon the seashore is concerned. This theory would make an omission to say anything on a subject operate as an affirmative declaration repealing an existing law on the subject not mentioned. We do not think the rule of construction relied on should be carried so far in this case, if, indeed, it could be done in any case. The doctrine that the right to alluvion exists in the owner of the seashore, as well as elsewhere, has been recognized in our decisions. Dana v. Jackson St. W. Co., 31 Cal. 120, 89 Am. Dec. 164; Wright v. Seymour, 69 Cal. 126, 10 Pac. 323. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals seems to have reached the conclusion that section 1014 covered the entire law of the state on the subject of alluvion, that it was exclusive in its character, and that it abrogated the common law of alluvion as applied to the seashore, in its decision in Western Pac. Ry. Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 151 Fed. 397, 80 C. C. A. 606. This conclusion was founded upon section 4 of the Civil Code, declaring that:

"The rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code. The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice."

Doubtless section 1014 establishes the law of this state on the subject of alluvion deposited in rivers and streams. But that section does not purport to establish the law with regard to alluvion on the seashore, nor to declare that neither alluvion, nor the rights growing out of it by the common law, shall exist on land abutting upon the ocean. There is nothing in section 4, nor in the maxim above mentioned, that requires that section 1014 should be given that effect. We do not approve the construction given to it in the above-cited case.

[5] Our conclusion is that the right of the upland owner to additions to his land by alluvion or accretions exists where the land abuts upon the ocean, and that section 1014 of the Civil Code has no application to alter the common-law rule in that respect.

There are no other points that require notice or affect the merits of the case.

The order is affirmed.

The appellant, operating an electric street railway in the city of Sacramento, undertook to construct across K street in that city two tracks, directly connecting its existing tracks on Tenth street, which extended north and south from K street. The accompanying diagram will facilitate an understanding of the situation:

[1] K street extends east and west, and upon it, across Tenth street, defendant has for many years operated its railway. Approaching Tenth street along K from the west there is at Tenth street a curve to the right and southerly, whereby cars on K street may be and are diverted to Tenth street and run southerly thereon. As defendant's street cars reach Tenth street on K from the east, similar curves bear off to the right hand and northerly, whereby the K street cars are diverted onto Tenth street north of K street. These street car tracks are indicated upon the diagram in solid black lines, a single line in each instance for convenience in delineation, representing two tracks. Over the right of defendant to maintain these tracks there is no controversy. Defendant undertook to make a direct connection across K street for its lines on Tenth street. That portion of the new track which it designed to build and was in process of building to accomplish this direct connection is indicated by the dotted lines. This work was arrested by this action in injunction brought by the city of Sacramento. It prevailed, and defendant has taken this appeal. Appellant insists that it has the legal right to construct this disputed portion of the track. It repudiates the suggestion that its argument is more one of convenience than of right, but it is undoubtedly true that running through its argument, like an accompaniment to a theme, is the contention adverted to. Thus it is said that appellant can and does transfer its cars from North Tenth street to South Tenth street, or vice versa, by the cumbersome method of running them onto K street, backing them across K street to the curve upon the other side of the street, and then turning them down that street, that the intersection of Tenth and K streets is a busy and populous center of traffic, and that it would be much more expedient for the appellant, much more convenient for the traveling public, and a much more expeditious way of clearing the interruption to travel occasioned by the presence of these cars to permit the direct crossing. However, as it is only in this inferential way that appellant advances the argument of convenience, it is sufficient to say that, so far as any such use of a public street is concerned, the only reasoning to which a court can listen is reasoning based on legal right. No argument of convenience nor even of necessity justifies an unauthorized obstruction on or unauthorized interference with the free use by the public of one of its highways, and all such arguments are to be addressed to the lawmaking power. Omnibus R. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1244; Elliott, Roads and Streets, § 1046.

[2] We come then to a consideration of the asserted right of the defendant to lay the tracks in question. It is said that this right exists by virtue of a grant contained in two ordinances of the city. By the first of these the predecessors in interest of appellant were empowered to construct the existing double-track street car line which extends along K street, across Tenth, and thereon easterly. They were also empowered to build and operate the existing line from Tenth and K connecting with the existing line on K, thence at Tenth street southerly along Tenth street, and in connection with the construction and operation of this system were empowered to build "all necessary or convenient tracks for curves, turnouts, switches, side tracks, stations, turntables and appendages."

By the second ordinance the predecessor in interest of appellant was authorized to operate electric cars on K street westerly "to a connection with the tracks of the Central Electric Railway Company at the intersection of K street and Tenth street, thence on Tenth street to a connection with the tracks of the Central Electric Railway Company on J street," etc. This is the connection indicated upon the diagram by the northerly curve. The franchise grants contained in these ordinances, it is to be noted, were grants not to the same, but to different persons or corporations. The power conferred by them was exercised to the extent indicated in the construction of the curves leading into the tracks to the north and south on Tenth street. The single question is whether those ordinances, separately or together, granted the right to build the straight track across K street on Tenth, and the question, we think, relieved from the pressure of the argument of convenience, is an extremely simple one which must be answered in the negative. Clearly by none of the language used in either ordinance is the right and power to do this thing directly declared and granted. Appellant finds that power in the use of the word "appendages." That word is employed in the second ordinance in precisely the same manner as it is used in the first ordinance where its context is quoted. Appellant argues that, since it can in fact transport its cars on Tenth street to the north or south of K street by the cumbrous method of switching, the direct cross-track to accomplish the same result comes justly within the meaning of the word "appendage." But is this so? A reading of the ordinances discloses that they are drawn with particularity. The routes are carefully defined. The franchises which they granted were given to different persons at different times. There is, as has been said, nothing in either of them which specifically authorizes a line of railroad directly across K street, and yet one would certainly look for such an authorization to be expressly given. Moreover, the circumstances under which the franchises themselves were given are repellant to this suggestion. By the first the cars were authorized to run easterly to K street and then southerly down Tenth. By the other they were authorized to run westerly on K street and then northerly on Tenth. The fact that by subsequent purchase or traffic arrangement the control of these various lines has come into a single hand of course cannot operate to modify or control the terms of the grant. And, finally, if doubt can be entertained upon the proposition, and it is certainly little enough to say that doubt can be entertained, that doubt, under all the authorities and under every principle governing the interpretation of such grants, must be construed in favor of the sovereign—the granting power—whose mandatory the city of Sacramento is.

"A grant of a franchise to construct and operate a railroad or other utility in the street is to be strictly construed, and, in cases of a fair doubt, in favor of the public as against those claiming under the grant." Dill, Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1233.

"The grant to a railway company of a right to occupy a street, whether by ordinance or by charter, must plainly appear. It should not be left to implication from general language which does not clearly show an intent to give the permission." Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. Chicago, 121 Ill. 176, 11 N. E. 907.

And without multiplying quotations upon so well-settled a proposition, suffice it to cite Hannibal & St. Joseph Ry. Co. v. Mo. River Co., 125 U. S. 260, 8 Sup. Ct. 874, 31 L. Ed. 731; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420, 9 L. Ed. 773; Strawbridge Canal v. Wheeley, 23 B. & A. 794; Dubuque, etc., Ry. Co. v. Litchfield, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 66, 16 L. Ed. 500; Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 666, 24 L. Ed. 1036.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

TURNER v. TURNER et al. (L. A. 3757.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 11, 1917.)

1. PLEADING — 53(2)—INCONSISTENCY.

Where the divorced wife sued in two counts, one of which alleged a fraudulent deed made by the husband, during the community, of community property to two sons, and sought recovery of one-half of such property, and the other alleged that one of the sons, subsequent to the death of the other, fraudulently secured a deed from the plaintiff of her interest in the property and sought recovery of an undivided half of the son's share, though the second count was not consistent with the first, such pleading was not improper, and plaintiff could, before trial, withdraw the first count, in the absence of evidence to support it, and still recover on the second.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 114–117; Dec. Dig. — 53(2).]

2. DEEDS — 58(1)—REQUISITES OF DELIVERY — DEEDS TO INFANTS.

A deed to an infant requires no delivery to or acceptance by the grantee, and delivery to a third person for his benefit is sufficient to vest title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 130, 133, 135; Dec. Dig. — 58(1).]

3. DEEDS — 208(1) — DELIVERY — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Where the grantor of land to infant grantees delivered the deed to a notary and subsequently, in petition for letters of administration upon the estate of one grantee, the grantor expressly stated that the estate consisted of an undivided half of the land deeded, there was ample evidence to support a finding of delivery of the deed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; William D. Dehy, Judge.

Suit by Anna Turner against J. S. Turner, for himself and as administrator of the estate of Edgar M. Turner, and George W. Turner. Judgment for complainant, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. E. Vermilyea, S. L. Carpenter, and Wm. B. Himrod, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Wm. Lair Hill and James P. Montgomery, both of Oakland, and Frank C. Scherrer, of Independence, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff alleged that for many years prior to 1889 she had been the wife of defendant J. S. Turner. In that year they were divorced, the divorce decree containing no adjudication of property rights. She took upon herself the custody, care, and support of two daughters of the marriage, and the husband took upon himself the like custody, care, and support of two other daughters and two sons, Edgar M. and George W. During the existence of the community and before the divorce much community property had been accumulated. In 1882 the husband secretly conveyed a ranch known as the Howard ranch to the two infant sons, Edgar M. and George W. In 1894 the son Edgar M. died intestate. He had attained his majority. He was childless, unmarried, and his heirs at law were his father and his mother. His estate consisted of an undivided one-half of the Howard ranch, the other moiety of which was owned by his brother, defendant George W. Turner. J. S. Turner, the father, sued for and obtained letters of administration upon the estate of his deceased son, and in the course of administration caused to be filed his verified inventory and appraisal of the property of the estate, wherein it was shown that the only property was an undivided one-half of the Howard ranch. In October, 1904, the defendant George W. Turner, who had attained his majority, executed to his father his deed of grant, bargain and sale, conveying to him all of the Howard ranch. This son had been brought up by his father, and for many years had never seen nor communicated with his mother. She was 62 years old and stricken with poverty, and was compelled to support herself by laboring from day to day in the most humble and menial employments. In October, 1909, her son, the defendant George W. Turner, called upon her in Stockton, Cal., where she was residing. He greeted her with manifestations of fond affection, expressed the most ardent filial love for her, deplored her impoverished condition, and urged her to make a deed to him of her interest in the Howard ranch, in consideration of which and of his love and pity for her he would contribute to her support during the remainder of her life. Under these circumstances she executed the deed which he had prepared.

He gave her $50 and went his way. She has never seen him since, nor has he ever contributed anything to her support. The falsity of these representations of love and affection are averred, and it is charged that the son, under the influence of his father, designedly and fraudulently, and in conspiracy with his father, took these means to induce the ignorant, fond, and confiding mother so to part with her land. Another phase of this complaint charged that the execution of the deed by defendant J. S. Turner to his infant sons made during the coverture of the parties was fraudulently designed and executed to deprive plaintiff of her share of the community property. A decree was sought, establishing all of these things and seeking an award to the plaintiff of her share of the community property and of its rents, issues, and profits. When the cause came on for trial the plaintiff's attorneys announced their abandonment of all the contentions going to the nature and extent of the community property, because of their inability to prove the facts. With this also fell their contention that the deed executed by J. S. Turner to his infant sons was executed in fraud. There was left in the case the controversy over the asserted fraudulent procurement by the son of the deed from his mother to the undivided one-fourth of the Howard ranch. Upon the issues presented by this controversy the trial was had, and the court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint. It found that the deed executed by the father to his two minor sons had vested in them the fee-simple title to the whole of the Howard ranch, and the defendant Turner was estopped from denying the validity and due execution of this deed; that by the death of the son Edgar M., title to his undivided one-half of the farm vested in equal moieties in his father and mother; that the son George W. did, by the fraudulent devices above indicated, secure from his mother a deed to her one-fourth of the Howard ranch. The judgment of the court, following these findings, and its conclusions of law denied to the plaintiff any right by virtue of a community interest in and to the property of the Howard ranch, and annulled the deed made by plaintiff to her son.

Upon appeal the grievance of appellants is based upon the assertion and argument that the court erred in allowing plaintiff to abandon her contention, touching her right to the community property, and to rest her action upon a demand for relief against the deed, which had been fraudulently obtained from her by her son. It is said that under the first cause of action she had charged that the deed made by the father to his infant sons was itself fraudulent and void, and that therefore no title passed to the sons; that she changed her attitude and successfully sought to have this deed declared valid, and then sought to obtain an undivided one-fourth of the ranch as heir at law of her deceased son, Edgar M., by force of the validity of this deed from the father to his minor children. The procedure of the court by which this was allowed to be done is declared to be violative of all sound and well-settled rules of law, in that the plaintiff was allowed to change her legal position as the wind changes (Davis v. Winona Wagon Co., 120 Cal. 244, 52 Pac. 487), in that the judgment is not warranted by the pleading, and in that plaintiff is given a recovery upon a case not pleaded. Ellis v. Rademacher, 125 Cal. 556, 58 Pac. 178; Davis v. Pac. Tel. Co., 127 Cal. 312, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698.

[1] It is quite true that if plaintiff had succeeded in avoiding the deed made by her husband to the minor sons upon the ground that it did violence to her rights in the community property and was conceived and executed in fraud of those rights, the sons themselves would have been stripped of title, and she, the mother, would have recovered one-half of the Howard ranch directly from her former husband, as being her community interest therein. Upon the other hand, she charged with equal particularity that she had been fraudulently deprived of her one-fourth interest in the Howard ranch, which one-fourth interest could be hers only upon the theory that the father's deed to his minor sons vested title in them. Her attitude, then, amounted to this: That if she should succeed in establishing her community interest in the property and the fraudulent character of her husband's deed to her sons, she recovered without regard to the swindle subsequently perpetrated upon her by her son. If, however, she failed in this, so that it was decreed that title to this ranch did vest in the sons, then it was still open to her to recover her one-fourth as heir at law of her deceased son, by having the court in equity set aside as fraudulent the deed which she had been induced to make. There is nothing in our system and rules of pleading which forbids such a complaint, even if the positions taken in it may seem to be inconsistent. Tanforan v. Tanforan, 159 Pac. 709.

[2, 3] When it was made known that the plaintiff would abandon her effort to avoid the deed made by J. S. Turner to his minor children, J. S. Turner, in turn, strenuously insisted that he had not parted with title to the Howard ranch, and that his deed conveyed no title for lack of delivery; that it was recorded without his authority, and more to like effect. A deed to an infant requires no delivery to or acceptance by the grantee. Delivery to a third person for the benefit of the infant is, in all cases, sufficient to vest the title. Sneathen v. Sneathen, 104 Mo. 201, 16 S. W. 497, 24 Am. St. Rep. 326; Colee v. Colee, 122 Ind. 109, 23 N. E. 687, 17 Am. St. Rep. 345; Walker v. Walker, 42 Ill. 311, 89 Am. Dec. 445. Turner delivered the deed to the notary public for his children, and it was thus placed upon record. Turner further in his petition for letters of administration upon the estate of his son Edgar M. expressly stated that that estate consisted of an undivided one-half of the Howard ranch which he had deeded to his son. Under oath in the inventory of the estate he swore that one-half of this ranch belonged to the estate of his son. Here was ample evidence to support the finding of the court of delivery.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

RED RIVER LUMBER CO. v. PILLSBURY et al., Members of the Industrial Accident Commission. (Sac. 2478.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1916.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — 398 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — PROCEEDINGS BEFORE COMMISSION—LIMITATIONS—WAIVER.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 287) § 16, barring proceedings before the Commission not commenced within six months after the injury, and section 23, providing for filing answers, the defense that a claim is barred by the six-month period is waived by failure to answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. 398.]

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Thomas E. Wilson against the Red River Lumber Company. After an award the Red River Lumber Company applies for a writ of review against A. J. Pillsbury and others, members of the Industrial Accident Commission. Award affirmed.

Pardee & Pardee, of Susanville, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding to review and annul an award for disability indemnity made by the Industrial Accident Commission against the plaintiff in favor of Thomas E. Wilson.

The proceeding before the Commission was instituted by Wilson more than six months after the date of the accident which caused the injury and more than six months after the making of any payment or agreement by said company on account of the injury and disability. The plaintiff here contends that this lapse of time deprived the Commission of jurisdiction to make an award to the injured employé.

The company did not file any answer before the Commission, and did not raise the objection that the application for relief was filed too late, at any time during the hearing, nor at all, except in a petition to the Industrial Accident Commission for a rehearing, after the award was made. It is now claimed on behalf of the Commission that the lapse of time does not oust the jurisdiction, but is only matter of defense, and that it was waived by the failure to assert it before the close of the hearing before the Commission.

The provision relied on by the Red River Lumber Company in support of its contention is found in section 16 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, particularly clause (a), which reads as follows:

"Unless compensation is paid or an agreement for its payment made within the time limited in this section for the institution of proceedings for its collection, the right to institute such proceedings shall be wholly barred."

The time limited for the institution of proceedings to collect disability indemnity is limited by clause (b) to "six months from the date of the accident," or from the date of the agreement or last payment, where such agreement or payment is made.

Section 23 of the act provides that if the defendant in such a proceeding desires to bring any fact to the attention of the Commission as a defense to the claim, he must, within five days after service of the application upon him, file with the Commission his answer setting forth such fact.

The general doctrine that the statute of limitations affects only the remedy and does not extinguish the right, and that it is a matter of defense which is waived if it is not pleaded, is too well known and settled to require discussion. We find no authority in the act for the application of a different rule to judicial proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission. The fact that the application was filed too late, if true, is clearly a matter which may be relied on as a defense to the claim. Section 23 requires the defendant to file an answer stating such fact, if he intends to rely on it. The reasonable deduction, in view of the well-known doctrine referred to, is that the failure of the defendant to file an answer bringing that fact to the attention of the Commission was a waiver of that defense.

There are cases relating to actions to recover damages for injuries causing death, recoverable only under a statute creating the cause of action therefor, and fixing a limitation within which such actions must be begun, in which it is said that the limitation "is a condition attached to the right to sue," and that "the right is lost if the time be disregarded." The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 214, 7 Sup. Ct. 140, 30 L. Ed. 358; Rodman v. Missouri, etc., Co., 65 Kan. 645, 70 Pac. 642, 59 L. R. A. 704. Also that the condition presented by such limitation "must be met by pleadings on the part of plaintiff and by plaintiff's proofs." Boston, etc., Co. v. Hurd, 108 Fed. 116, 47 C. C. A. 615, 56 L. R. A. 193. In the last case the statute was pleaded, the question of a waiver, therefore, did not arise, and the remark quoted, so far as it may imply that the failure to plead it does not waive such defense, is obiter dictum. In the other cases the question of the effect of a failure to plead the bar of the statute was not discussed. In The Harrisburg it does not appear that there was no such plea. In the Kansas Case the statute was pleaded. The only case that we find holding that such defense is not waived by the failure to plead it is Pittsburg, etc., Co. v. Hine, 25 Ohio St. 629. The statute there considered was construed to declare the limitation as an express condition of the right to sue, and to require the plaintiff to allege and prove that it was begun within the time prescribed. The Workmen's Compensation Act is so widely different in its terms from the Ohio Act that the case is of no force as authority. The language of our statute is that the right to institute the proceeding is "wholly barred" by the lapse of time. This does not mean that the provision relates back and avoids the claim from the beginning, or forfeits the right. The use of the word "barred" in itself implies that the lapse of time constituting the bar must be raised in some manner as a defense. If the bar is not raised, it will be of no avail.

The award is affirmed.

SCHALICH v. BELL. (S. F. 6943.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 11, 1917.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS ⇨271(15) — ACTION — PLEADING.

A complaint in an action on a mechanic's lien averring that defendant entered into a contract with plaintiff whereby she agreed to employ him to perform work and furnish material, and that he did perform the work and furnish the material "pursuant to said contract," was not open to the objection on demurrer that it appeared that plaintiff was not an original contractor and did not file his lien within the time limited for a subcontractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 509; Dec. Dig. ⇨271(15).]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS ⇨271(5) — ACTION — PLEADING.

A complaint in an action on a mechanic's lien averring that plaintiff was to perform labor and furnish material necessary "in and about the repair of the improvements on said lot" was not defective as not specifying a lien upon a "building or other structure," upon which alone lien for labor done is allowed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, in view of section 452, requiring liberal construction of pleadings, since the mechanic's lien law itself frequently uses the word "improvement," as in sections 1187, 1192.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 498; Dec. Dig. ⇨271(5).]

3. MECHANICS' LIENS ⇨271(3) — PLEADING — CLAIM OF LIEN — DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

A complaint in an action on a mechanic's lien describing the land on which the improvement was, and averring that plaintiff's claim of lien was filed against "said land," and that the lien contained a description of the property to be charged therewith, sufficiently made it appear that the claim of lien was filed upon and against the land described in the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 496; Dec. Dig. ⚡271(3).]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡882(5)—CONSTRUCTION—MECHANIC'S LIEN SUIT.

Defendant's admission that material facts appeared only by recital and inference in a complaint in action on mechanic's lien is a concession that the complaint is sufficient to sustain an attack under general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3596; Dec. Dig. ⚡882(5).]

5. MECHANICS' LIENS ⚡276(1)—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—DESCRIPTION.

Leave to amend answer in action on mechanic's lien is discretionary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 539; Dec. Dig. ⚡276(1).]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡959(1)—REVIEW—DISCRETION.

The action of the trial court in refusing to allow amendment of answer in action on mechanic's lien will not be reviewed unless plain abuse of discretion appears.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3825, 3826; Dec. Dig. ⚡959(1).]

7. MECHANICS' LIENS ⚡276(2)—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—DESCRIPTION.

Refusal to permit defendant at beginning of trial to amend the answer to deny sufficiency of lien claim as filed, defendant claiming to have originally supposed the claim of lien was in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, which he found on examination was not true, was not abuse of discretion; the lien being matter of record open to defendant's inspection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 540-544; Dec. Dig. ⚡276(2).]

8. MECHANICS' LIENS ⚡280(6) — ACTION — EVIDENCE.

Exclusion of original claim of lien was proper in action on mechanic's lien, where there was no issue over the validity and sufficiency of the lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 563; Dec. Dig. ⚡280(6).]

9. EVIDENCE ⚡142(5)—VALUE OF SERVICES—UNION SCALE.

In action on mechanic's lien, the union rate of wages for workmen was admissible as bearing on the reasonable value of the labor furnished, although the contract of employment was not based on the union scale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 422; Dec. Dig. ⚡142(5).]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1048(3) — HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

In action on mechanic's lien, it was not prejudicial error to refuse to allow answer to question to one of defendant's experts as to what would be the value of "setting up and making proper connections, the articles being furnished by the owner, to wit, one bathtub and two closets in the house," at the corner of certain streets, where the court pointed out it would entertain all questions touching the value of the particular service which plaintiff rendered; such ruling being merely a suggestion to defendant that her questions be made more specific and more directly applicable to the reasonable value of the particular services rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4141, 4151; Dec. Dig. ⚡1048(3).]

11. EVIDENCE ⚡354(2)—ACCOUNT BOOKS.

In action on mechanic's lien, plaintiff's contemporaneous book of accounts was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1438, 1439, 1442; Dec. Dig. ⚡354(2).]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by John A. Schalich against Teresa Bell. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. Z. Blakeman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued on a mechanic's lien to recover for labor and materials furnished. He alleged a balance to be due him under his contract of $481.87. Defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint which was overruled. Thereafter answering, she denied that plaintiff had ever furnished labor or material of other or greater value than $300, which $300, less $20 paid on account thereof, she tendered. The findings of the court and its conclusions of law favored plaintiff. The judgment followed, and from that judgment and from the order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

[1] Touching the general demurrer, it is insisted that plaintiff was not an original contractor and did not file his lien within the time limited for a subcontractor. But the complaint averred that defendant entered into a contract with plaintiff whereby she agreed to employ him to perform work and furnish material. And it further avers that he did perform the work and furnish the material "pursuant to said contract." This was sufficient.

[2, 3] It is next contended: That the complaint was radically defective because it averred that he was to perform labor and furnish the material necessary "in and about the repair of the improvements on said lot of land." The mechanics' lien law, it is said, permits such a lien only for labor done upon "any building or other structure." Code Civ. Proc. § 1185. Moreover, that while the improvements may take the form of buildings or other structures, there may be improvements not contemplated within the provisions of this lien law—flower beds, grass plots, etc. Lothian v. Wood, 55 Cal. 163. Nevertheless, with the liberality with which the courts are told to construe pleadings under our system (Code Civ. Proc. § 452), it is not unduly extending the meaning of the Code section to hold that the pleader meant an improvement for the doing of work upon which a lien is provided. The mechanics' lien law itself not infrequently uses the word "improvement." Code Civ. Proc. 1187, 1192. It is urged that the complaint is insufficient in failing to allege that the claim of lien described the lot of land upon which the improvements alleged to have been repaired were situated. The complaint adequately described the land. It next averred that the plaintiff had filed his claim of lien against "said land," meaning necessarily thereby the land described in the complaint. It is next alleged that the lien contained a description of the property to be charged with the lien. Reading these averments together, while the form of the pleading is susceptible of improvement, it sufficiently appears that the claim of lien was filed upon and against the land described in the complaint.

[4] It is further urged that several material facts appear in the complaint only by recital or inference, but admission that they do so appear is a concession that the complaint is sufficient to sustain an attack under a general demurrer.

[5-7] At the beginning of the trial the defendant asked leave to file an amendment to her answer, stating in support thereof that she had thought that the claim of lien was in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, but upon examination she found that such was not the case, and she therefore asked leave to amend by denying the allegations in the complaint touching the sufficiency of the lien claim as filed. The court refused leave; the ground of opposition being that the lien was a matter of record, open to the inspection of defendant, and the objection to it, if objection existed, was one that could and should have been known to the defendant. Such amendments are permitted, within the discretion of the court, and its action in refusing to allow the amendment will not be reversed unless a plain abuse of this discretion appear. County of Siskiyou v. Gamlich, 110 Cal. 94, 42 Pac. 468; In re Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 Pac. 794. No such abuse of discretion is here shown.

[8] Defendant sought to introduce in evidence the original claim of lien. Upon objection of plaintiff it was excluded. There being no issue over the validity and sufficiency of the lien claim, the ruling was proper.

[9-11] Questions were asked touching the union rates of wages for journeymen plumbers. Over objections the court permitted answers. It is insisted that this was error, in that it was not contended that the contract of employment was based upon the union wage scale. The controversy, however, was over the reasonable value of the labor furnished, and the scale of union wages, taken with the other evidence in the case, had a pertinent bearing upon this question. Appellant complains that the court refused to allow one of its experts, shown to be a master plumber, to answer the question:

"What, in your opinion, would be the value of setting up and making proper connections, the articles being furnished by the owner, to wit, one bathtub and two closets, in the house at the corner of Octavia and Bush streets?"

It may be that the court was overtechnical in sustaining the objection to this question. Nevertheless in so doing it committed no prejudicial error, since it pointed out that it would entertain all questions touching the value of the particular service which plaintiff rendered. It was merely a suggestion, therefore, to defendant that her questions be made more specific and more directly applicable to the reasonable value of the particular services here rendered. Defendant objected to the introduction in evidence of plaintiff's contemporaneous book of accounts. The objection was overruled. The account book was properly admitted.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

CARUTHERS BLDG. CO. et al. v. JOHNSON et al. (L. A. 3754.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1916.)

1. NEW TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 138—MOTION—NOTICE OF INTENTION—SERVICE—"ADVERSE PARTY."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring filing and service of intention to move for a new trial upon the adverse party, the "adverse party" is every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the motion is adverse to, or will be affected by, the granting of the motion or changing of the former decision of the court.

2. NEW TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 138—MOTION—NOTICE OF INTENTION—SERVICE.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 659, failure to serve notice of intention to move for a new trial upon all adverse parties deprives the superior court of jurisdiction to grant the motion except in so far as it can do so without affecting the rights of an adverse party not served.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 280, 281; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 138.]

3. NEW TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 138—MOTION—NOTICE OF INTENTION—SERVICE.

In an action to have deeds declared mortgages in which plaintiff was successful, service of a notice of intention to move for a new trial upon a mortgagee of plaintiff's successor in title being necessary to vest the court with jurisdiction to entertain the motion, upon failing to give such notice, the purchaser at the mortgage sale was entitled to treat the first judgment as a final adjudication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 280, 281; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 138.]

4. NEW TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 163(3)—MOTION—NOTICE OF INTENTION—SERVICE.

The purchaser at a sale under deed of trust executed by the successor in title of the successful plaintiff in an action to have deeds to real estate declared mortgages, being the real party affected, could object that the steps taken in procuring a new trial in the case affecting his chain of title were defective, because of failure to give notice to adverse party as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 659.

5. MORTGAGES ¶372(1) — FORECLOSURE — TITLE OF PURCHASER.

In the absence of notice, the title of a purchaser of real estate at a sale under power in a deed of trust would not be affected by defects in the title of the mortgagor's grantor consisting of lack of consideration and of false representations.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by the Caruthers Building Company and another against Parley M. Johnson, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint, bringing in H. M. Corlette and others as parties defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff and cross-defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Flint, Gray & Barker, Gray, Barker & Bowen, and Donald Barker, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Parley M. Johnson. Guy S. Pratt and J. P. Chandler, both of Los Angeles, for respondents Caruthers Bldg. Co. and another. Guy S. Pratt, of Los Angeles, for respondent H. M. Corlette. D. Z. Gardner, of Los Angeles, for respondent C. B. Williams. Cleveland Schultz, Paul W. Schenck, and Richard Kittrelle, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Frank Whittaker. Denio & Hart, of Long Beach, for respondents Robert S. Nelson and Olaf M. Nelson.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought against Parley M. Johnson to quiet the title of Caruthers Building Company to certain land in the county of Los Angeles. Johnson filed a cross-complaint, bringing in as parties various purchasers of portions of the property from Caruthers Building Company. Judgment went in favor of the building company and its grantees. Johnson appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

All of the respondents, other than Caruthers Building Company, derive their rights from that corporation, and we shall, therefore, in this opinion treat the controversy as if it were one between Johnson as appellant and Caruthers Building Company as the sole respondent.

Both of these parties claim under William Reid as the common source of title. In 1890 Reid executed a conveyance of the land to one Wannop. In 1906, Wannop and Reid made quitclaim deeds of the land to C. B. Williams. All of these deeds were duly recorded, and they vested the record title, from 1906, in Williams. He claimed to own the property in fee by virtue of them. In June, 1906, Williams borrowed of the German American Savings Bank the sum of $3,500, for which he gave his promissory note, secured by a deed of trust to Union Trust & Realty Company as trustee. In November, 1906, Reid brought an action against Williams, German American Savings Bank and Union Trust & Realty Company, in which he sought an adjudication that his conveyance to Wannop and the subsequent deeds from Wannop and himself to Williams, although absolute in form, were in fact mortgages. The trial resulted in findings in favor of this contention, and judgment was rendered on March 17, 1909, directing the plaintiff to pay to the German American Savings Bank the sum of $3,500, with interest, due it under the note of Williams; directing said German American Savings Bank, upon payment of said sum, to cancel and deliver to Williams his promissory note and to give him a release of the indebtedness, and requiring the Union Trust & Realty Company, upon payment of said moneys to the savings bank, to reconvey the property to the plaintiff Reid. No appeal was ever taken from this judgment.

On October 22, 1909, Reid conveyed the land by deed of grant to one Hunter, and on August 24, 1909, Hunter conveyed by a like deed to Ilex Realty Company, a corporation. On November 3, 1909, Ilex Realty Company made a deed of trust to Union Trust & Realty Company in favor of the German American Savings Bank to secure a loan of $3,200. On or about the same date, the $3,500 required to be paid under the judgment of March 17, 1909, was paid to the savings bank, the releases provided for in that judgment were duly made, and Union Trust & Realty Company executed its deed to Reid. The evidence shows that the payment to the savings bank was made by Ilex Realty Company. Thereafter the Ilex Company defaulted in the payment of its $3,200 debt, and Union Trust & Realty Company sold the property under the power conferred upon it by the deed of trust from Ilex Realty Company. The appellant, Johnson, purchased at such sale, paying for the land the sum of $6,250. The trustee's deed to Johnson was executed under date of October 24, 1910. The time to appeal from the judgment declaring Reid to be the owner of the land had expired when the trustee's sale to Johnson was made.

After all of these transactions, however, the court granted a motion of Williams for a new trial in the action of Reid v. Williams, and subsequently entered a judgment declaring Williams to be the owner of the property. This judgment was entered on the 25th day of May, 1911, and it, too, became final. Plaintiff claims under subsequent conveyances from Williams.

At the time of Johnson's purchase the papers on file in the action of Reid v. Williams included a notice of intention on the part of Williams to move for a new trial. There was nothing to show that this notice had been served on German American Savings Bank or on Union Trust & Realty Company, and the undisputed evidence in the case at bar is that there was no such service. Nor was there any file or record in the case of Reid v. Williams to indicate that anything further had been done with regard to the proposed motion. The granting of Williams' motion for a new trial and the rendition of judgment in his favor were the result of an agreement between the guardian of Reid (who had been adjudged incompetent) and Williams, the motion for new trial having been granted by consent and the subsequent judgment rendered upon stipulation.

The parties to the present appeals argue a variety of propositions bearing upon the ultimate question whether Johnson, purchasing Reid's title after the time to appeal from the first judgment had expired, is in the position of an innocent purchaser for value or whether he had constructive notice of the pendency of a motion for new trial which might result in the vacating of the judgment on which he relied. We find it necessary to consider only one of the points made by the appellant in this behalf. Let it be assumed that the existence, among the papers on file, of a notice of intention to move for new trial imparted information of everything to which such notice, if properly given, might lead, including the possible vacating of the judgment in Reid's favor. It appears, however, that the notice in Reid v. Williams was not such as to confer upon the court jurisdiction to grant a new trial.

[1-3] A proceeding for new trial is initiated under our statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 659) by filing and serving upon the adverse party, within a given time, a notice of intention to move for such new trial. The "adverse party" upon whom the notice is to be served is "every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the motion is adverse to or will be affected by the granting of the motion or changing the former decision of the court." Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81. The failure to serve the notice upon all adverse parties deprives the superior court of jurisdiction to grant the motion. Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81; Johnson v. Phenix Ins. Co., 146 Cal. 571, 80 Pac. 719; Niles v. Gonzalez, 155 Cal. 359, 100 Pac. 1080. The failure to serve a given party will not deprive the court of jurisdiction to grant the motion in so far as it can be granted without affecting the rights of the party not served. Here, however, the findings and judgment in Reid v. Williams were such that no favorable action could be taken upon the motion without impairing the rights of the German American Savings Bank, one of the parties not served. The judgment directed the plaintiff Reid to pay to that party the sum of $3,500, the amount of its mortgage. The situation is substantially the same as that presented in Johnson v. Phenix Ins. Co., supra, and Niles v. Gonzalez, supra, in each of which it was held that the party occupying a relation analogous to that of the savings bank here was an adverse party, service upon whom was necessary to vest the court with jurisdiction to entertain a motion for new trial.

[4] Regardless, therefore, of the question of constructive notice to Johnson, the proceedings looking to a new trial were nugatory and Johnson was entitled to stand upon the first judgment as a final adjudication of the rights of the parties. The respondents do not dispute the soundness of appellant's contention that service of the notice of intention upon the savings bank was necessary. They contend, however, that Johnson, not being a party to the action of Reid v. Williams, is not in a position to raise the point. This contention cannot be sustained. The action was one to determine the title to real property. Although Reid was the original plaintiff, he had parted with his title and it had become vested in Johnson before the motion for new trial was presented. Johnson was therefore the real party affected by any proceedings in the case of Reid v. Williams, and it must certainly be open to him to object that any steps taken in that case, affecting his claim of title, were unauthorized.

The findings and rulings based upon the theory that the interest of Johnson could be impaired by the granting of a new trial and the rendition thereafter of a judgment in favor of Williams cannot, accordingly, be upheld.

[5] The court made further findings that the conveyances from Reid to Hunter and from Hunter to Ilex Realty Company did not convey any title to said real estate, because the deed from Reid to Hunter was without consideration and was procured by means of a false representation by Hunter. These findings are without support in the evidence. Even if supported, however, they would not justify a judgment against Johnson in the absence of a further finding that Johnson took with notice of the alleged defects in Hunter's title. There is no pretense of any evidence that he did so take.

We do not feel called upon to go into the further question, raised by appellant, that the granting of a new trial in Reid v. Williams, and the rendition of the second judgment in that action were fraudulent as to him. It may be said, however, that we find it difficult to see how, in fairness and justice, Johnson's title can be swept away in favor of the subsequent purchasers from Williams. Under the original judgment Reid was declared to be the owner of the property and was required to pay a note for $3,500 given by Williams to the savings bank. Reid's title passed to the Ilex Realty Company, which paid this note and the mortgage. Williams obtained the benefit of this payment and was released from his obligation on the note. Johnson claims under Ilex Realty Company and he paid $6,250 for the land. After all this Williams comes in, and without restoring the benefit which he has received by the payment of his debt or offering any reimbursement to those who have advanced money on the faith of Reid's ownership, claims (through himself and his grantees) title to the land under an order setting aside the judgment by virtue of which he has received and retained benefits. It cannot be that the law will permit such an effort to succeed.

The judgment and the order denying the new trial are reversed.

LA GRANDE LAUNDRY CO. v. PILLSBURY et al., Industrial Accident Commission. (S. F. 7568.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1916.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — 362 — "USUAL COURSE OF BUSINESS"—MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 284) § 14, excluding from the definition of "employé" any person whose employment is both casual and not in the usual course of the employer's business, an assistant carpenter hired temporarily by a laundry company, and killed while at work upon the house of a stockholder, which was an accommodation undertaken without charge by the laundry company, was a casual employé and not employed in the usual course of business of the laundry company, and his widow was not entitled to compensation under the act.

In Bank. Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mary E. English to obtain compensation for the death of her husband, Richard English, opposed by the La Grande Laundry Company, employer. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Eugene F. Conlin, of San Francisco (Neal Power, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco (W. H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondents. Samuel Knight, F. E. Boland, and James J. McKenna, all of San Francisco, for New England Equitable Ins. Co.

MELVIN, J. A writ of certiorari was issued for the purpose of reviewing the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding to Mary E. English compensation from La Grande Laundry Company (a corporation) because of the death of her husband.

There is very slight conflict with reference to the facts. It appears from the testimony taken before the Industrial Accident Commission that Charles P. Cain was the president and manager of La Grande Laundry Company, and he and his wife were stockholders. There was no formal proof of the sort of business in which the corporation was engaged, but the name furnishes some hint at least upon that subject. Indeed there can be no reasonable doubt that the principal business of the corporation was running a laundry, as the witnesses spoke of the "laundry" not merely as a corporation, but as a place of business. There was testimony at the hearing given by Mr. Cain to the effect that the company was not in the business of repairing houses. It was the custom, however, for Mr. Cain to send a carpenter regularly employed by the La Grande Laundry Company to make necessary repairs about the private properties of the stockholders. When the work required less than two days of the carpenter's time upon any given piece of property, no charge was made against the owner, but when more time was necessary the expense was charged to the stockholder receiving the benefit of the labor. This custom arose, as Mr. Cain said, when the laundry was operated by a brother and a sister in partnership. They owned a number of pieces of property before the fire of 1906 and the carpenter who was employed at their place of business used to make necessary repairs on their houses. After a sort of family corporation was organized this custom was kept up. It did not appear how often such services had been performed for stockholders prior to March, 1915.

Mr. William English was a carpenter regularly employed by the La Grande Laundry Company. At some time in February, 1915, Mr. Cain directed him to go to a house in San Francisco owned by Mrs. Cain, one of the stockholders of the corporation, and there to tighten some plate glass in certain doors. The carpenter informed Mr. Cain that he could not perform the work unaided owing to the weight of the doors, and accordingly he was instructed to employ as an assistant his brother, Richard E. English, who had been hired once or twice before by the corporation for similar services. He did as directed, and on March 2d, while the work was in progress, William English went away from the house for a short time. On his return he was told by his brother that there were some leaks in the roof which had been called to the latter's attention by painters who were at work there. Richard English returned to the roof while his brother was employed on some work about the premises, and while there said Richard lost his footing and fell to the ground below and was killed.

The Industrial Accident Commission found that deceased was a casual employé of the La Grande Laundry Company, but that the accident and death "arose out of and happened in the course of said employment."

In the recent case of Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 158 Pac. 1031, we had occasion to discuss section 14 of the compensation statute which excludes from the definition of "employé" any person whose employment is both casual and not in the usual course of the employer's business. We there held that a workman engaged upon the task of repairing a tractor to be used in drawing plows and wagons for the farming work was not in the usual course of his employer's business. The proof in this case did not support the finding that Mr. Richard English was engaged in the usual business of the laundry. On the contrary the evidence fairly showed that work of this sort was a mere accommodation undertaken, without charge, by the corporation for its stockholders and not at all as a part of the laundry business. If Mrs. Cain had employed the carpenter to perform a job of repairing her doors and he had been killed under the circumstances shown by the record, she would be exempt from liability under the fourteenth section of the statute relating to workmen's compensation. The corporation acting for her may not be charged with liability unless making repairs was a part of its "usual business," as that term is commonly understood. Uncompensated favors extended occasionally to its stockholders surely do not constitute a "business" of a corporation "usual" or otherwise. The English statute is even broader in its scope than ours because it omits the word "usual." In Bargewell v. Daniel, 98 L. T. R. 257, the court was considering the case of a workman who earned his living doing repair work for people residing in the community in which he lived. Mrs. Daniel, the defendant, owned certain cottages which were let to tenants. She collected her own rents, made her own repairs, and she had no other business or occupation. She hired Bargewell to make repairs on one of the cottages, and while so employed he was injured. Compensation was awarded, and defendant appealed, urging the same defense as that put forward by petitioner here. The court said by Cozens-Hardy, M. R.:

"I think this appeal must be allowed. * * * The learned county court judge has found here that the work was casual work, and the employment temporary, and of a casual nature. Therefore the plaintiff was not a workman within the act unless he was employed for the purposes of the employer's trade or business. It is not suggested the defendant was carrying on a trade. Was she carrying on a business in which the plaintiff could be employed? It seems to me she was not. * * * The learned judge appears to have treated her as carrying on the business of a house agent. But section 13 of the act provides that a workman within the act does not include a person whose employment is of a casual nature, and who is employed otherwise than for the purposes of the employer's trade or business. The intention was that the act should not apply in such a case to the ordinary owner of property, who was not carrying on any trade or business. On that short point, it seems to me that this appeal must be allowed."

Kelly v. Buchanan, 47 Ir. L. T. R. 228 (cited in Workmen's Compensation Reports [1913] p. 727), was a case very similar in its facts to this. Defendant was a shopkeeper, but he owned certain dwellings adjoining his place of business. These were let to tenants. Plaintiff was hired for some work on one of these houses, and while performing it he was injured. The award of compensation was reversed, the court saying:

"The facts are very plain. Here we have a man who carries on the business of a shopkeeper in a house, and at the back there are some houses converted from cow houses into residences; he brings in a man to repair one of them, and we are asked to say that this casual laborer was employed for the purposes of the employer's trade or business. The decision of the county court judge was wrong, and we must allow the appeal."

The same principles are announced in McCann v. McDonnell, reported in Workmen's Compensation Reports (1913) under note to Kelly v. Buchanan, supra. Rennie v. Reid, 1 B. W. C. C. 324, was the case of a window cleaner injured by a fall from a physician's residence in which was also located the office of the medical man. The claimant sought relief upon the theory that he was engaged in his employer's business. Compensation was denied, and on appeal to the House of Lords, in discussing this phase of the matter, Lord Stormont Darling said:

"I am of the opinion that the appellant was not employed for the purposes of the respondent's business. It was argued that the fact that the appellant cleaned the windows of the rooms in the house used by the respondent in connection with his medical practice was sufficient to satisfy this requirement. I cannot agree with this argument, and in my opinion it would be absurd to make the respondent's liability to compensate the appellant turn upon the question whether the appellant had or had not, on the particular occasions on which he went to the house, cleaned the windows of the surgery as well as the other windows of the house. Essentially the employment was in connection with the respondent's private residence, and not for the purposes of his business. On the whole matter I am of opinion that we should answer the question of law in the negative."

Respondents have cited Howard v. Massachusetts Employers' Insurance Association, reported in 2 Massachusetts Workmen's Compensation Decisions, at page 8. That was a case in which an electric lighting company employed a number of men to trim trees where the branches interfered with the wires by which the electricity was conveyed to customers. Howard, one of these men, was directed by the foreman of the employer corporation to trim some trees in the yard of a church some distance from any of the lines of the lighting company. An award of compensation was granted upon the theory that Howard was acting as an employé of the company; that his work was not casual; and that it was not outside the usual course of the business of his employer. The case is not in point. The workman's regular business, acting for the company, was trimming trees under orders of the foreman, and this was as much a part of the corporation's business as the stringing of wires, the operation of machinery for the production of electric current, or any of the other incidents to the safe transmission of electricity to customers. When he was ordered to work at a distance from the wires he was not told and he had no means of knowing that he was not doing pioneering work preparatory to stringing wires for his employer. In the instant case, however, the carpenter knew that he was hired to assist in a mere casual task of repairing, and that his employer, the laundry company, was not in the house-repairing business.

It follows that the award must be annulled, and it is so ordered.

Matters occurring after issuing of preliminary restraining order cannot be considered on appeal where no supplemental pleadings are filed.

2. EQUITY $\hookrightarrow$ 17—PROPERTY RIGHT—RIGHT TO PURSUE CALLING.

The right of a citizen to pursue any calling, business, or profession he may choose is a property right to be guarded by equity as zealously as any other form of property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-42, 45; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 17.]

3. INJUNCTION $\hookrightarrow$ 56—SALE OF BUSINESS.

One selling a laundry route and being employed by the purchaser to solicit on such route retains the right, on leaving such employ, to work for a rival laundry if he chooses, or, having established a laundry business himself, to serve all persons voluntarily offering him their trade; but in such competition he must act with the utmost fairness, resolving every doubt rather in favor of the interests of his former employer than against them.

5. INJUNCTION $\hookrightarrow$ 157—FORM.

In an injunction against a driver who had sold a laundry route to plaintiff and worked for plaintiff thereon, restraining the driver from soliciting laundry work from plaintiff's customers along the route, it was improper to insert the words "but not from receiving" before the words "laundry work," etc., where defendant's right to receive such work unsolicited was not in issue.

The case involves the same general equitable doctrines considered in Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, 165 Cal. 95, 130 Pac. 1180, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1159, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 628, and Cornish v. Dickey (Feb. 16, 1916) 155 Pac. 629. It was held in the former case that a certain list of customers along a laundry route constituted a trade secret which was the absolute property of the laundry operating the route, and that the laundry was entitled to a judgment perpetually enjoining a driver, who had left its employ, "from in any manner soliciting or receiving laundry work from any of the persons" who had been such customers along the route assigned to him. (Italics ours.) In Cornish v. Dickey a solicitor, having left the employ of a bakery, was enjoined from soliciting and supplying his former patrons and the patrons of the bakery with the products of its rival. The soundness of these decisions is not questioned. But the proposition is now expressly advanced for the first time that, notwithstanding a court of equity has the authority to enjoin an employé from "soliciting" business of his former patrons under such circumstances, it is not authorized to issue an injunction restraining him from merely "receiving" laundry work from such customers if they voluntarily seek him out and hire him to do their work.

The salient facts presented here are in most respects identical with those of the Empire Steam Laundry Case, and require, therefore, only brief mention. The court found that plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the laundry business in the city of Oakland, conducting its business in substantially the same fashion as did the Empire Steam Laundry. The defendant, formerly the independent owner of a certain laundry route in Oakland, known as route No. 4, had, on April 5, 1908, sold all his right and title in the route to the plaintiff, and thereafter became one of its drivers and solicitors. He was supplied with an automobile by the plaintiff and everything necessary to enable him to serve well the plaintiff's customers and discharge the duties for which he was employed, without cost or expense to himself. For about five years he was employed to canvass orders for laundry work along route No. 4 from house to house, to collect and return the clothes, and to keep confidentially, in a list specially prepared by the plaintiff, all the names and addresses of plaintiff's customers, together with the day of the week when their laundry should be called for, and the place where the same should be gathered up and delivered. It is not questioned that the information thus obtained by the defendant constituted trade secrets of great value to the plaintiff. On April 5, 1913, the defendant left the plaintiff's employ without notice or warning, and immediately thereafter commenced soliciting for a rival laundry the patronage of the persons whose names he had ascertained while in the employ of the plaintiff. Thereafter he called for and gathered up bundles of laundry and unlaundered goods, but "so far as plaintiff has been able to ascertain by inquiries from its said patrons, said patrons did not know that the unlaundered goods called for by defendant were being collected for and being laundered by a laundry other than the laundry of plaintiff herein." It does not appear, however, that the defendant had entered into any contract of employment prohibiting such action on his part. But the court further found:

"That if defendant is not restrained from soliciting, diverting and taking away said customers of plaintiff, seventy (70) per cent. of said trade will be forever lost to plaintiff, to its great damage."

[1] Other facts are pleaded and referred to in the briefs, but were not found to be supported by the evidence. And certain matters occurring after the issuing of the preliminary restraining order are mentioned by counsel, but no supplemental pleadings were filed. None of these matters can properly be considered.

Upon the findings made, plaintiff was awarded a permanent injunction—

"restraining and enjoining said defendant, his agents and employés * * * from in any manner soliciting, but not from receiving, laundry work from any of the persons who were customers of plaintiff prior to the 5th day of April, 1913, along or upon that certain route known and designated by plaintiff and defendant as route No. 4, of the New Method Laundry Company, in the city of Oakland, and attended to by said defendant, while said defendant was employed by plaintiff; and from in any manner attempting to induce any of said customers of said plaintiff, either directly or indirectly, to withdraw any of their business, custom, or patronage from plaintiff." (Italics ours.)

The court did not award damages for the injuries alleged in the complaint to have arisen out of the immediate loss of trade. The appeal, however, is taken solely from the refusal to include in the judgment an order restraining the defendant from receiving laundry work of the persons designated.

While it is required that equity should lend its aid to the fullest extent to protect the property rights of employers, whether existing in the form of trade secrets or otherwise, considerations of public policy and justice demand that such protection should not be carried to the extent of restricting the earning capacity of individuals on the one side, while tending to create or foster monopolies of industry on the other. In recent years, as noted in Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, the matter of protecting the business world against unfair competition has received careful consideration by the highest courts. It has been determined that if a person establishes a trade or business which depends for its continuance upon keeping secret the names of customers, or other valuable information known to such person no agent or employé, having been intrusted with such secrets in the course of his employment, can thereafter utilize his secret knowledge against the interests or to the prejudice of such person. See 14 R. C. L. p. 401, §§ 102-105. As is aptly stated in H. B. Wiggin & Sons' Co. v. Cott-A-Lap Co. (C. C.) 169 Fed. 150: "If he does so, he robs his employer." This was our conclusion in the Empire Steam Laundry Case, and with what is there said in support thereof we are in full accord. It was also the conclusion of the court in the more recent case of People's Coat, Apron & Towel S. Co. v. Light (March 17, 1916), 171 App. Div. 671, 157 N. Y. Supp. 15, 1142, where an injunction was granted, under circumstances similar to the facts presented here, restraining a rival firm from soliciting through Light, one of the plaintiff's former employés, any of plaintiff's former or present customers, and from serving the same on behalf of the rival firm. The court said:

"There is no evidence that Light had a written list of them [the plaintiff's customers]. There was in his head what was equivalent. They were on routes, in streets, and at numbers revealed to him through his service with plaintiff. Their faces were familiar to him, and their identity known because of such employment. He had entry and introduction, and solicited them, not as strangers, but as persons known to him. He used what he had gained through plaintiff to take away its customers."

[2, 3] But coincident with the right of the employer to the protection of his trade secrets against their unwarranted disclosure to or unconscionable use by persons not entitled thereto, is the right of all persons, in the absence of negative covenants to the contrary, to follow any of the common occupations of life. This right of a citizen to pursue any calling, business, or profession he may choose is a property right to be guarded by equity as zealously as any other form of property. See Dent v. West Virginia, 129

U. S. 114, 9 Sup. Ct. 231, 32 L. Ed. 623. "Labor is property. The laborer has the same right to sell his labor, and to contract with reference thereto, as any other property owner." Gillespie v. People, 188 Ill. 176, 58 N. E. 1007, 52 L. R. A. 283, 80 Am. St. Rep. 176. It cannot, indeed, be questioned that an employé, in a case such as this, retains the right to work for a rival laundry if he so chooses, or, having established a laundry business himself, to serve all persons who voluntarily offer him their trade. But in such competition, he must act with utmost fairness, resolving every doubt rather in favor of the interests of the former employer than against them, and exercising, at all times, every precaution to avoid violating, in letter or spirit, the confidence reposed in him. In Grand Union Tea Co. v. Dodds, 164 Mich. 50, 128 N. W. 1090, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 260, a solicitor along a business route for a tea merchant engaged to work for a competitor and sought to take with him the list of patrons, and secure their patronage, which for the most part he had, himself, obtained for the tea merchant while in the latter's employ. Counsel contended:

"This defendant cannot be restrained from soliciting or selling these people goods so long as he does so in an open and fair manner."

A decree enjoining the solicitor "from using any list or copy of list which has been made or retained, or giving or showing them to others" was affirmed. The court then continued:

"We are of the opinion, however, that he cannot be restrained from selling his commodities for himself or for any employer in any part of the city, or to any person, so long as he does not use any property belonging to the complainant, or copies thereof that were surreptitiously made. So far we think ourselves well within equity jurisdiction, on general principles."

See, also, note to Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, in 1 Cal. Law Rev. 385, and comment on People's Coat, etc., v. Light, supra. 25 Yale Law J. 499.

[4] The judgment of the lower court also finds support in sound principles of public policy. To restrain a person, lawfully engaged in a laundry business, from receiving unlaundered goods from certain former patrons is to sanction, to that extent, the establishment of a trade blacklist, thereby depriving such patrons, without any fault on their part, of the right to have their laundry work done where they will. The constitutional guaranties of liberty include the privilege of every citizen to freely select those tradesmen to whom he may desire to extend his patronage, and equity cannot invade or take away this right, either directly or indirectly, without due process of law.

There are, however, some authorities which are relied upon by the plaintiff to support his contention that he is nevertheless entitled to the injunctive relief prayed for. But in none to which we are referred was it necessary for the court to pass upon the precise point raised here (Witkop & Holmes Co. v. Boyce, 61 Misc. Rep. 126, 112 N. Y. Supp. 874), while generally approving an injunction restraining the defendant, among other things, "from calling upon, canvassing, soliciting, accepting, or filling orders for goods similar in kind to those carried by the plaintiff from the persons, * * * being customers of the plaintiff upon whom the defendant had been accustomed to call to obtain orders," was concerned principally with defendant's efforts to unfairly entice away plaintiff's customers. In that case, reliance was placed also upon an express agreement entered into between the parties which contained covenants against the defendant engaging in a similar line of business for the period of two years, as well as upon a penal statute forbidding an employé to use information gained under such circumstances for his own benefit or advantage. A second decision in the case (Id., 64 Misc. Rep. 374, 118 N. Y. Supp. 461) broadly restrains the defendant from "calling" upon the former customers for trade purposes, which term would include calling on legitimate as well as illegitimate business. But the facts indicate that the court was only considering a "gross betrayal of confidence by an unscrupulous employé" resulting in unfair competition. The employé was actually calling to solicit the trade of the former customers. The proposition of "calling" for the purposes of delivering goods or filling orders which had been received in an honest and equitable conduct of a rival business was not involved. A later case (Witkop & Holmes Co. v. Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., 69 Misc. Rep. 90, 124 N. Y. Supp. 956) sums up the two previous decisions as holding that the driver "will be restrained from canvassing and soliciting trade from plaintiff's customers formerly served by him from plaintiff's lists of names and addresses for the benefit of a competing concern." See, also, comment on these cases in Boosing v. Dorman, 148 App. Div. 824, 133 N. Y. Supp. 910. Nor does it seem to us that People's Coat, etc., v. Light, supra, is opposed to the conclusion reached herein.

In other New York cases we find expressions which support our view that the respondent herein cannot be restrained from "receiving" laundry of his former patrons. In Peerless Pattern Co. v. Pictorial Review Co., 147 App. Div. 715, 132 N. Y. Supp. 37, injunctive relief restraining the manager of a rival firm from soliciting or filling orders from plaintiff's customers was expressly denied. The court remarked:

"All that clearly appears is that he undertook to use in his new employment the knowledge he had acquired in the old. This, if it involves no breach of confidence, is not unlawful, for equity has no power to compel a man who changes employers to wipe clean the slate of his memory."

It was there held that the defendant could "enter into competition with plaintiff, even for the business of those who had formerly been plaintiff's customers, providing such competition is fairly and legally conducted." Finally in Boosing v. Dorman, supra, the court, finding that the names of plaintiff's customers, retail dealers in butter and eggs, were all listed in public directories and were not, under the facts shown, trade secrets, went on to say:

"The other knowledge which Dorman acquired by calling upon these customers in the course of his employment, with regard to their habits of buying, their financial worth, and their individual characteristics and preferences, can hardly be denominated 'trade secrets' which an employé is prohibited from using for his own benefit after the termination of his employment, in the absence of an express contract."

Nor does Lamb v. Evans, [1893] L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 218, require a different conclusion. The judgment in that case was to affirm, as regards the general question involved here, the former decision in the case by Mr. Justice Chitty (Id., [1892] L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 462), where an injunction was granted against canvassers for a trades directory. It was suggested by the evidence, so the learned justice observes, that unless the defendants be entirely restrained from soliciting advertisements from the list of traders published in the plaintiff's directory, such traders will be misled into believing that the defendants were still canvassing for the plaintiff. But the court, while recognizing the difficulty in framing a proper injunction touching these matters, held the defendants could not be restrained in such manner. The learned justice said:

"To use the popular expression, they may go and legitimately tout for advertisements for the rival production, and legitimately use the plaintiff's work for the purpose of discovering the traders and showing them the kind of advertisement these same traders formerly approved of, and may be desirous of inserting in the rival work."

We find nothing in the later decision in any sense modifying this holding.

It must be admitted that the injunction issued by the lower court in the Empire Steam Laundry Case, and approved by the decision of this court, does restrain an employé from "receiving" laundry of his former employer's customers. But the facts show the employé was actually disclosing and making use of the secret knowledge and information he had acquired in the confidence of his former employer, and that, by this means, had been able to carry the patronage of many of the former customers to the new employer. The employé's conduct, under the facts shown, clearly constituted an unconscionable and unwarranted use of the trade secrets belonging to his former employer, as well as a violation of the contract which he had entered into. It was to restrain this conduct that the injunction was issued. While the opinion does not qualify the term "receiving," which appears in the injunction, there is nothing therein which indicates that the court intended to hold that an employé, in the absence of an express contract, could be restrained from carrying on a rival business in a fair and equitable manner, and in the course of such competition receiving laundry of such customers of the former employer who may voluntarily come to him. Indeed the opinion does not discuss the term "receiving," and an examination of the briefs shows that the point was not urged for consideration.

But it is insisted by the appellant that "without the word 'receiving' the judgment would be practically worthless, in that it affords little or no relief." "It does not require a very vivid imagination," it declares, "to see the agents and friends of the defendant, or even the defendant himself, within an hour after the court has granted an injunction restraining defendant from soliciting, but not from 'receiving' laundry work, busily engaged in calling upon, or ringing up various customers, advising them of the court's order, but further stating to them that the driver will be pleased to call in the event of the customer sending for him." But appellant overlooks the comprehensive relief granted it by the court. The decree expressly forbids defendant from in any manner soliciting or attempting to induce, directly or indirectly, such customers to withdraw their patronage from plaintiff. Clearly, conduct on the part of the defendant, his agent, or others in his behalf, such as suggested, would be contra bonos mores and a deliberate invasion of the injunction issued to plaintiff. Discussing this point, the court, in E. I. Du Pont, etc., v. Masland (D. C.) 216 Fed. 271, said:

"The line which terminates the limits where the rights of the plaintiffs end and those of the defendants begin is a difficult one to draw. The iniquity of an employé who takes away with him the property of his employer, existing in the form of valuable processes, is as clear as if he asported any other form of property. The right of the employé to use his abilities, developed through his experiences, to the utmost of his capacity, is equally clear. This right of the employé and his obligation to preserve to the full the property rights of his employer are shaded into each other by lines so fine that it is doubtful whether anything but a nice sense of honor can keep them distinguished."

Injunctive relief, in any case, must depend upon broad principles of equity rather than on the particular wording of any decree. Conceivably, cases may arise where the court would be warranted in restraining a person, engaged in a business, from "receiving" trade of certain members of the community. But the facts presented here do not demand such relief. In H. B. Wiggins Sons' Co. v. Cott-A-Lap Co., supra, the court refused to restrain a rival firm from utilizing certain trade secrets, where the relief was prayed for solely because the rival had employed one of plaintiff's confidential employés who was in possession of the secrets. What the court there said applies with equal force to the additional injunctive relief sought here:

"If the injunction issues, it means that hereafter no man can work for one and learn his business secrets, and after leaving that employment engage himself to a rival in business, without carrying on his back into that business the injunctive mandate of a court of equity. There is nothing whatever in the facts of this case, except opportunity to do wrong, and a suspicion in the mind of the rival that wrong will be done. The remedy asked for is an extraordinary one and should not be lightly indulged in. The chancellor ought never to come into such a frame of mind that he assumes human nature to be essentially and inherently evil."

Judgment affirmed.

SHAW and SLOSS, JJ. (concurring). [5, 6] The phrase, "but not from receiving," should not have been inserted in the judgment. The defendant's right to receive laundry work from former patrons of the plaintiff along route No. 4, provided such work came to him without his direct or indirect solicitation, was not in issue and was not disputed or attacked. The phrase was not necessary for the protection of the defendant in that right, for he would possess the right as fully under the decree without those words as with them. If defendant caused their insertion with the expectation that thereby he would be able to receive laundry work from said patrons, obtained or coming to him through any secret or clandestine use by him, or by his agents or friends, of the list of patrons of plaintiff along that route, or of his memory or knowledge thereof derived from his former employment with plaintiff, he will be disappointed, if the judgment is enforced according to its true intent. Notwithstanding that phrase, it enjoins him from in any manner attempting by any means, direct or indirect, to induce any of the patrons of plaintiff along route No. 4, formerly attended to by him, to withdraw any of their business, custom, or patronage from plaintiff. Under this provision he would be guilty of contempt if he received any laundry work so withdrawn, and the phrase in question does not limit the effect of the judgment in that respect. If he should merely go along the route to receive such laundry work of said patrons as they should offer him, he would be soliciting their patronage and would be inducing them to withdraw from plaintiff all of their patronage that he might receive by so doing, and would thereby violate the injunction. Hence, although the phrase might better have been omitted, we believe it to be harmless, and for that reason we concur in the judgment.

GUNTER v. SACKETT. (Civ. 1790.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 9, 1916.)

PLEADING $\S$ 245(7)—AMENDMENT AFTER MOTION FOR JUDGMENT—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

In an action on a note, after answer, plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, and defendant consented and requested that the court grant judgment on the pleadings in accordance with the prayer of defendant's answer that plaintiff take nothing, etc. After argument and submission of the motion, the judge announced that he would give judgment for defendant because the complaint did not state a cause of action. Plaintiff then asked leave to withdraw his motion and amend, and the court struck the motion from the calendar and granted plaintiff leave to amend by supplying an allegation of nonpayment of the note in suit. Meld, that allowing the amendment was within the power and discretion of the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by J. W. Gunter against R. E. L. Sackett. From a judgment for plaintiff by default, defendant appeals. Judgment affirmed, and plaintiff ordered to recover $50 damages on account of delay caused by the appeal.

Kendrick & Ardis, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Isaac Pacht, of Los Angeles (Joseph M. Bernstein, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff commenced this action to recover judgment upon a promissory note executed to him by the defendant. After answer filed, the plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings. The defendant consented, and requested that the court grant judgment upon the pleadings in accordance with the prayer of defendant's answer, to wit, that plaintiff take nothing, etc. After argument by counsel and submission of the motion, the judge announced from the bench that he would have to give judgment for the defendant on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Thereupon the plaintiff asked leave to withdraw his motion and amend his complaint. The court took the matter under advisement, and thereafter made an order striking said motion from the calendar and granting plaintiff leave to amend his complaint; to which action of the court the defendant duly objected and excepted. Thereafter an amended complaint was served and filed, and the legal time for answering having expired without answer or demurrer by the defendant, judgment by default was entered, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

The amended complaint is like the original complaint, with the addition of an allegation of nonpayment of the note. The original complaint had alleged refusal to pay, but had not specifically alleged nonpayment. Appellant insists: (1) That the complaint did not allege that the note had not been paid, and hence stated no cause of action; (2) that the motion for judgment having been decided in favor of the defendant, and the court having so announced from the bench, it was then too late for the plaintiff to withdraw his motion for judgment, and that the court erred in not entering judgment in favor of the defendant upon the pleadings, and that the court had no jurisdiction to allow the amended complaint to be filed, and the defendant could not be in default for not answering such amended complaint.

Assuming, without deciding, that the first complaint did not state a cause of action, we are of opinion that under the circumstances above stated the court had not lost jurisdiction to permit the filing of an amended complaint. On the contrary, that matter was within the power of the court and the discretion vested in it was appropriately exercised in the interest of justice. The appeal is frivolous, and apparently made for purposes of delay.

The judgment is affirmed; and it is ordered that, in addition to the costs, the respondent recover $50 damages on account of delay caused by the appeal.

PEOPLE v. CARRELL. (Cr. 357.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 3, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 2, 1917.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION $\S$ 71—SUFFICIENCY OF ACCUSATION—STATUTORY OFFENSE.

An information charging accused with committing "the acts technically known as fellatio," made a felony by 1915 Pen. Code, $\S$ 288a, is fatally defective because not stating the offense so as to enable a person of ordinary understanding to know what is intended, as required by Pen. Code, $\S$ 950.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 144, 174, 193, 194; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 71.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

J. E. Carrell was convicted of a felony, and appeals from the judgment of conviction and an order denying a new trial. Judgment and order reversed.

R. M. Quackenbush, of Santa Rosa, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was convicted of a felony under section 288a of the Penal Code, and was sentenced to imprisonment at San Quentin for the period of seven years. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The charging part of the information is as follows:

"Did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously commit the acts technically known as fellatio upon the person of one Ethel Carrell, a human being, by force and violence and against the will of the said Ethel Carrell, contrary," etc.

Section 288a of the Penal Code was passed in 1915, and is as follows:

"The acts technically known as 'fellatio' and 'cunnilingus' are hereby declared to be felonies and any person convicted of the commission of either thereof shall be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not more than fifteen years."

Defendant demurred to the information on the ground that it "does not contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in a manner to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended," that the information is not direct and certain "as it regards the crime charged therein," and, that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense. The demurrer was overruled. The motion for a new trial was on the grounds that the court misdirected the jury, in that the offense defined by the court "is not included in the word 'fellatio' as defined in its technical use"; also on the ground that the prosecuting witness was an accomplice, and her testimony was not corroborated, as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code. Upon the denial of defendant's motion for a new trial, he moved in arrest of judgment on the foregoing grounds, which motion was also denied. Neither the statute nor the information defines what is meant by the term "fellatio." No definition of this word have we been able to find in any English dictionary. The particular acts constituting the crime of fellatio are not set forth in the information, and, as none of the ordinary sources of information would enlighten defendant on the subject, how can it be said that "the acts constituting the offense" were charged in such a manner as to enable "a person of common understanding to know what is intended"? Pen. Code, $\S$ 950. In People v. Ah Sum, 92 Cal. 648, 28 Pac. 680, the information was held insufficient and judgment arrested because in a portion of the information the lottery ticket involved in the transaction was set out in Chinese characters. The court said:

"An indictment or information must contain 'a statement of acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended.' Pen. Code, $\S$ 950. An information partly in English and partly in Chinese cannot be said to be in ordinary language. The Constitution requires judicial proceedings to be conducted, preserved, and published in no other language than the English language. Const. art. 4, $\S$ 24. Mr. Bishop says: 'In some of our states there are statutes expressly excluding all languages but the English, and such is clearly the general American law.'"

See, also, Stevens v. Kobayshi, 20 Cal. App. 153, 128 Pac. 419, where the rule was applied in a civil case for libel.

Unexplained, the word "fellatio" would, to a man of common understanding (indeed, we think also to one of uncommon understanding) be as cabalistic as if written in Egyptian or Mexican hieroglyphics or in Japanese or Chinese characters. The attorney for the defendant says in his brief:

"The defendant entered into the trial of this case, and so did his attorney, without any knowledge of what the word 'fellatio' would be defined to mean as used in the statute, or what the elements constituting the offense might be, but rather supposed" the court would instruct in accordance with a definition the attorney found in Andrew's Latin-English Lexicon.

In this sense the definition might not meet the act proven, but would seem to apply to the woman rather than the man. This is mentioned to emphasize the soundness of the statutory rule that the offense must be so stated as to be intelligible to a person of common understanding. Under no other rule could a defendant safely go to trial. The circumstance is mentioned also for the reason that it is by no means certain what acts the Legislature intended to characterize as the crime of fellatio. We do not find it spoken of in any work on criminal law, and its introduction into our statutes is of so recent a date that the courts have not been called upon to deal with it so far as we are aware until this case arose.

The exigencies of the case do not seem to require that we should stain the pages of our reports with the definition as given, or to enlighten the profession or the public as to what the learned trial judge found it necessary to inform the jury the Legislature meant when it announced "fellatio" as a felony.

We are entirely satisfied that the defendant should not have been forced to trial upon this information; that his demurrer should have been sustained, failing in which his motion in arrest of judgment should have been granted, and a new trial accorded him. The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by C. E. Gault against J. D. Wiens and another. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, after judgment for the plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thomson & Spencer, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Melrose & Ames, of Anaheim, and Davis, Kemp & Post, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order granting defendants' motion for a new trial.

The facts are as follows: About December 10, 1908, defendants executed three promissory notes of $500 each, payable one year after date to Henry J. Martens, who, on January 9, 1909, indorsed and delivered the same, with other notes amounting in all to $34,000, to the Bank of Topeka, Topeka, Kan., as collateral security for the payment of a note of $16,000 made by him to said bank, which by its terms matured six months thereafter, and which at maturity was renewed for six months. Upon Martens making default in the payment of his renewal note for $16,000, the bank brought suit thereon and secured judgment upon which it had an execution issued, and caused the sheriff of Shawnee county, Kan., to levy the same upon the $34,000 in notes so deposited as collateral security, all of which notes, including those made by the defendants and constituting the subject of this action, were by the sheriff, under and by virtue of the levy so caused to be made, sold in September, 1910, for the sum of $100 to plaintiff, who at the time of commencing this action was the legal owner and holder thereof. The execution and delivery of the notes, negotiable in form, so made by defendants to Martens, were procured by the fraudulent acts and representations of the latter; but the bank took them in the usual course of business as such collateral security, without notice of such facts. As a conclusion of law, the court found that the Bank of Topeka, prior to the commencement of the action, transferred and assigned all of its right, title, and interest in and to said notes to the plaintiff, and that plaintiff acquired all of the right, title, and interest of the Bank of Topeka in and to said notes sued upon; and that plaintiff became the lawful owner and holder of said notes, free from any equities on the part of said defendants against said Martens, in accordance with which conclusion judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff. The motion for new trial was made upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, and that the decision was against law. The order granting the motion is general.

[1] In the absence of any showing to the contrary, the law of Kansas, where the transaction took place, must be deemed the same as that of this state.

[2] Under section 688, Code of Civil Procedure, the interest of Martens (the judgment debtor) in the promissory notes, was subject to seizure and sale under levy of the execution. Hoxie v. Bryant, 131 Cal. 85, 63 Pac. 153; Davis v. Mitchell, 34 Cal. 81; Donohoe v. Gamble, 38 Cal. 352, 99 Am. Dec. 399. Martens was the owner of the notes subject to the lien thereon of the bank as pledgee. Such lien, however, as provided in section 2988, Civil Code, was dependent on possession of the notes by the pledgee. In Jacobs v. Latour, 5 Bing. 130, it is said (quoting from the syllabus):

"A party, who having a lien on goods, causes them to be taken in execution at his own suit, loses his lien thereby."

To the same effect is Latta v. Tutton, 122 Cal. 279, 54 Pac. 844, 68 Am. St. Rep. 30. In Wingard v. Banning, 39 Cal. 543, it was held that if a common carrier sues out and procures to be levied a writ of attachment against property on which he has a lien, he thereby abandons and forfeits his lien.

[3] When the bank surrendered the pledged notes to be sold upon an execution sued out by it upon the judgment obtained against Martens, it thereby abandoned and forfeited all right and claim to a lien upon the same, so that when plaintiff purchased the property he purchased only the right, title, and interest of Martens in and to the promissory notes, thus acquiring the same at execution sale after the maturity thereof, and hence took the notes subject to all equities which might have been pleaded in an action thereon brought by the original payee. Since, as found by the court, they were procured by fraud and misrepresentation of Martens, who could not have enforced payment, it must follow that plaintiff is in no better position to enforce payment.

[4] Conceding, as appellant insists, that under section 3006, Civil Code, the pledgee had no right to sell the notes or do otherwise than collect the same at their maturity and apply the proceeds upon the liability of Martens, for the payment of which they were held as security, nevertheless, such provision is designed for the benefit of the pledgor, who may waive it. McArthur v. Magee, 114 Cal. 126, 45 Pac. 1068.

[5] In no event is plaintiff, who acquired title to the notes at the execution sale, in position to complain because the bank violated its obligation to Martens.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Henry J. Blunkall and Oliver L. Blunkall were convicted of grand larceny, and they appeal. Affirmed.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendants were jointly charged by information duly filed in the superior court of Tehama county with the crime of grand larceny. The defendants Henry J. Blunkall and Oliver L. Blunkall were convicted of the crime so charged, and prosecute this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The defendant Scott who was not on trial in this case, was made a witness for the people, and as such gave testimony against his codefendants, the Blunkalls, and it is claimed by the latter: (1) That the verdict is not supported by the evidence, because the testimony of Scott was not corroborated as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code; (2) that the court committed prejudicial error in its action in disposing of certain instructions proposed by the respective parties.

The information charges and the evidence shows that the crime of which the defendants were accused and found guilty was committed on or about the 27th day of August, 1915, and that it consisted of the unlawful and felonious stealing, taking, and driving away of 7 head of cattle, which were the property of one H. W. Purcell. Purcell owned 12 head of cattle and kept them on an inclosed range near a place called Red Bank, about five miles southwest from Red Bluff, Tehama county. The defendant Scott resided at Burbank, and Purcell's home was about 3 miles from that place. Scott knew the Purcell herd of cattle, they having ranged up and down near where he resided, and knew that Purcell owned said cattle. Late on the afternoon of August 26, 1915, Purcell went to the range and there saw the cattle. On the last day of August, 1915, he again visited the range, and thereupon discovered that 7 head of his herd were missing. He proceeded to search for the missing cattle, and, on the 8th day of September, 1915, after several days of continuous prosecution of the search, found the 7 head on a range in the mountains, in what is generally known as Mill Creek canyon, approximately 30 miles from the range from which they were taken. The defendants, the Blunkalls, had ranged their own cattle on the range on which the missing cattle were found. The cattle taken from Purcell, before they were driven away, bore the earmarks of Purcell, but did not up to that time carry a brand of any character. When found in the mountains, it was discovered that the earmarks upon the cattle had been changed so that they no longer resembled those of Purcell, and that some of the 7 head had been branded with a double "B" brand, viz.: "BB," while others had been branded with the letter "S."

The defendant Scott testified that he and the defendants Henry and Oliver Blunkall stole and drove the cattle off the Purcell range on the night of August 26, 1915, to the range in Mill Creek canyon. Scott's story as he told it on the witness stand is, briefly, this: That, prior to the occasion on which the cattle were taken from the Purcell range, he had talked with Henry and Oliver Blunkall, who are brothers, about "picking up" cattle whenever an opportunity for safely taking them presented itself. Thereafter Scott visited Chico and there met the Blunkalls. He told them that there were grazing near his place several head of unmarked and unbranded cattle. The Blunkalls replied that they would go to the Scott house within a few days and take the cattle referred to by Scott. In pursuance of this understanding, the Blunkalls went to Scott's home on the 26th day of August, 1915, arriving there in the early morning, long before daybreak. They drove there in a spring wagon, taking with them saddles and other equipments for horseback riding. On reaching the Scott place they retired to bed, and remained about the place during most of the 26th day of August. Scott and Oliver Blunkall went out over the range during that day to inspect the cattle and the situation generally. They found that there were only 2 head of unmarked cattle on the range. Scott expressed the fear that if they took the marked cattle they would readily be detected, but Oliver Blunkall said that they might as well take the marked cattle; that he could so change the marks they then bore that they could not be identifled, so far as the marks were concerned. At a late hour of the night of the 26th day of August, the three defendants, each riding a horse, went to the range, and drove therefrom 8 head of cattle, 1 of the 8 being the property of another party. On their way to the Mill Creek canyon with the 8 head, they took a calf from a neighboring range which belonged to one Barney Bauder. Thus they drove to the mountains 9 head of cattle. Scott said that the agreement between the Blunkalls and himself was that the stock should be equally divided, each to take 3 head; that when they arrived at the canyon, the Blunkalls changed the marks on all the marked cattle and branded them. The 6 which were taken by the Blunkalls as their share were branded with the Blunkall brand, viz.: "BB." Scott's 3 were branded with his brand, viz.: the letter "S."

The wife and daughter of Scott testified that the Blunkall brothers were at the Scott house on the 26th day of August, arriving there in a spring wagon early in the morning and immediately retiring to bed; that they brought with them their saddles, and remained about the house most of the time during that day. Both testified that they heard Scott and the Blunkalls "planning" the taking of the cattle pasturing "out on the plains." Mrs. Scott said she heard the three defendants say that they intended "to take those cattle on the plains" to Mill Creek canyon. Both mother and daughter testified that a Mrs. Baldwin and a Mr. Eckert, who resided in the neighborhood of the Scotts, visited the house of the latter on August 26th, in the daytime, and that the Blunkalls attempted to avoid being seen by them. The daughter said that Henry Blunkall, upon observing Eckert coming to the Scott home, went into the house, whereupon Mrs. Scott asked him, "What is the matter?" to which Henry replied that he did not desire to be seen by any one, "especially Mr. Eckert, as he would know he was up there doing something, and he did not want him to see him when he was out doing that kind of business." The young woman also testified that a social dance in the district schoolhouse was scheduled for the evening of the 26th of August, and that Oliver Blunkall asked her about the dance, and whether she thought there would be a large attendance thereat, and that she replied, expressing the opinion that the affair would be largely attended. "He then said he guessed they wouldn't interfere with the business of taking the cattle." Both the mother and daughter testified that the three defendants left the Scott place on horseback late on the night of the 26th day of August, and that Scott did not return to his home after that night until the following Sunday, which was the 29th day of August.

Both Mrs. Scott and her daughter detailed other circumstances connected with the presence of the Blunkalls at the Scott home which tended to show that those defendants had gone there for the purpose of carrying out the scheme of the three men to take the cattle of Purcell or "the cattle pasturing on the plains"; but we have already presented in substance enough of the testimony of those witnesses to demonstrate that the testimony of Scott was fully corroborated. Indeed, we make bold to say that if there was no other testimony in the case tending to connect the Blunkalls and Scott with the commission of the crime charged but the testimony of Mrs. Scott and that of her daughter, as it is briefly stated above, a reviewing court would go beyond its legitimate function in setting aside a verdict predicated thereon.

Section 1111 of the Penal Code provides, in part:

"A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof."

[1] If there be some independent evidence fairly tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, then the testimony of the accomplice is corroborated within the intent of the above section. People v. Garnett, 29 Cal. 622; People v. Clough, 73 Cal. 348, 15 Pac. 5; People v. Miller, 65 Iowa, 60, 21 N. W. 181; People v. Mayhew, 150 N. Y. 346, 44 N. E. 971. In People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 480, 482, 24 Pac. 32, it is said:

"The corroborating evidence is sufficient if it, of itself, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, although it is slight, and entitled, when standing by itself, to but little consideration. See People v. Melvane, 39 Cal. 616."

[2] It is true, as is contended, that the "corroborating testimony" in this case consists of circumstantial evidence, but the corroboration required by the section named may properly be made by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence. The circumstances detailed by the corroborating witnesses here are of the most incriminatory character, and, as above stated, sufficient of themselves to fasten guilt upon the accused. They, therefore, went beyond the requirement of the rule relative to the corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice.

[3] The appellants complain of the following instruction, and declare that it involves an erroneous statement of the rule:

"While corroborating evidence must create more than a mere suspicion, it is not required that it be of itself sufficient to convict, nor need it extend to every fact and detail covered by the statements of the accomplice. It is sufficient if, standing alone, it tends to connect the defendants with the crime. It is sufficient if it tends to connect the defendants with the commission of the offense, though of itself, standing alone, it would be entitled to but little weight."

The objection to said instruction may best be stated in counsel's own language as follows:

"The words 'it would be entitled to but little weight' are an erroneous instruction. The court should have given the jury the positive instruction that such testimony is not sufficient upon which to convict."

We confess that we are not entirely clear regarding the precise point which counsel thus attempts to urge as the ground of his objection to the instruction. If he means to contend that the court should have stated it as a general proposition to the jury that evidence offered for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of an accomplice can never be sufficient to justify a conviction, the obvious reply is that there is no legal ground or reason upon which such a proposition may be supported. That evidence corroborative of the testimony of an accomplice might be sufficient to justify a conviction, there can be no possible doubt, and no better illustration of this proposition can be found than in the present case. The instruction clearly and correctly states the rule as to the quantum of proof essential to the corroboration of an accomplice, and plainly told the jury, in effect, that, while corroborative evidence need not and might not, when taken alone, be sufficient to warrant the conviction of a person charged with crime, it would meet the test as corroborative proof if it merely tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. This involved an accurate statement of the rule as the Legislature has written it.

[4] The court refused to adopt and read to the jury a number of instructions proposed by the defendants, and it is insisted that in its action in so doing it erred to the serious detriment of the defendants' rights at the trial. One or two only of the assignments under this head merit special attention.

[5] The following is one of the refused instructions preferred by the accused:

"The jury are instructed that a defendant in any criminal case is a competent witness on his own behalf, and the fact that he is a defendant is not of itself sufficient to impeach or discredit his testimony, though the jury are entitled to take into consideration his interest in the event of the prosecution in determining his credibility."

The instruction was wholly inapplicable to the case, inasmuch as neither of the defendants on trial was called to testify. Moreover, the instruction, if pertinent, would be subject to the objection that it singles out the testimony of a particular witness, and instructions which purport to state the tests or rules by which the credibility of witnesses or the weight of evidence is to be determined should be made applicable, not to a single witness or his testimony only, but to all the witnesses or all the testimony.

[6] The defendants requested an instruction, declaring that the witness W. A. Scott, one of the defendants, was an accomplice and the court denied the request. We perceive in the court's refusal to so instruct the jury no prejudicial error. It is true that it was established beyond controversy that Scott was an accomplice, if the crime charged was committed as he declared it to have been; still, the court clearly explained to the jury who an accomplice in crime is under our law, and with equal clearness stated that the Blunkalls could not legally be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice.

[7] We have now considered all the objections to the action of the trial court in disallowing instructions proposed by the accused which we think deserve special notice. It is sufficient to say of the other instructions so proposed and rejected which were pertinent to the issues of the case that they involved the statement of principles which the court, in clear language, announced to the jury in its charge. And, in this connection, it is to be said that the charge of the court contained a full and correct statement of every rule or principle of law applicable to the issues or vital facts developed by the proofs.

The appellants appear to have been accorded a fair and impartial trial, the verdict seems to be supported by ample evidence, and the record is free from prejudicial error.

The judgment and the order are therefore affirmed.

JONES v. MAYDEN. (Civ. 1550.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Nov. 9, 1916.)

1. CORPORATIONS — 306 — CONTRACTS — PARTIES — QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against an individual defendant for breach of a written contract, where the body of the contract referred to defendant as a party thereto, but it was signed in the name of a corporation by defendant, and the evidence showed that plaintiff at all times dealt with defendant personally, and that defendant had never stated that any other person had any interest in the contract and had personally offered to pay plaintiff part of the amount due, stating that if plaintiff did not accept he would beat him out of all of it, it was a question for the jury whether the contract was made with defendant personally or with the corporation, and it was error to grant a nonsuit against plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1457, 1458; Dec. Dig. — 306.]

2. TRIAL — 165 — NONSUIT — MOTION — EFFECT AS ADMISSION.

A motion for nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference of fact that can be legitimately drawn therefrom, interpreting the evidence most strongly against the defendant, where it is fairly susceptible of two constructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 373, 374; Dec. Dig. — 165.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by J. C. Jones against J. L. Mayden. Judgment for defendant on nonsuit. and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

P. H. Johnson, of Sacramento, Chas. W. Gillespie, and John R. Cronin, of Stockton, for appellant. Johnson & Lemmon, of Sacramento, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action for the recovery of the balance due on a conditional contract of sale of an ice machine. At the close of plaintiff's evidence the court granted a motion for nonsuit and entered judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The contract is pleaded in hæc verba, and its opening paragraph reads as follows:

"It is agreed, between J. C. Jones, the vendor, hereinafter called vendor and J. L. Mayden, the vendee, hereinafter called vendee, as follows: Said vendor has agreed to sell, and said vendee has agreed to buy the following property, to wit: One ice machine known as the Polar Wave Ice Machine, and equipment for the same as follows" (description of sundry parts).

Then follow the payments to be made and the various conditions and throughout the contract defendant Mayden is referred to as the only vendee. The attesting clause is as follows:

"In witness whereof the vendor and vendee have caused their names to be subscribed hereto on the day and year first above written.

"J. C. Jones, Vendor,
"Sutter Candy Co., Vendee,

"Per J. L. Mayden."

It is alleged in the complaint that on the 14th day of June, 1915, the said defendant, Mayden, made, executed, and delivered to the plaintiff "the foregoing instrument in writing," that "plaintiff installed the said machine and apparatus described in said contract on the premises of said defendant, and that defendant failed, neglected, and refused to pay" the price therein agreed to be paid, except the sum of $50.00, which defendant paid plaintiff. It is alleged that the name "Sutter Candy Co." signed by the defendant to the said contract, "was and is a fictitious name, under which defendant, J. L. Mayden, was, during all the times herein mentioned, and is now, doing business, and that said defendant, J. L. Mayden, is now and was during all the times herein mentioned, the sole and only owner of the said 'Sutter Candy Co.,' and the only person interested in any way in the business of said 'Sutter Candy Co.,' or the carrying on of the same, or in the said contract." A general and special demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered; denied that he executed the said agreement; denied that the plaintiff installed said machine on the premises of defendant, or that he refused to pay the sum demanded, and alleged that he is not indebted to plaintiff under said contract; denied that there is now due and owing plaintiff from defendant on said contract, or at all, the sum of $535 or any other sum; denied that the name "Sutter Candy Co.," signed by defendant to said contract, "was and is a fictitious name under which the said defendant, J. L.

Mayden, was, during all the times mentioned or any other time or at all, or is now, doing business"; denied that defendant is the sole owner of said candy company, and is the only person interested in its said business, "and denies that the said defendant is the only person interested in said contract"; alleged that said candy company "now is, and for some time past has been, and at all the times mentioned in the complaint has been, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California." The answer does not allege that said Sutter Candy Company has any interest in said business or said contract; the averment is that defendant is not the only person interested in said contract.

Plaintiff testified that he installed the machine as called for in the contract at 1011 K street, Sacramento, where defendant was doing business, and that the machine was used in connection with the business, and that defendant paid $50 the first payment; that no other payments were made.

The contract was introduced in evidence and plaintiff testified that defendant signed it. A motion was made for a nonsuit, pending which the following testimony was taken:

"The Court: Mr. Jones (plaintiff), you may take the stand. I want to ask some questions about this. Q. You came up here soliciting business, didn't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did you come first to meet Mr. Mayden? A. I heard he wanted a machine. Q. And you went to that place, 1009 K street? A. Yes, sir. Q. And interviewed him? A. No. I asked the soda water mixer what the owner's name was, and he told me. He said I could come in, and I went in and looked the place over and came back. I told him I would make out a contract, so I made out the contract at home and brought it up to him to sign, and he said he could not sign this then, but I could come back after a while, that he had to see a lawyer first. That was 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and I came back at 4; he said he had not seen the lawyer yet, and asked if I could come back at 7. I said yes. So I came back at 7 o'clock at night, and he signed the contract, said that he had seen his lawyer, and that the contract was good without the notes. That is the reason I never got the notes. Q. Did he say anything to you about any associates in the business? A. No, sir; never mentioned anything at all. Q. When he came to sign it, 'Sutter Candy Co.' did you make any comment on that, or ask him if that was his own name? A. I never paid much attention to it. I seen it was the Sutter Candy Company, and his name was at the bottom of it. I never asked him any questions about a company. Q. In negotiating with him, did you address him exclusively? A. Yes, sir; I made the contract with him. Q. And he said nothing about any associates? A. No, sir. The contract was made out on top. Q. He did not say that the company would accept? A. He said he would accept. He never mentioned the company to me whatever. Q. And all his talk was in the first person, was it? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. P. H. Johnson: Q. Mr. Jones, did you go to the place of business of Mr. Mayden and try to collect this money afterwards? A. Yes, sir. Q. What happened at that time? A. When the machine was installed, he gave me $50, and said give him ten days more to see how the machine would run. Q. Did you go to his place of business to collect any money? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he offer you any money? A. He offered me $300 at that time. Q. Tell the court just what Mr. Mayden said at that time. A. Mr. Mayden said the machine did not do what he thought it would do, and he didn't think he ought to pay the bill, and I said: 'Well, I didn't guarantee the cabinet at all, but I will put in more pipe and do my share.' I sold it to him pretty near at what it cost me, but I wanted it to be satisfactory to him, the first one I had in this town, so I got some more pipe, and after it was over, I come to see him again, and he offered me $300 and told me that was all he would pay me, and if I took it to court, he would beat me out of all of it. Q. Did he say he would or the company? A. He would. Q. Did he lay the money down there, $300? A. Yes, sir. Q. And he said if you did not take that, he would beat you out of all of it? A. Beat me out of all of it. So I went to Stockton and hired an attorney.

"The Court: Is that all, Mr. Johnson? Mr. P. H. Johnson: That is all."

Thereupon, the court took the motion under advisement, and subsequently granted it and entered judgment for defendant.

[1] The agreement states that:

"It is agreed, between J. C. Jones, the vendor, hereinafter called the vendor, and J. L. Mayden, the vendee, hereinafter called the vendee," that "said vendor has agreed to sell, and said vendee has agreed to buy" the property in question.

No mention is made of the Sutter Candy Company in the agreement, and this name appears only in connection with defendant's signature. The testimony of plaintiff, which we must, under the rule, accept as true, shows that plaintiff was dealing with defendant personally, and not with the Candy Company; that defendant personally made the first payment and personally offered a certain sum less than that due under the contract, and personally stated, unless accepted, he would beat plaintiff out of all of it in the court. He at no time after signing the contract claimed that it was signed by him for the candy company, or that the candy company was the person for plaintiff to look to. In his answer defendant evasively stated that "he was not the only person interested," but did not state who was the interested party.

[2] The motion for nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference of fact that can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and upon which motion the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant. Where the evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions or if any of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the party opposing the motion. O'Connor v. Mennie, 169 Cal. 217, 146 Pac. 674; Boyle v. Coast Imp. Co., 27 Cal. App. 714, 151 Pac. 25.

The learned trial judge seems to have attached undue significance to the signature of the vendee and to have given too little heed to the rule we have just stated. If we were to look alone to the contract, the opening paragraph can more safely be taken as showing the intention of the parties than the manner in which the defendant signed the contract. Besides, we have the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff that the contract was made between himself and defendant and no other person, and that he was dealing directly with defendant. The payment made by defendant and his offer to settle on a certain basis and his failure at any time to claim that he was not personally liable, all goes to show that there was ample evidence from which an inference might legitimately have been drawn by the court that this contract was between plaintiff and defendant.

Under such state of the evidence, it was error to grant the nonsuit.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. RENWICK. (Cr. 512.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 2, 1916.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 369(1)—EVIDENCE—OTHER CRIMES—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a prosecution for robbery, evidence that on the same night an automobile was stolen and was seen in the vicinity of the robbery in the possession of persons with whom accused was alleged to have consorted on that night was inadmissible; the case not being one wherein the prosecution could aid its proof of the charge by proof of previous commission of another crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 822; Dec. Dig. — 369(1).]

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 1144(12) — APPEAL — PRESUMPTIONS.

On appeal from a conviction of robbery, where permission to call back a witness was denied, the court must presume that if the witness had been permitted to testify, her original testimony would have been modified as claimed by the accused in his request to recall her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2901, 3029, 3030; Dec. Dig. — 1144(12).]

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 1168(2)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a prosecution for robbery, where the defense was an alibi, and another witness testified that accused was not at the house at which the witness making the alibi testified he was, but that he had been there previously, refusal to permit the accused to recall such witness to show that she could not remember within a month the time when accused had been at the house was prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Frank Renwick was convicted of robbery, and from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Guy Eddie, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, and now appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The grounds of appeal are that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and that the court erred in some of its rulings upon objections to offered testimony.

At between 7 and half past 7 o'clock on the evening of February 28, 1916, three masked men went into a butcher shop on Stephenson avenue in the city of Los Angeles, no other persons being present at the time except the proprietor, Mrs. Rosenbusch. They locked Mrs. Rosenbusch into a refrigerator, took from the till the money (about $5) that was there, and speedily left the place. Mrs. Rosenbusch testified to these facts, and gave some description of the young men, but the description was not sufficient to identify any of them. According to the testimony of a police officer named Raymond, who had been trailing and watching the defendant and certain other young men, one Burns came to the corner of Tenth and Los Angeles streets at 6:35 p. m. in a Ford automobile. At that place four men, Bill Shank, Frank Shank, Fleming, and Renwick, got into the car with Burns and they drove east on Tenth street. According to the testimony of Earl Whitney, employed at a garage on Stephenson avenue about 600 feet east from the Rosenbusch shop, a Ford automobile coming from the east stopped near that garage at between 7 and 7:15 p. m., where Renwick and Frank Shank got out of the machine and walked west toward the Rosenbusch shop, and Burns was driving the machine. As they walked along Renwick signaled for the machine to follow, and the machine passed along in the same direction. It is in evidence that that is a much-frequented highway, and there is no evidence that these were the only persons who passed along the street at about the same time.

Over objections made by the defendant, one Gronskey was permitted to testify that he was the owner of a Ford machine which he left at the corner of Ninth and Spring streets at 4 o'clock that afternoon; that the machine was gone when he returned there to get it at about 8 o'clock p. m., and that he found it at another place some hours later. There is no evidence identifying Gronskey's automobile with the one in which the defendant was seen by the other witnesses, except that all three of these witnesses describe a Ford machine which was not new, and each witness states that the isinglass was out of the back of the machine which he saw. One Frank Richards testified that at about a quarter after 7 he passed along Stephenson avenue opposite the Rosenbusch shop, and his attention was attracted to two men standing alongside of a building opposite; that one of them pointed across the street toward the shop, where Mrs. Rosenbusch was in the act of rolling up a parcel for a customer. He testified that these men, whom he afterwards saw at the police station, were Burns and Shank, not stating which one of the Shanks. Mrs. Rosenbusch stated that immediately before the robbery she had waited upon a customer, who had just gone out. Two of the men who robbed the butcher shop had revolvers and threatened to shoot Mrs. Rosenbusch if she made resistance. It was proved by the testimony of police officers that between 8 and half past 8 o'clock the defendant and the other men who had been in the automobile at Tenth and Los Angeles streets, came in separate groups to the apartments at 1022 South Hill street, where the defendant and his wife were living. These men were arrested separately when they came from the apartment house at separate times during the course of the evening. The officers found in the Renwick apartment two revolvers, three rifles and two shotguns.

While the evidence is sufficient to establish the existence of suspicious circumstances concerning the defendant, it is barely, if at all, sufficient to justify the verdict that Renwick participated in the Rosenbusch robbery. Assuming it to be legally sufficient, the evidence of that fact is purely circumstantial, and leaves the case in that condition where errors in the admission or rejection of testimony would easily turn the scale and be seriously prejudicial to the defendant.

[1] The testimony of Gronskey had no relation to the case, unless it was introduced for the purpose of showing that the defendant or some of his associates had stolen Gronskey's automobile and were using a stolen automobile at the time of the Rosenbusch robbery. The evidence was insufficient to establish that fact, and, even if it had been sufficient therefor, the evidence was not admissible for that purpose in this action. It was not a case wherein the prosecution was entitled to aid its proof of the charge on which Renwick then was being tried by proving that he had previously committed some other crime. Nevertheless, this would very probably have the effect of creating prejudice against the defendant in the minds of the jurors, and render it easier to obtain from them a verdict that the defendant was guilty of the robbery at the butcher shop.

On behalf of the defendant, Edward Biehl and his wife, Frances Biehl, testified that Renwick and his wife, some months before the date of this robbery, had occupied rooms in their apartment house at the corner of Washington street and Maple avenue; that Renwick came to that apartment house at about a quarter before 7 o'clock on the evening of February 28th and made inquiry to find out whether they would again permit him to occupy an apartment in their house; that Renwick remained there with them until at least as late as half past 7; that prior to the evening of February 28th Renwick had not been there since the latter part of January. In rebuttal of this testimony the prosecution introduced as a witness Mrs. Gertrude Gorham, who had occupied rooms in the apartment house of the Biehls on February 28th. She stated that she saw Renwick call at Mrs. Biehl's on the morning of February 28th. She also stated that she saw Mr. and Mrs. Biehl that evening at their supper between 6 and 7 o'clock, and that at that time Mrs. Biehl told her that Renwick had been back there to rent rooms. Mr. and Mrs. Biehl had testified that they did not have their dinner that evening until a quarter to 8.

Mrs. Gorham was the last witness at the trial, and her testimony seems to have been given at the close of the day, and the last thing occurring before adjourning was the district attorney's statement, "We rest." On the opening of court the next morning defendant's counsel requested that he be permitted to call back Mrs. Gorham in surrebuttal. The court responded:

"I will not open the case for any more evidence."

Defendant's attorney replied:

"I did not close last night, your honor; I didn't rest my case, and I have positive information that the jury ought to hear from this witness, Mrs. Gorham, that she does not know within a month's time of the 28th whether the defendant Renwick was at the house there, and she will so testify if I put her on the stand."

[2, 3] The court again refused the request, and no further evidence was introduced. It can easily be seen that if the testimony of the witnesses Biehl was true, the defendant could not be guilty in this case. The testimony of Mrs. Gorham furnished the only evidence directly contradicting those two witnesses. It may have been the turning point in the case, and may have been the controlling reason why the jury determined that the defendant's alibi was not proven. Since the request to call back Mrs. Gorham was denied, we must assume that if she had been permitted to testify further, she would have modified her former testimony by admitting that she did not know, within a month's time of February 28th, whether the defendant Renwick was at that house. If this were so, then the time to which Mrs. Gorham referred might have been on or about the 31st of January, which was the time when Mrs. Biehl testified that Renwick had been there before. We cannot avoid the conclusion that the defendant was entitled to that additional testimony of Mrs. Gorham, and that the refusal to admit it was so prejudicial that the error must be held to constitute a miscarriage of justice by denying the defendant an important and very substantial right in a matter vital to his defense.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by M. Levy against Orrin S. Henderson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant. Gordon A. Stewart, of Stockton, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for rent and for restitution of premises. The court found that on or about the 28th day of September, 1913, the plaintiff leased to defendant the ground floor of certain premises in Stockton known as the Aurora Flour Mills, from month to month, at the rental of $15 per month, and that said lease was not in writing; "that by virtue of said lease the defendant went into the possession of said floor space of said premises, and continued to occupy and hold the same as the tenant of the plaintiff until the month of July, 1914, at which time, by the mutual consent and agreement of the plaintiff and defendant, the plaintiff leased and demised to the defendant and the defendant leased from the plaintiff, the annex to the Aurora Flour Mills, which annex is a building annexed to and forming a part of the Aurora Flour Mills upon the same rental, to wit, $15 per month * * * and that the said defendant ever since the said month of July, 1914, and up to the present time has been, and he is now, in the exclusive possession and occupancy of said annex" as tenant of said plaintiff and "under said agreement." Then follows a finding that no part of said rent has been paid, and that the amount owing is $405, and that on or about April 25, 1916, plaintiff served upon defendant a written notice that he pay said rent or surrender said premises, but that defendant refused to do either, and that he "still withholds from the plaintiff the possession of said premises and still refuses and neglects to pay the plaintiff said rent or any part thereof as well as the accruing rent." Judgment followed for plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of his complaint.

There is no merit in the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding as to the execution of the lease. Mr. Levy testified:

"Mr. Henderson asked me, telling me that he had to leave his place, if I want to rent him the Aurora Flouring Mill; I say I have no objection, but I will rent to him on one proviso, that I don't take any risk regarding fire, theft, destruction, and so on, but he to vacate as soon as I got a permanent tenant or sell the property; and he was satisfied. He said all right. Then he asked me what I would charge him; I told him I will charge him $15 per month. I called my man, Mr. Terry, and introduced him to Mr. Henderson. Mr. Terry had the keys, and he gave one of the keys to Mr. Henderson, the key for the front door of the Aurora Flour Mills."

Mr. Terry testified:

"Mr. Levy called me and gave me an introduction to Mr. Henderson and said: 'This is our new tenant,' he mentioned the fact, and he said: 'Mr. Henderson was going to take over part of the mill to use as his part.' * * * So I took one of the keys and gave Mr. Henderson one of the keys; one of the keys was supposed to be in Mr. Henderson's possession and I had this other key for the privilege of going in there and turning the water into the large tank which was there for the purpose of fire, and I did this every two weeks."

There is also testimony to the effect that in July, or at least the summer of 1914, the lease, with the consent of the appellant, was modified so as to give him the use and occupancy of the annex instead of the main building, on the same terms as in the original agreement. Mr. Levy testified that there was no change in the terms of the original agreement, and Mr. Terry's testimony in reference to a conversation with Mr. Henderson in the summer of 1914 was:

"I went out to Mr. Henderson's house a couple of times. I couldn't find him, so I telephoned out and I met Mr. Henderson at the door, and I told Mr. Henderson in a quiet way, Mr. Levy had requested us to move the stuff, and Mr. Henderson said he would be down in the morning. He was to move his stuff and clean the place out. He moved it into the annex."

Mr. Henderson, the defendant, was asked if his equipment was moved at the time he received from Terry notice to move it out of the main building into the annex, and he replied that it was so moved under his supervision, and that he still had his merchandise there.

[1] It is certainly a fair inference from the foregoing that there was an agreement for the use and occupancy of the premises as claimed by plaintiff, and that under said contract defendant went into said possession. There is also evidence, which we need not set out, that defendant's occupancy of said annex was exclusive, he being in the sole occupancy of the same. The theory of appellant, it may be said, is that the transaction constituted a bailment, that he never took possession of the premises, but on the contrary delivered his goods to the respondent and that the latter from that time on held the goods in his possession. We need not enter upon a consideration of the principles involved in such bailment, for it is sufficient to say that conceding there is some evidence in support of such theory, it is clear that the findings of the court to the contrary were entirely warranted.

[2] It is equally plain that the evidence justified the finding that defendant was withholding the possession of the premises at the time of the commencement of the action. He still had the key to the annex of the building and his goods were even, to the time of the trial, within the premises. It is also undisputed that the rent was unpaid. The defendant himself so testified as to his possession and the nonpayment of the rent.

[3] It is objected by appellant that the three-day notice was ineffectual for the reason that more than one year had elapsed since the defendant had been in arrears in the payment of his rent. This position is taken by virtue of section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We deem it unnecessary to attempt elucidation of that provision, although we venture the suggestion it was not intended to protect a tenant from month to month in the indefinite withholding of the leased premises. The forbearance of the landlord for more than a year to press his claim for rent or to obtain possession would surely not defeat his action altogether in a proceeding of this kind, but might result in the loss of the rent accruing in the period antedating the 12 months. But this need not be decided as the notice can be entirely disregarded. This follows from the consideration that the relation of landlord and tenant was denied by defendant, and hence no such notice was required. The principle applies that was announced in Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 121. Therein it was said:

"When the time has come for the doing of an act which it is the duty of the defendant to do unconditionally, no demand other than the suit itself is necessary; nor is a demand before suit required where it appears that it would have been unavailing, and would not have changed the rights and relations of the parties, or where the answer denies the relation on which the action is founded, although a demand and refusal would otherwise be a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action."

Moreover, it has been expressly held in this state that notice is waived by a denial of the relation of landlord and tenant. By such denial the tenancy is, in fact, forfeited, and the tenant becomes a trespasser. Smith v. Ogg Shaw, 16 Cal. 88; Dodge v. Walley, 22 Cal. 225, 83 Am. Dec. 61; Bolton v. Landers (No. 1) 27 Cal. 104; Simpson v. Applegate, 75 Cal. 345, 17 Pac. 237.

We think the judgment is just and legal, and it is therefore affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 8, 1916.)

BROKERS ⇨94—SALE OF LAND—AUTHORITY—CONVEYANCE TO PURCHASER.

A written instrument, authorizing an agent to sell certain property at the price and on the terms mentioned and to receive any deposit made on the purchase price, the authority to be exclusive and to continue 30 days and until notice of revocation, authorizes the agent only to procure a purchaser to whom the owner may make the sale, not to enter into a contract for the sale, so that the purchaser is not entitled to specific performance of a contract of sale made by the agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 136; Dec. Dig. ⇨94.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Suit by W. B. Thompson against Mrs. Bessie L. Scholl for specific performance. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Kendrick & Ardis, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action plaintiff seeks to obtain a decree enforcing specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of real property. The defendant Bessie L. Scholl appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleged ownership by the defendant of the land described therein; that on August 26, 1912, she appointed one I. C. Butler as her agent to sell said property, the authorization being in writing as follows:

"Los Angeles, Calif., Aug. 26th, 1912.

"I hereby authorize I. C. Butler to sell for me, at the price and on the terms below mentioned, the following described property, and to receive and receipt for any deposit made on the purchase price thereof. This authority to continue 30 days and until notice of revocation. The commission to be above purchase price. This is an exclusive agency. Purchase price to be $10,000 cash or $6,000 cash and $4,500 secured by a mortgage on below described property, payable on or before three years from date at 7%. [Here follows description of property.]"

Signed by Mrs. Bessie L. Scholl.

It is further alleged that within 30 days thereafter, and prior to any revocation of the authority, Butler did, as agent of the defendant and on her behalf, sell to the plaintiff the described property for the sum of $10,000 to be paid in cash. Other allegations follow, showing what was done by and between Butler and Scholl, and other usual and necessary allegations of a complaint for specific performance. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and upon other grounds, and the demurrer was overruled. After answer, the case was tried, with resulting findings and judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

The complaint did not state a cause of action. The authority given by defendant to Butler did not authorize him to enter into a contract of sale on behalf of the defendant. The authorization extended no further than that the agent might find a purchaser to whom a sale might be made by the defendant at the price named. It was no more comprehensive or effective as empowering the agent to enter into a contract of sale than was found in the agent's appointment in Armstrong v. Lowe, 76 Cal. 616, 18 Pac. 758, where it was held that the agent was not authorized to execute a contract to convey. Other cases to like effect and enforcing the same rule are: Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 244, 6 Am. Rep. 617; Stemler v. Bass, 153 Cal. 791, 96 Pac. 809; Salter v. Ives, 171 Cal. 790, 155 Pac. 84; Church v. Collins, 18 Cal. App. 748, 124 Pac. 552. The authority given in the present case differed in essential particulars from the agency appointments discussed in Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 219, and Bacon v. Davis, 9 Cal. App. 83, 98 Pac. 71.

In view of the conclusions above stated, it is unnecessary to discuss other propositions relied upon by the appellant, which include, among other things, the contention that the agent did not enter into any sufficient written agreement with the plaintiff on behalf of the defendant, even if the agent had been authorized to make a contract of sale.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Ernest A. Victors against E. C. Kelsey, County Treasurer of the County of Plumas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. N. Peter and L. H. Hughes, both of Quincy, for appellant. F. L. Berry, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Mandate. Petitioner is a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, a physician and surgeon of many years' practice. The nature of the action sufficiently appears from the following findings:

"VI. That in the determination of the said cause 'People of the State of California v. Frank S. Cook,' and in preparing said cause for trial in behalf of the plaintiff therein, it became material and important to said plaintiff that certain experimental tests be made to determine whether or not certain specimens were or were not human blood stains; that the said district attorney of the said county of Plumas duly engaged and duly employed and subpoenaed the petitioner herein to make said experimental tests upon certain specimens then and there submitted to him prior to the trial of said action and for the purpose above stated, and in anticipation of calling the said petitioner as an expert witness at the trial of said cause to testify as to the results of said experimental tests; that the petitioner herein did make said experimental tests upon certain specimens duly submitted to him and in pursuance of his employment as aforesaid for the purpose of preparing as a witness in the trial of the said cause, and was duly and regularly subpoenaed therefor at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, to attend, and did attend, upon the trial of said cause in the city of Quincy, county of Plumas, on the 10th and 11th days of February, 1915, and was then and there duly called as a witness in said cause, and testified as an expert witness thereat for the purpose of testifying to the result of said experimental tests above referred to, and his said testimony then and there became a part of the record of the trial and proceedings of said action.

"VII. That thereafter, to wit, on February 11, 1915, the petitioner herein filed and presented in due form to the board of supervisors of Plumas county his bill, claim, and demand for payment of his services rendered as referred to above for the making of said experimental test recited therein and above referred to, and for testifying in relation as set forth and referred to above and for his necessary expenses incurred in attending said trial; said bill, demand, and claim were filed in due form with the board of supervisors of said Plumas county on the 11th day of February, 1915; that said board of supervisors received said claim and demand, fully and duly considered the same, and duly acted thereon and approved the same, and allowed the same, and ordered the said claim be duly paid to the petitioner herein, and that the auditor of said Plumas county issue his warrant forthwith for the payment of said claim from the general fund of the treasury of said county; that thereupon said bill and demand was duly audited by said auditor of said county of Plumas, was duly allowed, and issued his warrant upon the said treasurer of said county of Plumas on the 2d day of March, 1915, payable to the petitioner for the sum of $272.20 in payment of said claim, demand, and bill, and said warrant provided that said payment should be made from the general fund of the treasury of said county; and that said bill, claim, and demand was in the form and as set forth and alleged in the first amended petition herein and as set forth and appended thereto in a copy thereof and marked as Exhibit A and made a part of said first amended petition herein.

"VIII. That immediately subsequent to March 2, 1915, and prior to the filing of the petition herein, the petitioner duly presented said claim and demand as allowed and as set forth above, and in the form alleged herein, to the said treasurer of said Plumas county at the office of said treasurer during the business hours thereof, and that said treasurer refused to pay the same, and still continues to refuse to pay the same, and offered as a reason for said refusal that the item in said claim designated 'February 10-11, one and one-half days' service as witness, $150.00,' was and is illegal, and does not and did not constitute a legal charge against the said county of Plumas. * * *

"X. That there was and is at all of the times mentioned in said petition sufficient money in the hands of the county treasurer, county of Plumas, state of California, in the proper fund in the hand of said treasurer with which to pay said demand."

No objection is made to the form of the claim. The items were:

Date.	Items.	Amount.
Jan. 19	Examination and experimental tests of four specimens for the purpose of determining as to whether the same were human blood....	$100.00
Feb. 10-11	1½ days' service as witness $150.00 and expenses to Quincy, as a witness and return, $22.20	172.20
		$272.20"

Indorsed as follows:

"Expenditures authorized and approved by me,
"M. C. Kerr, Dist. Atty."

"Examined. A legal charge.

"M. C. Kerr, Dist. Atty.

"Allowed by board of supervisors March 2, 1915, for $272.20, payable out of the general fund.

"Countersigned: H. J. Treleaven,

"Chairman Board of Supervisors.

"Attest: F. R. Young,

"Clerk of Board of Supervisors.

"Warrant No. 577. Allowed March 2, 1915, for $272.20, payable out of the general fund.

"F. R. Young, County Auditor."

As conclusions of law, the court found that petitioner is entitled to a peremptory writ of mandate directed to E. C. Kelsey, treasurer of Plumas county, commanding him to pay said claim to petitioner with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from March 2, 1915, and judgment was accordingly entered. The appeal is from said judgment on the judgment roll alone.

The only item challenged for its illegality is the charge of $150 for per diem services as a witness. And appellant contends that petitioner was entitled only to the usual and ordinary witness' fees. Pol. Code, § 4300g; Pen. Code, § 1329.

It must be conceded that unless the district attorney was authorized by law to engage the services of petitioner in an expert capacity and agree to compensate him for his services as such, the contention of appellant must prevail. If, however, the district attorney had such authority, and no objection to the claim arising out of the exercise of that authority is made other than want of authority, it was the duty of the treasurer to pay the claim, and mandate will lie to compel its performance.

Section 4307 of the Political Code provides as follows:

"The following are county charges: * * * 2. The traveling and other personal expenses of the district attorney, incurred in criminal cases arising in the county * * * and all other expenses necessarily incurred by him in the detection of crime and prosecution of criminal cases, and in civil actions and proceedings and all other matters in which the county is interested." Same as section 228 of the County Government Act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 575).

The board of supervisors are authorized:

"To examine, settle and allow all accounts legally chargeable against the county, except salaries of officers, and such demands as are authorized by law to be allowed by some other person or tribunal, and order warrants to be drawn on the county treasurer therefor." Pol. Code, § 4041, subd. 12, same as subdivision 11, § 25, County Government Act of 1897, supra.

These sections as found in the County Government Act were before the Supreme Court in County of Yolo v. Joyce, 156 Cal. 429, 105 Pac. 125. In that case the claim was for the transcription of certain testimony to be used in the prosecution of a criminal case which the district attorney certified was necessary "in the prosecution of Dean McGrew and was necessary in the conduct of the trial of said McGrew." It was contended in that case that the transcription could only be ordered by the judge under section 274, Code of Civil Procedure. But the court held that the power was not vested exclusively in the trial court, and that the authority could be exercised by the district attorney under the act cited. The court said:

"The district attorney is an executive officer charged with the detection of crime and the prosecution of criminal cases. In furtherance of the proper discharge of his duties the Legislature has, under the section of the County Government Act, enlarged his power so as to permit him to incur expense necessary to enforce the criminal law. His authority to do so for that purpose is not made subject to the control or supervision of any court or judicial officer, but is a matter for the consideration of the board of supervisors alone to the extent of determining whether the expense was necessarily incurred so as to constitute a county charge. Of course, the right of a district attorney to incur expense is not an arbitrary one. All that the section of the County Government Act permits is to give to the district attorney, in the first instance, the discretion to determine whether it is necessary in the detection of crime, or the prosecution of a criminal case, to incur an expense chargeable against the county. Any such claim, however, must be presented to the board of supervisors for allowance, and that body reviews the action of the district attorney and determines whether the expense was a necessary one and acts accordingly. And as the board of supervisors is vested with the authority to determine the question whether the expense was necessary or not, and is the tribunal to which is committed under the County Government Act the jurisdiction to supervise the action of the district attorney in incurring the expense, its determination that it was a proper and necessary expense is conclusive." Colusa County v. De Jarnatt, 55 Cal. 375; McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 330, 33 Pac. 113; McBride v. Newlin, 129 Cal. 36, 61 Pac. 577; County of Santa Cruz v. McPherson, 133 Cal. 282, 65 Pac. 574; County of Alameda v. Evers, 136 Cal. 132, 68 Pac. 475.

We regard this decision as conclusive of the question here. The district attorney acted under express authority given him by the statute, and the board of supervisors determined that the expense was necessary. We cannot go behind the finding of the supervisors to inquire whether they decided rightly or wrongly. We have nothing before us but the record of official action and the findings of the court. The supervisors might well have concluded that the time of the expert given as a witness was as valuable to him as the time given to his examination of the specimens, and as to this latter item no objection is made. The examination of the specimens submitted to the expert and his conclusion upon such examination would have been of no assistance to the state in the trial of the case without the expert's presence at the trial.

It is suggested in appellant's reply brief that the complaint does not allege that an agreement was made by the district attorney to pay the petitioner for his services in attending as a witness at the trial. There is no direct averment of such agreement, but the claim shows on its face that the expenditure was "authorized and approved by" the district attorney. This was sufficient to meet objection for the claim was made part of the complaint.

We do not think that the general law fixing the fees of witnesses is a limitation upon the power given the district attorney and the board of supervisors by the statutes above referred to.

The judgment is affirmed.

MULLIA v. YE PLANRY BLDG. CO. et al.
(Civ. 1658.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 8, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR $\Leftarrow$ 770(1)—FAILURE TO APPEAR AND PRESENT BRIEF—DUTY OF APPELLATE COURT—STATUTE.

Where respondent makes no appearance at the hearing had on an appeal, and presents no brief in opposition to that filed by appellants, no duty devolves upon the Appellate Court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, to search the record for evidence to support the findings, the want of which is a ground on which appellants asked for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 8104, 3106, 3107; Dec. Dig. $\Leftarrow$ 770(1).]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT — 302(6) — SERVANT'S NEGLIGENCE — RESPONSIBILITY OF MASTER — STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 2338, declaring a principal responsible for his agent's negligence in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by the agent in and as a part of the transaction of the business, and for his willful omission to fulfill the obligations of the principal, a building company which furnished an automobile to its superintendent of construction for use as a business car in carrying out its instructions and superintending its work was not liable to the owner of the taxicab into which the superintendent negligently ran while driving a friend into the city from a country club after having driven earlier in the evening to a theater in the city and from thence to the club, since the negligence of a servant, where he is not acting within the scope of his employment, is not attributable to his master.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by George L. Mullia against the Ye Planry Building Company, a corporation, and Hugh Keenan. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Judgment reversed.

Rupert B. Turnbull, of Pasadena, for appellants. Campbell & Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been incurred by plaintiff as a result of defendants' negligence in operating an automobile which collided with one owned by the former. Defendants filed separate answers, denying the alleged acts of negligence, and, in addition to its answer, Ye Planry Building Company filed a cross-complaint, wherein it alleged that by reason of plaintiff's negligence it had incurred damages therein set forth, which allegations the court found to be untrue. The court found in favor of plaintiff upon the issues tendered in the complaint, upon which judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendants, adopting the alternative method in presenting the record, appeal.

[1] Respondent made no appearance at the hearing had upon the appeal; neither has he presented any brief in opposition to that filed by appellants. Under these circumstances, no duty devolves upon the court to search the record for evidence to support the findings (section 953c, Code Civ. Proc.; Thompson v. Hamilton Motor Co., 170 Cal. 737, 151 Pac. 122; Williams v. Tingey, 26 Cal. App. 574, 147 Pac. 584), the want of which is one of the grounds upon which appellants ask a reversal of the judgment.

It appears that defendant Keenan was employed as superintendent of construction by Ye Planry Building Company, which furnished him with an automobile, instructing him to use it as a business car to carry out the company's instructions in superintending its work, which car, when not so used, was to be kept in a garage at Keenan's residence. On the day in question, after the close of his work, Keenan drove the car to his home, and that evening with a friend, drove to a theater in Los Angeles, which they left at about 11:30 p. m., going to a place known as the Vernon Country Club, where they remained until about 1:30 a. m. the next day. On their return to the city and while proceeding along the right side of an unlighted street known as Santa Fé avenue, Keenan operating the car with the lamps burning, his car ran into a taxicab owned by plaintiff, which car at the time was not running, but standing near the curb line of the street fronting in the direction that Keenan was running his car and on the same side thereof. It had no rear light burning to indicate its presence, by reason of which fact Keenan did not see it until so near that he was unable to turn or stop his automobile so as to avoid the collision.

[2] The evidence to which our attention is directed clearly tends to show, not only that plaintiff was negligent in leaving his car standing in an unlighted path of automobile travel without a rear light or other warning to indicate its presence, but also tends to show that, had the rear light been burning the collision would not have occurred. Conceding, however, that the collision was due to Keenan's negligence, such negligence cannot be imputed to defendant Ye Planry Building Company, between which company and Keenan there existed the relation of master and servant. Section 2338, Civil Code, declares that:

"A principal is responsible to third persons for the negligence of his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business, and for his willful omission to fulfill the obligations of the principal."

In Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., 93 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 234, 15 L. R. A. 475, 27 Am. St. Rep. 223, it is said:

"The test of the master's responsibility for the act of his servant is, whether or not the act was done in the prosecution of the business that the servant was employed by the master to do, or in the execution of the authority given by the master, and for the purpose of performing what the master has directed."

By no stretch of the imagination can the case be brought within the rule thus laid down. The evidence conclusively shows that at the time of the accident, when Keenan was using the automobile, he was doing so contrary to the instructions of his employer and for his own private use and benefit and pleasure, not at the time being engaged in the course of his employment or in the performance of any duty imposed upon him by Ye Planry Building Company, his codefendant. The doctrine that the negligence of a servant, where not acting within the scope of his employment, is not attributable to his master, is fundamental and supported by authorities too numerous to call for mention. The case here presented is similar to that of Branch v. International & G. N. R. Co., 92 Tex. 288, 47 S. W. 974, 71 Am. St. Rep. 844, where it is said:

"If a railroad company intrusts the care of its hand car to its section foreman, it does not thereby become liable for an injury to a person at a public crossing, caused by a collision with such hand car through the negligence of such foreman while operating the car upon his private business, not in the line of the operation of the railroad, nor in the performance of a duty to the company, and in violation of its orders."

In Lotz v. Hanlon, 217 Pa. 339, 66 Atl. 525, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 202, 118 Am. St. Rep. 922, 10 Ann. Cas. 731, it is said (quoting from the syllabus):

"The owner of an automobile is not, where the person in charge was not using it in the course of his employment and in the owner's business, answerable for injuries inflicted by it on a person on the highway."

To the same effect is Stewart v. Baruch, 103 App. Div. 577, 93 N. Y. Supp. 161, and Reynolds v. Buck, 127 Iowa, 601, 103 N. W. 946.

Clearly the judgment must be and is reversed.

DEEBLE v. EXCHANGE NAT. BANK.
(Civ. 1804.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 8, 1916.)

ASSIGNMENTS — 73 — ORDER TO COLLECTING AGENT—LIABILITY.

Where plaintiff's debtor was the owner of certain land contracts, upon which amounts became due from the purchasers each month, and such contracts and the payments made thereunder were in the possession of defendant bank for the use of the debtor, and the debtor in writing directed the bank to set aside 20 per cent. of the money received from the first 40 acres and to pay plaintiff his share of one-third of such percentage until $1,460 should be paid, which direction the bank approved, the bank as the debtor's agent, while liable to plaintiff for his proportion of the money actually received, was not bound to retain the contracts in its possession until enough had been collected to satisfy plaintiff's claim, and where it delivered the contracts to its principal before collecting sufficient to satisfy plaintiff's claim was not further liable to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Thomas J. Deeble against the Exchange National Bank. Judgment of dismissal on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. D. Overfield, of Oatman, Ariz., and I. C. Louis and Alfred E. Dennis, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for respondent.

JAMES, J. A demurrer in which special and general grounds were assigned was sustained to the third amended complaint of the plaintiff without leave to amend, and judgment of dismissal followed, from which this appeal was taken. It is recited in that judgment that plaintiff's attorneys stated to the court that they did not desire to further amend, and no question is made as to that part of the order which denied leave to amend the pleading. The question argued is as to whether the complaint contained a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendant. It was first therein alleged that on the 1st day of July, 1913, one J. W. Young was the owner of certain written contracts for the sale of real property, upon which contracts amounts became due and payable each month from the purchasers; that the total amount of money due under such contracts was in excess of $80,000. The complaint then alleged:

"That said contracts and payments made under and pursuant thereto were at all the times aforesaid in the possession of and held by the defendant corporation to and for the use and order of said J. W. Young.

"That on or about July 1, 1913, said J. W. Young owed plaintiff the sum of fourteen hundred and sixty ($1,460) dollars for labor and services performed for said J. W. Young during a period of one year next preceding said date, at his special instance and request.

"That plaintiff and said J. W. Young on or about the said 1st day of July, 1913, entered into an agreement whereby said plaintiff accepted in full payment for said indebtedness of fourteen hundred and sixty ($1,460) dollars from said J. W. Young an order and assignment of certain moneys in the sum of fourteen hundred and sixty ($1,460) dollars due on contracts for the sale of lots in Industrial White City Tract, Long Beach, owned by said J. W. Young and held by defendant for collection for said J. W. Young.

"That on or about the 1st day of July, 1913, within the county of Los Angeles, state of California, the said J. W. Young, pursuant to said agreement with plaintiff set out in paragraph IV herein, executed to the defendant corporation a certain writing in words and figures hereinafter set forth. That the defendant corporation accepted the terms of the said writing and thereafter on or about the same day defendant delivered the same to the plaintiff and at the same time and place entered into an oral agreement with plaintiff that defendant, in consideration of plaintiff releasing said J. W. Young from payment of the said fourteen hundred and sixty ($1,460) dollars, would keep and retain the aforesaid contracts in its possession for a period of time sufficient to enable it to pay plaintiff the total sum of fourteen hundred and sixty ($1,460) dollars from moneys it might receive under and pursuant to the aforesaid contracts, and would pay the said sum of fourteen hundred and sixty ($1,460) dollars to plaintiff as so collected monthly. That the aforesaid writing is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Long Beach, Cal., July 1, 1913.

"Mr. C. H. Wiley, c/o Exchange National Bank, Long Beach, California—Dear Sir: I hereby instruct you to set aside twenty (20%) per cent. of all moneys received on the first forty (40) acres of Industrial White City from this date, and to pay to T. J. Deeble his share of one-third of said 20% set aside as above stated paid until the amount of fourteen hundred and sixty ($1,460) dollars shall have been paid. Said payments are to be made to the said Mr. Deebie every thirty (30) days.

"Yours truly, J. W. Young.
"Copy filed with us this 1st day of July, 1913, and approved by us. Chas. A. Wiley,
"W. J. Gardiner."

"That at all times herein mentioned the said Charles A. Wiley (mentioned as C. H. Wiley and Chas. A. Wiley in the aforesaid writing) and W. J. Gardiner, and each of them, were officers and agents of defendant corporation and were acting as officers and agents of defendant corporation at the time they and each of them placed their signatures on the aforesaid writing."

It was then alleged on information and belief that the defendant had received during the months of July and August, 1913, moneys due on said contracts amounting to the sum of $1,960, and that during said months "defendant corporation paid to plaintiff under and pursuant to the terms of the aforesaid writing and oral agreement with said plaintiff the sum of $130.05." It was further alleged on information and belief that on or about the 31st day of August, 1913, the defendant "disposed of, transferred and delivered to" J. W. Young all of the contracts, together with moneys theretofore paid to defendant and then in possession of the defendant; that from that time on the defendant was unable and refused to pay to the plaintiff any of the money becoming due under such contract. The prayer was for judgment in the sum of $1,329.95.

The contention of plaintiff is that upon the giving of the written direction signed by Young to the bank, the bank became obligated to retain in its possession the contracts until an amount sufficient had been collected to satisfy the debt due from Young to the plaintiff. The difficulty with this position is that the bank was in nowise a debtor to Young. It was acting merely as Young's agent, and the written direction given to it constituted no assignment of amounts due from the purchasers of the land. The effect of the arrangement, as we read the allegations of the complaint, was only that so long as the bank continued to act as collector for Young it would pay over to the plaintiff, out of the proceeds of the contracts in its hands, the amounts directed to be paid by Young. The contract holders, debtors of Young, would have been in no way estopped from paying the money due from them directly to their creditor. Under the facts shown there could have been no release of the principal debt worked by the giving of the order by Young directing his agent to pay to his creditor, the plaintiff, enough money, if such was collected, to satisfy the debt. No doubt, as to the money actually collected by the bank, plaintiff was given the right to claim such a proportion as it was agreed should be paid therefrom, and to that extent the order might perhaps be said to work an equitable assignment in favor of plaintiff of the right to take that money. The contracts, as it appears, were held by the bank without any interest given to the defendant therein and were held subject to the right of Young to retake them into his own possession upon demand. We think that the court's ruling on the demurrer was correct, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

The judgment is affirmed.

COLUSA & H. R. CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT
OF GLENN COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 1414.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Oct. 31, 1916. Modification of Opinion, Nov. 28, 1916.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN $\hookrightarrow$ 245—JUDGMENT—ENFORCEMENT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1251, providing that plaintiff in condemnation proceedings "must within 30 days after final judgment pay" the damages assessed, refers to the preliminary judgment entered in the superior court, and not to the final determination of the case upon appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 637; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 245.]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN $\hookrightarrow$ 249—EXECUTION—ISSUANCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1252, providing that execution may issue in condemnation cases as in civil cases if the damages be not paid or deposited within 30 days after final judgment, execution may ordinarily issue 30 days after judgment in the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 646; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 249.]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN $\hookrightarrow$ 258—JUDGMENT—EFFECT.

A judgment in condemnation proceedings where plaintiff may elect to abandon the proceedings within 30 days thereafter under Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, is not a money judgment within section 942, providing that appeals therefrom do not stay execution unless an undertaking be given, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 672; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 258.]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN $\hookrightarrow$ 258—APPEAL—STAY OF JUDGMENT.

An appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in condemnation proceedings taken within 30 days and while it could still elect to abandon the proceedings under Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, stays further proceedings on the judgment pending its final determination on appeal.

Petition for a supersedeas writ by the Colusa & Hamilton Railroad Company against the Superior Court of Glenn County, Wm. M. Finch, Judge thereof, and Charles H. Glenn. Writ denied. On rehearing, writ issued.

See, also, 25 Cal. App. 807, 144 Pac. 993.

Frank Freeman and George R. Freeman, both of Willow, for petitioner. Charles L. Donohoe and W. T. Belieu, both of Willow, for respondents. T. T. C. Gregory, of San Francisco, Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, Frank H. Short, of Fresno, and Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

BURNETT, J. In the above-entitled cause a rehearing was ordered by this court. The facts may be stated as follows: Petitioner is a railroad corporation, and as such it brought in the superior court of Glenn county a suit in eminent domain to secure a right of way over respondent's land. With the assistance of a jury, a trial was had on April 26, 1915, which resulted in a verdict awarding plaintiff (petitioner herein) the 12.18 acres sought to be condemned, fixing the value of said land at the sum of $2,801.40, and assessing the damages, by reason of severance to that portion of the land of defendant not taken, at the sum of $14,130, making a total of $16,931.40 damages. Thereafter, on June 2, 1915, the Honorable Wm. M. Finch, judge of said superior court, made and entered a judgment adopting said verdict and containing the usual formal recitals, and also certain stipulations of the parties as to how the road should be constructed and concluding as follows:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that upon the payment of the said sum of $2,801.40 and the said sum of $14,130, to wit, the sum of $16,931.40 assessed, the plaintiff shall be entitled to a final order of condemnation which shall describe the property condemned and the purpose of such condemnation, which property shall be as described in the complaint herein, and which purpose shall be as stated in the complaint herein, and that said railroad on said right of way shall be constructed in the manner prescribed in this decree, and the said property hereinafter described is hereby taken as a public use for the purposes described and set forth in the complaint, reference to which is hereby made, upon the said payment of the said total sum being made."

And then followed a description of the land condemned. On June 11th the plaintiff filed with the clerk of said court a notice of appeal, and on June 16th said plaintiff filed a proper undertaking for costs on appeal. The petition for supersedeas herein alleged:

"That notwithstanding the said perfecting of said appeal * * * defendant has applied to the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Glenn, and Hon. Wm. M. Finch, judge of said court, for an order directing and compelling the clerk of said superior court to issue an execution in said action on said judgment for the said sum of $16,931.40 and costs of suit, and the said superior court and the said judge thereof has entertained said motion and said application and threatens to grant the same and order said clerk of said court to issue said execution, to the end that it may be levied upon the property of your petitioner, the plaintiff in the above-entitled action, and the said defendant is not entitled to such order or such execution, and your petitioner is entitled to a writ of supersedeas, for the reason that the appeal taken from said judgment has suspended said judgment and the jurisdiction of said superior court; * * * and said judgment has by reason of said appeal been stayed until after the final determination of said appeal; * * * that your petitioner, the plaintiff in the above-entitled action, has not taken possession of the land involved in said action or any portion thereof, and has not made and is not now making any attempt to take possession of said land."

In the opinion hereinbefore filed, for reasons therein stated, an order was directed denying the writ. The decision was based largely upon our conception of what had been held by our Supreme Court in certain cases to which attention was directed. The fundamental principles leading to the conclusion which we reached are manifestly that the judgment rendered in the superior court is "a money judgment" in the sense of section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that such judgment is the "final judgment" contemplated by section 1251 of said Code.

We venture to consider again the various decisions cited and to endeavor to clear up what seems to be a somewhat complicated situation. In doing so, we shall not attempt to segregate these decisions as they bear more directly upon one or the other of these propositions, but it will be more convenient to view them rather indiscriminately as they relate to one or both of these principles.

At the outset, it may be said that of course there is no contention that the judgment has become final in the sense of a "final conclusion of the litigation." It is admitted by both parties that, as said in Gillmore v. American C. I. Co., 65 Cal. 63, 2 Pac. 882:

"Until litigation on the merits is ended, there is no finality to the judgment, in the sense of a final determination of the rights of the parties, although it may have become final for the purpose of an appeal from it."

It is, though, claimed by respondent that section 1251 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that "the plaintiff must within thirty days after final judgment pay the sum of money assessed," does not refer to the end of litigation, but to the judgment as entered or rendered in the superior court, and, of course, it is contended that this judgment is one directing "the payment of money" in the sense of section 942 of said Code. If it were res integra, I should be inclined to the conclusion that said expression used in said section 1251, "after final judgment" has the same signification as "after judgment becomes final." The peculiar form of expression, the definite article "the" being omitted before the word "final" is a significant circumstance in this connection. Respondent's interpretation would be more persuasive if the Legislature had provided that the money should be paid within thirty days "after the final judgment."

Again, the use of the term "final" is of great importance. Why should the word be used at all if it was intended to make the judgment of the superior court the initial point for computation of the time? Is it not fair to say that, if such had been the intention, it would have been provided that the money should be paid within 30 days "after judgment" or "after the judgment" or "after judgment in the superior court"? Any of these expressions or equivalent ones would have placed the matter beyond question, and it seems hardly credible that the deliberate use of the qualifying term "final" was not for the purpose of postponing the declared effect of the judgment until finality had attached to it.

Again, according to a cardinal rule of construction, the section should be considered, if possible, so as to harmonize with other provisions of the law. If a certain interpretation leads to unreasonable or absurd results, it should, of course, be regarded with suspicion and distrust. Section 1255a of said Code provides that:

"* * * Failure to comply with section 1251 of this Code shall constitute an implied abandonment of the proceeding. Upon such abandonment, express or implied, on motion of defendant, a judgment shall be entered dismissing the proceeding and awarding the defendant his costs and disbursements, which shall include all necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial and reasonable attorney fees."

If section 1251 requires plaintiff to pay the money within 30 days after judgment is entered upon the verdict, unless he does so, of course, he has failed to comply with said section, and the action may be dismissed, notwithstanding the Code gives a party 60 days within which to appeal. If he appealed the next day after the judgment or moved for a new trial, it would avail him nothing, since there could be no determination of either proceeding within said time. Even if a motion for a new trial were made, heard, and granted within said 30 days, it would not operate to vacate the judgment until the expiration of the 60 days allowed defendant to appeal from the order. Pierce v. Birkholm, 110 Cal. 669, 43 Pac. 205.

In the meantime, if he has not paid the money within said 30 days, there is an implied abandonment of the action, and the whole proceeding may be dismissed. The only alternative would seem to be the payment of the money, no matter how excessive the amount or erroneous the judgment. But if he pays the amount awarded, and it is accepted by the defendant, the judgment would be satisfied and the proceedings are at an end.

It may be that plaintiff could prevent this result by giving an undertaking to stay execution. Even this, however, is doubtful, as the statute unqualifiedly provides that the failure to pay the sum of money assessed within the time prescribed "shall constitute an implied abandonment of the proceeding." The giving of an undertaking is obviously not the payment of the money, and, although it would stay the execution of the money judgment, it would not render the failure to pay the money within the prescribed time any the less "an implied abandonment of the proceeding." At any rate it is manifest that the interpretation insisted upon by respondent might greatly hamper, if not defeat, the remedy by appeal or motion for a new trial.

Again in section 1254, where the Legislature had in mind the judgment as rendered in the superior court, it is interesting to notice the nomenclature used. Therein it is provided:

"At any time after trial and judgment entered or pending an appeal * * * to the Supreme Court, whenever * * * plaintiff shall have paid into court, for the defendant, the full amount of the judgment, and such further sum * * * the court * * * may * * * authorize the plaintiff * * * to take possession of and use the property during the pendency of and until the final conclusion of the litigation. * * * The defendant, who is entitled to the money paid into court upon any judgment, shall be entitled to * * * receive the same * * * upon obtaining an order therefor from the court. It shall be the duty of the court * * * upon application * * * by such defendant, to order and direct that the money so paid into court for him be delivered to him upon his filing a satisfaction of the judgment," etc.

It is the judgment or judgment rendered in the superior court, not final judgment, as in the previous quotation. Herein is also reference to an appeal and the final conclusion of the litigation. Such contingency, we may reasonably conclude, was also in the mind of the Legislature when it used the terminology "final judgment" in said section 1251, and that it contemplated "the final conclusion of the litigation." However, it has been decided otherwise by the Supreme Court, as we shall presently see, and we are bound by that decision.

Moreover, it is not proper to say that the judgment under consideration is one directing the payment of money. It is rather an adjudication that upon payment of a certain sum plaintiff may acquire the property. It did not vest the title to the money in defendant nor the real property in plaintiff. It is rather a conditional award to plaintiff upon the payment of a certain price for the land. It cannot be fairly construed as creating or evidencing a present and unqualified obligation to pay any sum of money. When said judgment was rendered, plaintiff had the right to decline to take the land at the price fixed. No doubt, the payment was purposely made contingent in view of the further proceedings that were open to the parties. Thus it is provided in section 1255a that:

"Plaintiff may abandon the proceedings at any time after filing the complaint and before the expiration of thirty days after final judgment, by serving on defendant and filing in court a written notice of such abandonment."

It is therefore plain that plaintiff was not "required to perform the directions of the judgment" at the time it was rendered. It could not, therefore, be enforced by a writ of execution, and it has been held that said section 942 applies only to a judgment which directs the payment of a specific amount of money and which can be directly enforced by a writ of execution. Estate of Schedel, 69 Cal. 241, 10 Pac. 334; Born v. Horstmann, 80 Cal. 452, 22 Pac. 169, 338, 5 L. R. R. 577; Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 31, 26 Pac. 617; McCallion v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan

Soc., 98 Cal. 442, 33 Pac. 329; Kreling v. Kreling, 116 Cal. 458, 48 Pac. 383; Owens v. Pomona Land Co., 124 Cal. 331, 57 Pac. 71; Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 132 Cal. 340, 64 Pac. 477.

We may now take up the leading authorities cited by petitioner and respondent as relating directly to the two propositions aforesaid.

In section 785 (3d Ed.) of Lewis on Eminent Domain it is said as to the character of the judgment:

"Some cases hold that it is proper to render a personal judgment upon the verdict of a jury in condemnation cases, and to award execution, the same as in common-law suits. If the statute is so far silent upon the subject as to leave the matter open for judicial construction, then the proper judgment to be entered will depend upon the following considerations: If the possession has already been taken of the property, either by consent or otherwise, or if the property has already been taken by virtue of an instrument of appropriation, as it may be in some states, before the compensation is paid, then a personal judgment with all its incidents may properly be entered. But, if the property has not been entered upon and cannot be until compensation is made, and the effect of the proceedings is to fix a price at which the petitioner can take the property if it elects so to do, then a personal judgment is improper and should not be entered."

And in section 955 the same learned author says:

"The weight of authority undoubtedly is that, in the absence of statutory provisions on the question, the effect of proceedings for condemnation is simply to fix the price at which the party condemning can take the property sought, and that even after confirmation or judgment the purpose of taking the property may be abandoned without incurring any liability to pay the damages awarded."

A large number of cases bearing upon the text is reviewed and an extended quotation made from the opinion of Chief Justice Beasley of the Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey in the case of O'Neill v. Freeholders of Hudson, 41 N. J. Law, 161, concluding with the declaration that:

"The legal effect of" the proceedings for condemnation "should be held that they compel the landowner to offer the public the required land at the ascertained price, and that when such price has been finally ascertained, the public has a reasonable time within which to make an election either to accept or reject the offer."

Judge Beasley's language applies to the situation here. Until 30 days after "final judgment" such election may be exercised, and until the expiration of said period the judgment does not operate as conclusive evidence of an unconditional or absolute obligation to pay the amount assessed. It would seem, therefore, that until said period had expired it could not be regarded as a "personal judgment" with all its incidents. It is at least clear that at the time said appeal was taken no execution could issue on said judgment, and it could be regarded as simply "fixing the price at which the condemning party could take the land."

We proceed to other citations. In Califor- nia Southern Railroad Company v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 67 Cal. 59, 7 Pac. 123, it is said:

"The judgment based in part on the assessment of damages, and adjudicating that the use is public, and the taking necessary, etc., is the 'final judgment' from which an appeal may be taken. The sum of money assessed must be paid within thirty days after 'final judgment.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1251. It may, as suggested, be an inaccurate use of terms to designate as final a judgment, which the court may set aside (with all the proceedings on which it is based) if the sum of money assessed is not paid. Code Civ. Proc. § 1252. And ordinarily a judgment is not final when the law contemplates further and subsequent proceedings in the same court to precede the absolute determination of the rights of the parties. But the question is not what is or is not a final judgment, within the appropriate meaning of the terms, but what is intended to be designated as the final judgment in the title treating of eminent domain."

In Lincoln Northern Railway Company v. Wiswell, 8 Cal. App. 578, 97 Pac. 536, the question was whether the plaintiff could, within 30 days after the entry of judgment on the verdict, abandon the route set out in the complaint, and in holding that it had such privilege, the court said:

"The final judgment mentioned in section 1251 as to payment of which reference is made in section 1252, is the judgment fixing the amount of damages, and is a final judgment in the proceeding and is an appealable judgment (California Southern R. R. Company v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 67 Cal. 59, 7 Pac. 123); the subsequent final order of condemnation (section 1253) being an order after final judgment."

The statutes of Idaho on eminent domain seem to be the same as ours, and in Big Lost River Irrigation Company v. Davidson, 21 Idaho, 160, 121 Pac. 88, it is said:

"The statute does not provide the form of judgment to be entered for the damages fixed and assessed by either the court, jury, or referee, under the provisions of section 5220; but under that section of the statute there could be but one form of judgment, and that would be a common, ordinary form of judgment for the recovery of money, the amount determined by the court, jury, or referee, and is the final judgment mentioned in section 5223 of the Revised Codes, and is a judgment in personam against the plaintiff, and upon which an execution may issue as provided by section 5224 of the statute. * * * After a final judgment has been entered the plaintiff has 30 days within which to pay the same, and if payment is not made then execution may issue, as in civil cases. Glenn County v. Johnston, 129 Cal. 404, 62 Pac. 66; County of Madera v. Raymond G. Co., 139 Cal. 128, 72 Pac. 915. * * * There would be no reason for the provisions found in section 5224, providing for an execution, if there was to be no judgment entered for the damages assessed, either by the court, jury, or referee. The very fact that an execution is authorized to be issued presupposes and presumes that an entry of a personal judgment for the damages assessed will be entered upon which such execution is to be issued."

In Union Ry. Co. v. Standard Wheel Company, 149 Fed. 698, 79 C. C. A. 386, the question involved was whether, after judgment assessing damages, plaintiff or petitioner was authorized to dismiss the proceedings as to a portion of the land sought to be condemned merely because in its opinion the damages assessed were too high, and in holding to the contrary the court said:

"When a party undertakes to subject another's property to his own use, he must be deemed to be willing and intend to pay a fair price for it, and that such fair price shall be fixed by the verdict of a jury to be approved by the court. Good faith requires that he shall not use the power of the court to vex the other party with successive experiments in the effort to get what he wants at his own price. And the public has an interest in the finality of the judgment. It will endure one litigation between parties, but not a repetition of it, to give one of them a chance to get a better result."

And as to the judgment fixing the price to be paid for the land, it was declared that the jury was to assess the damages and the court to render judgment, and "the defendant is bound by it, and so is the petitioner on principle as we think, but also by force of the statute." Drath v. B. & M. R. R. Co., 15 Neb. 367, 18 N. W. 717, and Neal v. Pittsburgh & Connellsville Railroad Co., 31 Pa. 19, declare a similar doctrine. However, it may be permissible to notice these cases a little more specifically.

In the first the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, one of the defendants, appealed from the preliminary order, and also from the final order of condemnation, and the real question presented, as far as the judgment is concerned, was whether the preliminary order or the final order of condemnation was the judgment from which the appeal should be taken. The Supreme Court held that the preliminary order of condemnation "is the 'final judgment' from which an appeal may be taken," and dismissed the appeal from the final order of condemnation because not taken within 60 days. The question of what is contemplated by "final judgment" as referred to in the first clause of said section 1251, or when the money must be paid, was not discussed in the briefs, and had no bearing upon the disputed points involved in the appeal.

In the Lincoln Northern Railway Company case, supra, the court on motion of plaintiff dismissed the proceeding within 30 days after the preliminary order of condemnation, and the defendant appealed from that order. It is apparent that under any possible construction of said section 1251 plaintiff was not required to deposit the money before the expiration of 30 days from the preliminary order of condemnation. Hence it could not be said that plaintiff was in default or that it did not have the right to abandon the proceedings, whether "after final judgment," as used in said section 1251, has the meaning attributed to it by petitioner or by respondent.

In the Idaho case:

"The only issue presented by the pleadings," as stated by the court, "was the value of the land to be taken. The right to take the land described in the complaint and the necessity for such taking is admitted by the answer, and the description of the land as alleged in the complaint is also admitted by the answer, and the allegation in the answer as to the necessity for taking 80 additional acres is not denied or put in issue, and therefore must have been admitted by the appellant, leaving for determination the value of the land described in the pleadings as the only issue to be determined in said cause."

The jury returned a verdict "for the defendants" and assessing "defendants' damages in the sum of $55,593." Whereupon the trial court, after reciting the formal and preliminary matters, entered the following judgment:

"Wherefore, by virtue of the law and by reason of the premises aforesaid, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said defendants have and recover from said plaintiff the sum of $55,593, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date hereof until paid," etc.

From that judgment an appeal was taken by plaintiff, and the language hereinbefore quoted appears to have been used with reference to the contention of appellant:

"That the court erred in entering an unconditional personal judgment against the appellant."

The question as to the import of the phrase "final judgment" or when the money had to be paid was not involved, but the court was called upon to determine the character of the judgment to be entered, and it did hold that "a judgment in personam" was authorized, treating the amount of the award as damages. As to the Idaho case, it may also be said that the judgment in form created a present obligation for the immediate payment of a definite sum of money upon which an execution could issue. It was not conditional and tentative as in the case at bar.

Of the California cases cited in the Idaho decision the first, Glenn County v. Johnston, 129 Cal. 404, 62 Pac. 66, involved a motion to dismiss a condemnation proceeding brought by Glenn county for the reason that more than 30 days had elapsed since the entry of the judgment and payment had not been made to defendants. The court below denied the motion, but the Supreme Court reversed it, thus virtually holding that "after final judgment" refers to the entry of the preliminary order of condemnation in the superior court. It may be admitted, as claimed by petitioner, that there was no discussion in the briefs as to what constituted the "final judgment" within the purview of said section; the principal subject of controversy being as to whether the sections in question applied to counties, but, as stated, the point was necessarily involved in the decision. County of Madera v. Raymond G. Co., 138 Cal. 244, 71 Pac. 112, did not call for the determination of the question considered herein, although said first clause of said section 1251 was quoted in the opinion in connection with the discussion of the form of judgment required, the conclusion being reached that, "even if the form of the judgment was not as it should be, defendant was not injured thereby and cannot complain, and plaintiff makes no objection to the form of its judgment."

In Bensley v. Mountain Lake Water Co., 13 Cal. 317, 73 Am. Dec. 575, it is said:

"The right to take on the terms adjudicated, which is a compulsory statutory sale, accrues from the legal proceedings, the petition, the report, the confirmation; then the price becomes fixed. But no right of entry, much less a title, accrues so far. The party condemning, the representative of a state, is then in a condition to be a purchaser; the other party is in a situation of a vendor making an agreement of sale on condition precedent, but retaining his title and possession until payment."

The theory thus presented harmonizes with petitioner's claim that the award constitutes the determination of the price that must be paid for the property, if it be taken, rather than a personal judgment for the direct payment of money.

In Lamb v. Schottler, 54 Cal. 319, it was held that:

"The right of the state to take private property for public use in no sense depends upon any contract between the owner and the public, nor is there any vested right to compensation, until the property is taken; nor is the government under any obligation to take the property, if the terms, when ascertained, are not satisfactory."

But the case most strongly relied upon by petitioner is Pool v. Butler, 141 Cal. 46, 74 Pac. 444. Therein the appeal was from an order dismissing the action made upon plaintiff's motion. The action was to condemn a strip of land for a ferry landing. There was a prior appeal from the judgment condemning the land for said purpose in which the judgment was affirmed. In that case the trial court gave judgment to the plaintiff condemning the land to the burden of the easement, and assessing the damages at $285. The defendants upon the trial reserved several exceptions and moved the court for a new trial upon all the issues, and the motion was denied. From this order also an appeal was taken. The plaintiff deposited with the clerk the said sum of $285, and costs, within 30 days after the entry of judgment. The defendants did not accept the money so deposited, but took and perfected their appeal, and did not abandon all defenses except for greater compensation, and could not demand or obtain the money until the appeal should be determined. It is to be observed that in that case the appeal was taken by the defendants, and under section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure they could not get the money without abandoning all the defenses they had to the action except as to the sufficiency of the damages awarded; and such defenses were not abandoned, but were pressed upon the motion for new trial and in the Supreme Court on appeal. As stated in the opinion:

"If they had applied to the court for an order directing the clerk to pay over the money, it could not have been granted pending the motion for a new trial, or at any time after the appeal was taken until the judgment was affirmed or the appeal dismissed."

It is thus to be seen how different that case is from this in the very important consideration that therein it was not doubted that the appeal operated to suspend or stay the judgment, and the persons who were entitled to the money refused to accept it. As the court said:

"The court had no power to make the requisite order for the payment of the money, the judgment having been suspended by the appeal, which was a refusal to accept the money, or to treat the judgment as a final determination of the rights of the parties, though it was in form final."

Judgment in the court below was entered June 21, 1898, and the appeal was decided December 3, 1901, and became final, according to the declaration of the Supreme Court, January 2, 1902, a period of 3½ years after judgment in the court below. Furthermore declared the court:

"Such delay may have furnished in this case, and might in many others, sufficient reasons for an abandonment of the enterprise. During all that time defendants were protesting against the judgment, and when plaintiffs finally relieved them from what they insisted was a wrong, oppressive, and erroneous judgment by dismissing the proceeding, now appeal from the order relieving them from it. The ultimate question, however, is whether the court erred in dismissing the action."

And it is in view of this situation that the court entered into a learned discussion of the nature of condemnation proceedings and came to the consideration of the question at what stage of such proceedings a plaintiff may abandon an enterprise or decline to take the property. It was clearly right to hold that during the pendency of the motion for a new trial and of the appeal by the defendants the plaintiffs had the right to abandon the enterprise and refuse to pay the compensation. But it was contended that, having deposited the money with the clerk of the court, they could not withdraw it, and that upon the affirmance of the appeal the defendants were entitled to receive it, and this is the vital point of the whole case. As to that contention, it was said:

"I think plaintiffs had the right to abandon at any time before the defendants were willing to receive it, or were in a position to demand it."

Thus far it would seem no one could disagree with the court. Furthermore said the court:

"The deposit under the circumstances was only a tender, and in such cases the money tendered does not vest in the person to whom it is tendered unless it is accepted. In this case the deposit was not accepted. The defendants persisted in their contention that the judgment was erroneous and invalid, and sought to have it reversed, and could hardly contend that the money or the right to it was vested in them so long as they contended that the plaintiffs had no right to the land."

No such contention is made by the defendant here. On the contrary, he was satisfied with the judgment and seeks to obtain the money. He claims also that said judgment was not stayed by the appeal for reasons already stated. The court proceeded:

"The vesting of the title to the deposit in the defendants is coincident with the vesting of the right to the land for the purposes for which it was sought, but pending the appeal the plaintiffs could assert no right to the land or its use under the judgment which had been stayed and suspended by the appeal, during which time the court was powerless to enforce it; nor could the defendants say: 'The right to the money is vested in us, but you shall not have the land.'"

The foregoing, as applied to the facts of that case, cannot be disputed, but here the defendant asserts the title to the money for the reason that the judgment has not been stayed, that he is willing for plaintiff to take the land at the assessed price and that, by virtue of the express provisions of the statute, he is authorized to reduce the money to his possession. The opinion proceeds:

"The title to the land does not vest in the plaintiffs until 'the final order of condemnation' is made by the court and a copy of the order filed in the office of the county recorder, 'and thereupon the property described therein shall vest in the plaintiff for the purposes therein specified.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1253."

After citing certain decisions, the court then comes to the consideration of the question as to when or within what time the plaintiff in condemnation proceedings may abandon them and decline to take the property, and it quotes said statement of Lewis as to the weight of authority, and Dillon on Municipal Corporations (4th Ed.) § 608, as follows:

"Under the language by which the power to open streets and to take private property for that purpose is usually conferred upon municipal corporations, they may at any time before taking possession of the property under completed proceedings, or before the final confirmation, recede from or discontinue the proceedings they have instituted. This may be done, unless it is otherwise provided by legislative enactment, at any time before vested rights in others have attached."

And quotation is made from the case of St. Louis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Teters, 68 Ill. 144, to the effect that:

"Where the company has not appropriated the land at the time of the trial, it would be improper to render a judgment for the recovery of the money, or to award execution, because it could not be known that the company will ever enter upon the land. It is, under the statute, the payment of the money found by the jury, and not the order of the court alone, that confers the right. Although the petition has been filed, the damages assessed, and the order of the court pronounced and entered, the money must be paid before the right to enter attaches, and until they pay the damages, they have the right to abandon the location of the route thus made, and adopt some other. Hence it is improper to render a judgment of recovery or award execution, unless the jury find, or it conclusively appears, from the record, that the company has entered and is in possession of the land sought to be condemned."

The court adds:

"Justice requires that, where possession has not been taken and the purpose for which condemnation was sought has been abandoned, the award of damages should not be enforced, especially where the defendants have prevented for an unreasonable time the accomplishment of the purpose."

If this doctrine is to be applied to all cases where the plaintiff has not entered into possession, of course, that would end the controversy, and the writ should issue. But the aforesaid statements must be accepted with some qualification. Even where the plaintiff has not entered into possession, he is limited in time within which he must exercise his option to abandon the proceedings. It must be exercised at least within 30 days after the judgment becomes final. Section 1255a, Code Civ. Proc. In construing the language of this interesting decision, we must not lose sight of its peculiar facts or else we may run counter to the plain provisions of the statute.

In Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 Pac. 9, 18, it was held that:

"Where a railroad company had obtained a judgment in eminent domain, and, in compliance with section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure, had made the full amount of the deposits thereby required to secure all demands, * * * the court had jurisdiction under that section to permit the railroad company to take possession of and use the property pending the litigation, and the appellate court will not issue a writ of supersedeas of such order for possession pending an appeal from the judgment."

It was in view of that situation that it was declared an appeal would not postpone plaintiff's right to take possession of the property. The decision was grounded upon the peculiar provisions of said section 1254, which would, manifestly, be rendered nugatory if its operation was suspended during an appeal. The case really has no application to the facts involved herein.

It is manifest that the different cases cited cover variant aspects of condemnation proceedings, and the peculiar situation of each must be regarded to avoid being misled into a general application of the statements made in the several opinions.

Here, we may reiterate, the situation is this: Plaintiff was dissatisfied with the award, has not taken possession, but has taken an appeal from the judgment. Said appeal has not been determined, and hence said judgment has not become final. No undertaking was given to stay execution; it being the claim of plaintiff that no such undertaking was required to effect said purpose. The defendant was willing to accept the award, took no appeal, but after the expiration of 30 days from the entry of the preliminary order of condemnation sought execution.

The determination of the controversy then depends upon the following considerations:

[1] 1. Does the phrase "after final judgment" in said section refer to the preliminary judgment of condemnation as entered in the superior court? That has been answered in the affirmative by the Supreme Court in Glenn County v. Johnston, supra, where the question was necessarily involved and we must follow it.

[2] 2. Was the judgment of such character that execution could issue upon it? This is plainly answered by said section 1252, providing that, if the money be not so paid or deposited (that is, paid or deposited within 30 days after the preliminary judgment of condemnation), execution may issue as in civil cases. This is a matter that the authorities hold can be regulated by statute. If execution can issue to enforce the payment of the amount of the award, the judgment must at that time be equivalent to a personal judgment for the payment of money. Prior, however, to this period, beginning 30 days "after final judgment," the judgment amounts to no more than an order fixing the price at which plaintiff may or may not take the property. It is, in effect, an adjudication of the amount which plaintiff should pay as a just compensation for it to be entitled to take the property for the purpose claimed, but if the status is not changed by some other proceeding, after the expiration of said 30 days, it becomes substantially a personal judgment for the direct payment of money.

[3, 4] 3. What, then, was the effect of said appeal? It stayed the operation of the judgment for the reason that the character of said judgment must be determined as of the time when the appeal was taken. It was not then a judgment requiring the payment by plaintiff of a specific amount of money, and which could then be enforced by a writ of execution. It was the adjudication of a conditional liability which might or might not become a fixed and absolute obligation. It was not, therefore, within the exception noted in said section 942.

The effect of the appeal being to remove the subject-matter of the order from the jurisdiction of the lower court, that court is without power to proceed further as to any matter embraced therein until the appeal is determined. Vosburg v. Vosburg, 137 Cal. 496, 70 Pac. 473. If the appeal had been taken after the expiration of said 30 days without a stay bond, a different conclusion would probably be required.

In conclusion it may be suggested that, even if the appeal bond did not operate to stay proceedings, it would be proper for this court to allow petitioner to file an effective bond for that purpose. The authority for such procedure is found in Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 494. Such request is made by petitioner if such action be deemed advisable by the court, but it is believed that the appeal has accomplished that result, and we think the writ should issue; and it is so ordered.

Modification of Opinion.

PER CURIAM. That portion of the opinion beginning with the word "again" in line 7 and concluding with the word "trial" in line 2 from the bottom of page 1013 of volume 161 of the Pacific Reporter, embracing the consideration of section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure, is hereby stricken out and withdrawn. The same order will be made as to the following sentence found on page 1018 of said opinion:

"If the appeal had been taken after the expiration of said 30 days without a stay bond, a different conclusion would probably be required."

Said portions of the opinion are not necessary to the decision, and the questions therein suggested had better be reserved until the exigency of the case demands their consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Clifton H. Connick, Judge.

Action by Gladys M. Sowash against T. H. Emerson, as administrator of the estate of Thomas R. Emerson, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank McGowan, of San Francisco, and Denver Sevier, of Eureka, for appellant. George H. Burchard, of Eureka, for respondent.

HART, J. Paragraph 2 of the complaint in this action alleges that the plaintiff, between the 1st day of October, 1913, and the 20th day of September, 1914, at the city of Arcata, county of Humboldt, rendered certain special services for the defendant's intestate, Thomas R. Emerson; that said special services consisted of taking care and personal charge of said Thomas R. Emerson during all of the period mentioned, "looking after him and giving him a home and personal attention all of said time, frequently when said Emerson was in a besotted and drunken condition, and helpless from overindulgence in intoxicating liquors." It is further alleged that during the said period of time the plaintiff contracted to give and did give to said Emerson room and board, "but that the aforesaid special services set forth and referred to in paragraph 2 hereof formed no part of said contract, but were of a special character, rendered necessary by the drunken, beastial, and often nauseating and repulsive physical and mental condition in which said Emerson was frequently during said period." It is then alleged:

"That said special services were rendered by said plaintiff at the request of said Thomas R. Emerson, and were reasonably worth the sum of $100 per month, and were rendered as aforesaid for a term of 11 months and 19 days, and were reasonably worth in all the sum of $1,157; that no part of the same has been paid."

It is further alleged that the said Emerson died on the — day of September, 1914, and that his son, T. H. Emerson, the defendant herein, was, after due proceedings, appointed by the superior court of Humboldt county administrator of the estate of the said Thomas R. Emerson, deceased.

The complaint states that the plaintiff and her husband entered into an agreement whereby it was agreed and understood between them that all money earned by her by reason of the special services rendered for and in behalf of said Thomas R. Emerson should be her separate property, and that said earnings are her separate property.

It is alleged that the plaintiff, within legal time after the publication of notice to the creditors of Thomas R. Emerson, deceased, presented to the administrator of the estate of the said deceased, in due form and verified, the claim upon which this action is based, and that the said administrator rejected the same. The prayer is for judgment for the sum of $1,157.

The answer specifically denies each and all the material allegations of the complaint, and, in addition thereto, sets up several distinct special defenses, the substance of which may thus be stated: (1) That the contract for the services mentioned, if any such contract was at all made, was not to be performed during the lifetime of the deceased, that the consideration for said services was that the decedent was to devise property to the plaintiff or make provision in his will for plaintiff, "and that such contract, if any was entered into as aforesaid, is invalid as neither said contract nor any note nor any memorandum thereof is in writing or subscribed by the decedent or his agent"; (2) that the services referred to in the complaint, if such services were rendered at all, were so rendered for and in expectation that the decedent would provide for the plaintiff through a devise or bequest or provision in the decedent's last will; (3) that prior to the commencement of this action and to the presentation of any claim herein "plaintiff received and accepted in full satisfaction, payment, and discharge of the cause of action set forth in the amended complaint and all claims that she had or claimed against this estate a carpet of the value of $125 or thereabouts."

The court found:

"That all the allegations of the plaintiff's first amended complaint herein are true, except that said services so rendered and performed as alleged were reasonably worth the sum of $494; that all the denials and allegations of the answer herein to the first amended complaint are untrue."

Conclusions of law were filed and judgment was rendered and entered accordingly. The defendant appeals from said judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

It appears from the evidence that the deceased, a resident for many years of the city of Arcata, in Humboldt county, and a man of considerable means, had become so addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors as that he practically developed into a dipsomaniac. He had a wife and a son (the defendant in this action), but it appears that at all the times referred to in the complaint they resided in one of the Eastern states, and that, so far as his family were concerned, he lived alone in the city of Arcata. For a long period of time prior to his death he was, it is made to appear, in an almost uninterrupted condition of inebriety, so much so, indeed, that Dr. McKinnon, one of the local physicians, was frequently called in to professionally attend and so relieve him of the effects of the drinking "sprees" which seem to have grown into a custom with him.

The deceased was a personal friend of the plaintiff and her husband, and there is evidence which shows that the plaintiff, against the advice of her husband, agreed to furnish the deceased with board and lodging at their home. The deceased, while in a very serious condition physically as the result of long continued intoxication, was taken to the home of the plaintiff on the 1st day of October, 1913, and remained there as boarder and lodger until the 20th day of September, 1914, or until a few days prior to the date of his death, which was on some day in the latter part of said month and year.

The testimony does not disclose the extent of the compensation which the deceased agreed to pay the plaintiff or that she received for the board and lodging so furnished. It is very clear from the testimony, however, that, after the deceased took up his residence with the plaintiff, he continued to indulge excessively in alcoholic liquors; that as a result thereof he was during much of the time sick and wholly unable to take care of himself, and consequently required attention and assistance, both during the day and the night time after his retirement; that medicine prescribed by his physician had to be given him, and his food often brought to his room; that on occasions when inordinately intoxicated he was exceeding filthy in his personal habits, often soiling his outer clothes with undigested matter ejected from his stomach, and his undergarments and person with excrements from his bowels and the contents of his bladder, he being unable to control himself in those particulars by reason of the helpless physical and mental condition in which his inebriety placed him. Thus he required almost constant care and attention, and the evidence shows that the plaintiff bestowed upon him during the period that he boarded and lodged at her home the attention required. She watched, cared for, fed, and administered to him medicine when he was confined to his bed. She often bathed him when in the filthy condition above described. She would, when he was absent from the house when he ought to be there, go out and search for, find and assist him to her home and his room. In brief, there is evidence to support the conclusion that she as solicitously and tenderly cared for him in his helplessness as if he were her father or a son or a brother.

The trial court was clearly warranted by the evidence in finding the facts as above recited notwithstanding that there was an adversary showing from which, it may be conceded, the court might have found the claim of the plaintiff to be spurious.

The position of the appellant is, however, that while the complaint declares upon an express contract, no evidence was presented showing an express contract for the performance of the services described in the complaint, nor is there any evidence showing whether the claim as presented to the administrator was based upon or the outgrowth of an express or an implied contract. The argument from this postulate is that, since the plaintiff was under employment of the deceased to perform the service of providing him with board and lodging, "the plaintiff must fail, because the rule is inexorable that plaintiff must show an express contract to pay for these 'special services'" claimed.

It is very clear that the plaintiff counts upon an implied, and not upon an express, contract. It is true, as must always be so in a case of an implied contract for personal services, that the complaint must show, as the complaint in this case states, that there was an express agreement for the hiring, but such an averment of itself does not disclose an express as contradistinguished from an implied contract. If the pleaded facts show, as should always be shown or pleaded to avoid the implication that the services were to be performed gratuitously, that there was an agreement by one of the parties to employ the personal services of another, and it is further shown that there was no agreement as to the compensation to be paid for such services, then an implied, and not an express, contract is disclosed, and to recover thereon the plaintiff must count upon a quantum meruit, or sue for the reasonable value of his services, or, as the words describing that common count plainly signify, for whatever his services may reasonably deserve or merit.

[1] The rule sought to be invoked and applied here by the defendant, however, does not, in a case where an employé under a contract to perform certain stipulated services for a fixed compensation sues to recover for special services rendered to his master of a dissimilar nature to those for the performance of which he was originally employed, require such employé to show that such extra services were rendered in pursuance of an express contract, whereby the master agreed or promised to pay extra compensation therefor, to entitle the servant to recover such extra compensation. If he can show that dissimilar special services were by him performed and that the master accepted the same and the benefits thereof, then the law will imply a promise to pay therefor, and thus there is shown a contract upon which he is entitled to recover. Hay v. Petersen, 6 Wyo. 419, 45 Pac. 1073, 34 L. R. A. 581.

[2] The general rule is that an agreement to pay for services rendered and accepted is presumed unless the parties are members of the same family or near relatives. Lawson on Evidence, § 77.

[3] In this case the burden of proving that the services were rendered voluntarily, or that they were within the scope of the original employment, rested upon the defendant. Schroeder v. Schroeder, 119 Iowa, 67, 93 N. W. 78.

One of the cases relied upon by the defendant is Cany v. Halleck, 9 Cal. 198, 203, wherein the Supreme Court quoted approvingly and applied the following rule, as stated in Smith's Master and Servant, pp. 101, 102:

"Upon similar principles it is equally clear that, where a stipulated remuneration has been agreed upon, the servant has no claim to additional remuneration on the mere ground of his performance of additional services. Unless he can prove some contract, either express or implied, on the part of his master to pay him an increased salary for his additional services, he can recover no remuneration for them."

Again the defendant cites the cases of Ins. Co. v. Goodrich, 74 Mo. App. 355, 362, and Pew v. Bank, 130 Mass. 391, wherein the rule is laid down that:

"The presumption of the law is that all services rendered by an employé during the period for which he is employed, of a similar nature to those of his regular duties, are paid for by his salary, and to overcome this presumption he must show an express agreement for * * * compensation."

[4] We think the true rule may be stated, as we have above indicated it to be, as follows: That, where the extra services are of the same kind as those which the original agreement requires the servant to render, then the latter, to entitle him to recover for such extra services, must show an express contract or agreement or promise on the part of the master to pay him extra compensation therefor; but that, where the extra or special services are dissimilar to or wholly different in kind from the services to be performed under the original contract of employment, then proof of the fact of the performance of such extra services, together with proof of the acceptance thereof by the master, will raise an implied promise on the part of the master to pay the reasonable value of such extra or special services.

[5] The testimony in this case is of a somewhat desultory character, but in a case like this it is by no means surprising that it should be so. The plaintiff herself was, most naturally, more familiar with the facts, circumstances, and terms of her employment and the extent of her services to the deceased as a nurse than any other person; but, under the law—a most salutary rule, indeed—she was precluded from giving any testimony in the case bearing upon the circumstances and terms of her employment to render the special services for which she here seeks the recovery of reasonable remuneration. Section 1880, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc. However, as before declared, the evidence was such as to warrant the trial court in finding, as it did find, that the original agreement between the plaintiff and the deceased was that she was to provide the latter with board and lodging, and nothing more. And there is sufficient support for the finding that the plaintiff rendered to the deceased services as a nurse, and, while there is no direct proof that the deceased expressly requested the plaintiff to perform for him those services, or that he promised to pay her additional compensation for the same, yet it is very clear that she did render those services, and that he accepted them and received the benefits flowing therefrom.

[6] That the services the plaintiff was to render the deceased under the original engagement, or the contract as it was originally made, are not similar in nature or kind to the duties required of a nurse, seems to us to be a very obvious proposition. Abstractly speaking, the distinction between the two kinds of services is the same as the distinction between a house or a hotel maintained exclusively for the purpose of furnishing board and lodging to the public and a hospital, whose sole and exclusive function is to care for and minister to the sick or physically infirm. While board and lodging are ordinarily furnished patients in a hospital maintained for the care of the physically sick, still they are but essential incidents to the paramount or main purpose or object or business of such an institution, viz. to nurse the physically sick. Indeed, nursing is a distinct scientific profession, the right and the ability to practice which are justly recognized as proper subjects of regulation by the state. It is a profession whose peculiar duties are more nearly allied or analogous to those of the profession of medicine than to those of the business of furnishing board and lodging for pay, and yet is wholly independent of and materially different in nature from the medical profession. The courts have therefore well said, when occasion has called for a judicial expression upon the subject, that the mere agreement to furnish board and lodging does not necessarily or by logic of the fact include nursing, and that, unless the contract to furnish the former expressly includes the latter, or is expressed in language from which no other just conclusion may be drawn, a promise to pay extra compensation for the services of a nurse in such a case as this will be implied. See Pfeiffer v. Michelsen, 112 Mich. 614, 71 N. W. 156; Cates v. Gilmer (Tenn. Ch. App.) 48 S. W. 280.

[7] The defendant introduced no proof in support of the several special defenses set up in the answer. He did, however, introduce some evidence tending to overthrow the presumption, arising from the fact of the rendition of services as a nurse and the fact of the acceptance thereof by the deceased, of a promise on the latter's part to pay the plaintiff increased compensation for such additional services, but the trial court, to which the determination of the questions of fact was submitted, was not satisfied with the showing so made; and, since it was for the trial court in this case to say, from all the circumstances brought to its attention through the evidence, viewed by the light of the rules of law above stated, whether there was or was not an agreement between the parties that the plaintiff should receive extra or additional compensation for the extra or special services described in her complaint, this court is concluded by the finding of said court upon that proposition, there being, as stated, sufficient evidence to support said finding.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Henry Miller and another against Robert Logan and another. From an order granting a motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

L. G. Harrier, of Vallejo, and Philip McEnerney, of Fairfield, for appellants. P. B. Lynch, of Vallejo, and W. H. Morrissey, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order granting the motion for a new trial. Appellant states that the appeal is taken—

“with full knowledge of the great discretion lodged in a trial judge in the matter of granting a new trial when the evidence placed before the jury is conflicting. But we desire to protest strongly against what seems to us to be the arbitrary undoing of all the labor and expense which necessarily goes into a trial by jury, in a case where no injustice was done, in which a fair and proper verdict was rendered by a jury selected and approved by both sides, in which the judge granting the new trial was not the judge who heard the testimony, and in which the testimony was not in actual conflict.”

We can readily understand the disappointment of appellants' counsel, we have no doubt of their sincerity of purpose, and we have been deeply impressed by their able and earnest advocacy, but in view of the revelations of the record, and under the well-established rules of judicial procedure in this state, there remains nothing for us to do but to affirm the order.

[1] Before quoting from the record and the authorities, we may notice briefly this statement of appellant and the admitted facts in the case. In the first place, after reading the evidence we cannot say that the action of the judge in granting a new trial was arbitrary. To the contrary, we are bound to presume that he acted from the highest motives, believing that justice and equity required a new trial. We must assume that his attitude was that characterized by Burke as “the cold neutrality of an impartial judge,” and that his only desire was that no wrong should be done to either litigant. Again, that “a fair and proper verdict was rendered in a case where no injustice was done” is, no doubt the belief of appellant, but upon the motion for a new trial that very question was presented to the judge for determination and his judgment to the contrary must be accepted here if there be substantial support for it. It may be added that on motion for a new trial the same rule applies to another judge as to the one who tried the cause, and an examination of the record convinces us that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence in a material matter.

Now a word as to the nature of the issues. The action was for services in remodeling and repairing a one-story frame building occupied as a saloon. In the first count of their complaint appellants alleged that the agreed price was to be $3,164.33, and claimed a balance due of $1,064.33. The second count was upon quantum meruit for the same amount. Defendants denied that they agreed to pay said sum of $3,164.33, or any greater sum than $2,100, denied that the reasonable value of said services was any greater than said latter sum, and alleged that plaintiffs agreed to do all the work for a sum not to exceed $2,100 "and for as much less as they could." It was admitted that defendants had paid the said sum of $2,100, and it cannot be denied that said allegation of a specific contract to do the work for said sum presented a defense to the action. If there had been a finding that such was the agreement, it would require a judgment in favor of defendants. The jury, though, rejected the theory thus set up in the answer, and brought in a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $994.63.

The important question, then, is: Was there any substantial evidence to support defendants' contention? Of this, there can be no doubt when attention is directed to the following testimony of Robert Logan:

"In December, 1912, I had a conversation with Mr. Miller and Mr. Cassidy relative to remodeling the Acme Saloon, formerly called the Waldorf. I asked Mr. Miller and Mr. Cassidy to look the building over. I submitted a rough plan to them that I had drawn myself, and asked them to look it over and give me a figure on it. I think they must have, and afterwards, Mr. Miller said: 'We will do the work for $1,700, what you have laid out.' I said: 'If you will do the work for that, it is agreeable to me.' * * * I gave Miller & Cassidy the work to do for $1,700. Miller told me he would do the work for $1,700 and we agreed upon that price. We agreed upon the kind of work and what was to be done. The building was finally built along the lines we agreed upon, with the exception of cutting out what we call the reading room; it was a partition in the east end of the saloon that was cut out entirely. The pebble-dash front was not in the original. Mr. Cassidy made the suggestion to me that we put on a pebble-dash front, and I rather liked the idea myself, but I told him that I didn't think we could do it at that time, and, if possible, we might do it later on, and he explained to me that we would have to have it painted anyhow, and I better have it done now while the work was new. So I asked him how much more it would cost to complete the building with a pebble dash. He said it would cost $2,100, and he said: 'Should it cost less than $2,100, you will receive the benefit of it.' For all the work done in the building, we agreed upon the price of $2,100, including the pebble-dash front. There was nothing done in the building that was not included in the $2,100; the fixed sum agreed upon was $2,100. The change from $1,700 to $2,100 was talked over and agreed upon, and after that was agreed on, we did not order any additions; some were struck out. * * * I told him what I wanted, and submitted this plan to him with measurements. I told him how I wanted it about the marble baseboard and paneled walls and so forth. It was understood at the time, as near as I can remember, that we wanted everything that is now in the building."

He was subjected to a rigid cross-examination, but he held to the theory that the entire work was to be done for $2,100, with possibly the exception of some trivial alterations or additions. The testimony of his partner was to the same effect. The credibility of these witnesses is vigorously questioned by appellant. We can see in their statements, however, nothing inherently improbable. Such contracts are not unusual, nor does it appear necessarily unreasonable that plaintiffs should have agreed to do the work for the sum mentioned. At least, it involves a question of candid disputation. Much might be said on both sides of the proposition, and for such reason we cannot disturb the order granting the motion for a new trial.

[2, 3] As to the principle governing the case, we may refer to the latest expression of the Supreme Court in Tweeddale v. Barnett, 156 Pac. 483, wherein it is said through Mr. Justice Melvin:

"It is a rule, so well understood that discussion of it seems almost superfluous, that the discretion of the court granting such a motion is very broad, and the order will be upheld by the court to which an appeal is taken if it may be supported upon any of the assigned grounds. Morgan v. Robinson, 157 Cal. 348-351 [107 Pac. 695]; Wurzbarger v. Nellis, 165 Cal. 48-50 [130 Pac. 1052]; Cahill v. Stone, 167 Cal. 126-129 [138 Pac. 712]. We may not disturb such an order where there was at the trial a conflict of evidence upon material issues, unless we can say that a verdict in favor of the moving party would not have found sufficient legal support in such evidence. Empire Investment Co. v. Mort, 169 Cal. 732 [147 Pac. 960]."

[4] That the same rule applies where another judge hears the motion for a new trial is held in Jones v. Sanders, 103 Cal. 678, 37 Pac. 649, wherein it is said:

"It is claimed for appellant that as Judge Hoge presided at the trial his findings upon all the questions of fact should be treated as conclusive. We do not understand this to be the rule applicable to a case like this. It is true that this court will not review findings when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, but it has been repeatedly held that upon motion for a new trial it is the duty of the trial court to examine the evidence, even though it be conflicting, and if dissatisfied with the conclusions reached, to grant a new trial. And the rule is the same whether the motion is heard by the judge who tried the case or by some other judge, whose only knowledge of the facts is obtained from the record. Macy v. Davila, 48 Cal. 646; Bauder v. Tyrrel, 59 Cal. 99; Blum v. Sunol, 63 Cal. 341; Wilson v. California C. R. R. Co., 94 Cal. 166 [29 Pac. 861, 17 L. R. A. 685]."

Respondents claim that the order can be justified on other grounds, but we deem it unnecessary to consider them. These involve the contention that certain errors were committed by the trial judge in his rulings upon the admissibility of evidence. They seem, however, comparatively unimportant, and the questions will probably not arise in the new trial. So we forego any specific notice of them.

We think the order should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. S. Wells, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Francis Cutting, deceased. Petition by Alice M. Cutting for a family allowance. Application denied, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 155 Pac. 1002.

A. J. Treat and Paul A. Myers, both of San Francisco (Wm. B. Kollmyer, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Allen L. Chickering and William H. Gorrill, both of San Francisco (Warren Gregory and Winfield Dorn, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

MELVIN, J. On April 19, 1913, Francis Cutting and Alice Duren entered into a contract with reference to their contemplated marriage. Mr. Cutting was 79 years of age at the time, and Miss Duren was more than 45 years old. He was a widower possessed of a fortune worth approximately $500,000, and was the father of two living adult children. On May 10, 1913, Miss Duren and Mr. Cutting were married. On July 10, 1913, he executed a codicil to his will, which had been made prior to his marriage, said codicil operating as a republication of the testament. Estate of Cutting, 155 Pac. 1002. Mr. Cutting died on the 1st day of October, 1913, and his estate is in the course of administration. On January 16, 1915, more than a year after her husband's death, Mrs. Cutting filed a petition for a family allowance of $1,000 a month. This application was resisted by Mr. Cutting's two children and by the Pacific Unitarian School for the Ministry, one of the legatees mentioned in the will, and after a hearing it was denied. From the order refusing a family allowance, Alice M. Cutting, widow of Francis Cutting, prosecutes this appeal. It was admitted by Mrs. Alice M. Cutting at the hearing of her petition that she had received from the executors of the will $250 each month since the death of her husband.

The sole question presented on this appeal is whether or not the monthly payments provided by the contract made before marriage preclude the widow from demanding a family allowance. That contract, which was in writing, was in the following words and figures:

"Antenuptial Agreement between Francis Cutting and Alice M. Duren.

"The undersigned, in contemplation of marriage, hereby agree that, in consideration thereof, Francis Cutting will give Alice M. Duren proper support during their married life, and should said Francis Cutting die before said Alice M. Duren after their marriage he will cause her to be paid two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars per month during her life, which said Alice M. Duren agrees shall be in lieu of any and all claims against the property or estate of said Francis Cutting, whether community or any other property or interest of said Francis Cutting, and will marry said Cutting at any convenient time requested by said Cutting, who also agrees to pay said Alice M. Duren one hundred dollars per month during the time that may elapse prior to marriage, and continue during her life should he die before their marriage.

"In witness whereof we have set our hands this nineteenth day of April, 1913.

"[Signed] Alice M. Duren.

"Francis Cutting."

The codicil was as follows:

"Oakland, California, July 18, 1913.

"I, Francis Cutting, hereby affirming my will bearing date October 22, 1912, except as herein modified, do hereby declare the following as and to be a codicil to my said will being my last will and testament: After paragraphs numbered 2, 3, 4 having reference to devises benefiting my daughter, also Miss Patterson also my son Frederick P. Cutting, I direct that my executors provide from the remainder of my estate an income for my wife Alice M. Cutting and pay the same to her monthly of two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars per month as long as she lives, in accordance with an antenuptial agreement with my said wife and myself of April, 1913.

"[Signed] Francis Cutting."

At the outset respondents concede that a widow's claim for family allowance is favored by the law, that the law leans strongly towards the wife during probate, and that the independent means of the widow have no material bearing upon her right to a family allowance. Their contention which prevailed in the probate court was that by the terms of the contract, read in view of all of the circumstances surrounding its execution, the appellant surrendered all right to a family allowance, and that such was the distinct understanding of both parties to the agreement.

[1] The same problem is here presented which was before the court on the appeal granting a family allowance in Estate of Whitney, 171 Cal. 750, 154 Pac. 855. On that appeal the wife's waiver of her right to dispose of any of the community property and her election to take under the will of her husband were held not to be equivalent to a surrender of her privilege to apply for and to receive a family allowance, although the general words of waiver, taken by themselves, would have been sufficient to cut her off from a family allowance, but in getting at the true meaning of the will and the accompanying document executed by the wife of the testator the court considered the circumstances that Mr. and Mrs. Whitney were negotiating with reference to her community rights and did not have in mind her possible application for an allowance to be paid to her during probate. The pertinent words of Mrs. Whitney's waiver were as follows:

"I hereby elect to accept and acquiesce in the provisions of the said will, and hereby waive all claims to my share of any community property, and any and all other claims that I may have upon any of the estate disposed of by the said will."

Commenting upon this language, Mr. Justice Sloss, who wrote the opinion, said:

"It may readily be conceded that the general language 'any and all other claims,' etc., would be sufficient, standing by themselves, to cover a claim for family allowance. But the paper is to be read as a whole, in the light of surrounding circumstances and of the other elements of the transaction of which it formed a part."

Applying this rule, we have no doubt that, in view of all the circumstances, and in view, too, of the rules favoring widows in the construction of all such instruments, the appellant waived all right to the award of a family allowance. In the contract here under review the parties thereto were not considering a wife's waiver of a community interest. They had in mind, as indicated by the words of the agreement, the proper support during their married life of Mrs. Cutting and a continuance of that support after Mr. Cutting's death, "in lieu of any and all claims against the property or estate of said Francis Cutting." It is learnedly argued on behalf of appellant that the word "claims," as used in this instrument, must be taken in its technical sense and understood to mean those demands which might have been enforced against the deceased in his lifetime, and which must be presented in due form of law to the executor or administrator of his estate. Of course, a family allowance is not such a claim, but is an expense of administration. But appellant did not agree merely to forego any claims she might have against the estate of her husband. She promised to forego also any claims against his property save and except the monthly allowance of $250. A "claim" against property has no narrow technical meaning like that for which appellant contends. "Claim," as used in connection with property, means a "demand," and nothing more. A demand for a family allowance is a claim against property, and the use of the two words in the instrument indicates that the contracting parties wished to avoid all ambiguity which possibly might have arisen if the one word "estate" were used without the associated word "property."

In this state the courts early recognized the distinction between the technical use of the word "claim" and its broader significance. Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 32, 81 Am. Dec. 140; Estate of McCausland, 52 Cal. 568-577. In the opinion in the latter case, while recognizing the fact that "claim," as used in probate acts, has reference to debts or demands against a decedent which might have been enforced during his lifetime, the court said:

"This definition, which, in our opinion, is correct, will not include a claim for a family allowance."

It will thus be seen that the word is used by the courts in both its technical and its usual sense, and that the latter is intended when claims against property are involved.

[2] It makes no difference whether the agreement is to be considered as an attempted marriage settlement or not. By filing her claim against the estate based upon it appellant has admitted its binding force as a contract between the parties. No question of the rights of creditors is here involved, and it makes no difference that there was no recordation of the instrument, even if it be labeled a "marriage settlement." Section 178 et seq. of the Civil Code relate merely to the rights of creditors and of others who might have interest in real property involved in any such settlement. By section 180, Civil Code, the rule is announced that the recording or failure to record such a document has like effect as the recording or nonrecording of a grant of real property. Such a grant is of full force as between the parties, regardless of the question of recordation. Devlin on Deeds, § 465. There is no force therefore in appellant's contention that the agreement loses anything of its potentiality because it is an unrecorded marriage settlement.

The appellant insists that, since the allowance provided by the contract was payable out of the assets of the estate, the testator must have contemplated a payment of a suitable sum to her by way of family allowance pending administration, because otherwise she might be left without means of support during that period. But the codicil directs monthly payments by the executors, not the equivalent of $250 per month to be paid on distribution. The executors were required to pay and they did pay these monthly sums, which were correctly interpreted as claims against the estate. The very machinery of the contract and the codicil shows that it was the intention of the testator and of his wife that she should receive her stipulated monthly allowance, should have it paid to her monthly during his life and after his death, and that it should be in lieu of family allowance as well as of all other possible demands against his property, whether in his lifetime or afterwards.

It will be of little interest or value to analyze the authorities cited by learned counsel for petitioner and for respondents touching other contracts somewhat similar to this one which have been considered by this and other courts. Each agreement must be interpreted with reference to its own peculiar language, read in the light of the surrounding circumstances. This contract we have attempted so to interpret.

The order from which the appeal of Alice M. Cutting is taken is affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 7818.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1916.)

1. COMMERCE — 27 — RAILROADS — FEDERAL EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT — ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The true test of employment in interstate commerce so as to be within the provisions of federal Employers' Liability Act April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 8657-8665), is whether the employé at the time of the injury was engaged in interstate transportation or in work so closely related to it as to be practically a part of it.

2. COMMERCE — 27 — RAILROADS — "ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE" — INSTRUMENTALITIES.

A railroad track used indiscriminately by a carrier in both its interstate and intrastate commerce is an instrumentality of interstate commerce, and, notwithstanding its double use, those engaged in its repair or in keeping it in suitable condition for use are engaged in interstate commerce.

3. COMMERCE — 27 — RAILROADS — FEDERAL EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT — "ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE" — GATEMAN.

A gateman in the employ of the railroad using its tracks in the state indiscriminately for both interstate and intrastate commerce, at a point where the tracks crossed a public street, whose employment was considered in building up the main schedules in respect to speed, killed by an intrastate train when he started across the track to back away a horse and wagon, which had come within the range of one of the gates so that he could not lower it, was "engaged in interstate commerce," so that the state Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to make any award.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Proceeding by the Southern Pacific Company to review an award against it made by the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California to Jessie Leslie Rolfe, widow of Thomas C. Rolfe, deceased, on account of his death from accident arising out of and happening in the course of his employment by petitioner. Award annulled.

Henley C. Booth and A. L. Clark, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding to review an award against petitioner made by the Industrial Accident Commission to Jessie Leslie Rolfe, widow of Thomas C. Rolfe, on account of the death of the latter by reason of accident arising out of and happening in the course of his employment by petitioner. The only question is whether Rolfe was employed in interstate commerce at the time of the accident. If he was, concededly the commission was without jurisdiction to make any award; the liability of the petitioner in such case being measured entirely by the provisions of an act of Congress of April 22, 1908, relative to the liability of common carriers by railroads to their employés in certain cases. If he was not employed in interstate commerce at the time of the accident, the award must be affirmed.

There is no dispute as to the material facts. Petitioner is engaged in the business of a common carrier by railroad of passengers and freight in commerce between and among the states of California, Arizona, and New Mexico and other states, and also between points in this state, using its tracks and equipment indiscriminately for both interstate and intrastate commerce. The coast division, one of its main lines, extends southerly from San Francisco through San Mateo, San Jose, and other places to Los Angeles, Tucson (Arizona), and El Paso (Texas). In San Mateo petitioner maintained, at a point where the tracks crossed a certain public street, crossing gates and a crossing watchman. On July 27, 1915, deceased, Rolfe, was the crossing gateman or watchman employed by petitioner at this point. At this time more than 60 trains a day were being operated by petitioner over said crossing, some intrastate and others interstate. The duty of deceased was to close these gates upon the approach of a train in order to prevent access to the track by vehicles and thus to prevent a collision between a train and a vehicle, and generally to prevent injury from trains to those having occasion to pass over the crossing. He had power to stop trains at such point by signal when he deemed it necessary in the discharge of these duties. The evidence tended to show that at the time of the accident a train known as the San Jose local, running from San Francisco to San Jose, approached said crossing, that deceased had closed one of the gates and then discovered that a horse and wagon had come within the range of the other gate so that he could not lower it without striking either horse or wagon, and that he started across the track with the intention of backing the horse and wagon away. He was struck by the engine and killed.

There was evidence introduced before the commission to the effect that the employment of crossing gatemen and flagmen was as much for the protection of the railroad company as for the public; that protection of a crossing meant safety to the train as well as the traveler on the highway; that such an employé facilitated the movement of trains by keeping the track clear, the slightest accident demanding a stop and investigation; that a derailment of a train might well be caused by striking an automobile or motor truck; that a derailment interferes with the traffic not only at the place of derailment but also all along the line; and that main line schedules are built up in part, as far as speed is concerned, on the character of crossings, as to whether they are protected by gatemen or flagmen or not. No evidence was given in conflict with any of this.

It will be conceded for the purposes of this discussion that the particular train was purely intrastate in character.

[1, 2] Under these circumstances, was deceased employed in interstate commerce at the time of the accident? As was said in Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. Co. v. Harrington, 241 U. S. 177, 36 Sup. Ct. 517, 60 L. Ed. 941, the "true test of employment in such commerce is: Was the employé at the time of the injury engaged in interstate transportation or in work so closely related to it as to be practically a part of it?" The substantial ground for petitioner's claim that deceased was then engaged in interstate transportation is that he was engaged in keeping one of its instrumentalities of interstate commerce in condition for the carrying on of that commerce; or, to put it in a more concrete way, that he was then engaged in keeping petitioner's tracks at the crossing clear and unimpeded for the passage according to schedule of interstate passengers and freight carried by petitioner. It is settled by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the ultimate authority on such a question as the one before us, that a railroad track used indiscriminately by a carrier in both its interstate and intrastate commerce is an instrumentality of interstate commerce, and that, notwithstanding its double use, those "engaged in its repair or in keeping it in suitable condition for use" are, while so engaged, employed in interstate commerce. Such work, it is said, "is so closely related to such commerce as to be in practice and in legal contemplation a part of it." See Pedersen v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 229 U. S. 146, 33 Sup. Ct. 648, 57 L. Ed. 1125, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153. So there can be no question as to the character of the work where an employé is engaged in direct work upon an instrumentality in actual use for purposes of interstate commerce, such as actually repairing the railroad track or doing thereon any work designed to keep it in suitable condition for use. Thus it is clear that one employed in actually removing from the track any obstacles to the passage of trains caused by a derailment or other accident would be employed in interstate commerce, in view of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. He would be directly engaged in the repair of and putting again into condition for use that instrumentality of interstate commerce.

[3] The question here is, in the light of the evidence, a very narrow one, and is simply whether the principle of these decisions is applicable to one whose duties are in part to keep the track free of such obstructions to the uninterrupted passage of trains according to schedule as may be caused by passing vehicles. So far as the relation of such an employé to one attempting to cross the track is concerned, it may be conceded that there is no ingredient of interstate commerce, and that, if the only consequence to be avoided by the employment was that of injury to such a person, the act of Congress relied on would not be applicable. But in the light of the evidence it seems to us that the scope of the employment in which deceased was engaged at the time of the accident was broader, and extended to keeping the track itself in suitable condition for use as an instrumentality of interstate commerce. In view of the evidence, the work of such a crossing gateman or flagman, so far as the railroad is concerned, is similar, in principle, to that of the track walker, whose duty it is to see that the track is in safe condition for the passage of trains, to that of the employé in the signal tower, whose duty it is to supervise and give the signals for the passage of trains, and to that of the employé engaged in repairs on the automatic signal apparatus with which this petitioner's line is equipped. All such employés may fairly be said, it seems to us, to be directly engaged, in substantial part, at least, in keeping the track in suitable condition for use.

There is, of course, no analogy between the case of one so engaged, and that of a trainman engaged in the operation of an exclusively intrastate train. The duties of the latter are solely with reference to the operation and safety of the particular train on which he is engaged, and he has no duty whatever to perform in regard to keeping any instrumentality of interstate commerce in condition for use. Such is the full scope of his employment, and it has no relation whatever to interstate commerce, close or otherwise. The duties of deceased, as we have seen, had to do directly with the keeping of an instrumentality of interstate commerce in suitable condition for the use of such commerce. And exactly as in the case of one engaged in repairing such an instrumentality after injury thereto has occurred, who concededly is engaged in interstate commerce, it is immaterial whether or not any interstate traffic was immediately to be had over the same. The deceased was actually engaged at the moment of the accident in protecting that instrumentality from injury. His situation in this regard was, in view of the evidence, the same as it would have been if he had been one of a number of guards stationed along the line of railroad to prevent third persons from removing the rails or unlawfully placing obstructions on the track. Certainly their work would not be held to be unrelated to the safety of the track as a highway of interstate commerce. While the exact question has not been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States so far as we have found, certain language of that court in the recent case of Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Rigsby (decided April 17, 1916) 241 U. S. 33, 36 Sup. Ct. 482, 60 L. Ed. 874, is significant. It was said:

"The doing of plaintiff's work, and his security while doing it, cannot be said to have been wholly unrelated to the safety of the main track as a highway of interstate commerce; for a failure to set the brakes so as temporarily to hold the 'bad order' cars in place on that track would have been obviously dangerous to through traffic, while an injury to the brakeman had a tendency to cause delay in clearing the main line for such traffic. Perhaps upon the mere ground of the relation of his work to the immediate safety of the main track plaintiff's right of action might be sustained."

In the light of what has already been decided by that court, we are of the opinion that any work having for its immediate object, in whole or in part, the keeping of the track in condition for use according to schedule for interstate traffic, has such a close and direct relation to interstate transportation as to be practically a part of it, and that such work as deceased was engaged in at the time of his death was work of this character. The fact that the avoidance of injury to the public in the matter of crossing the track was also one of the objects of his employment is not material to the question before us.

It follows that, in view of the act of Congress relied on, the accident commission was without jurisdiction to make any award on account of the death.

The award of the accident commission is annulled.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; SHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. I think the deceased watchman was not engaged in work so closely related to interstate commerce as to be a part of it. Unless he was so employed at the precise time of the accident, the commission had jurisdiction to award compensation. It is urged in support of the petitioner's claim that the deceased was at that time engaged in interstate commerce for the reason that his work had for its immediate object, in whole or in part, the keeping of the track in suitable condition for use according to schedule for interstate traffic—that, in fact, a derailment, or even a slight delay, to an intrastate train may interfere with the interstate traffic at other points along the line. But in my view this argument applies with equal force to the character of the work performed by the trainmen upon the local itself. In the case of either, it is conceivable that the work may be so negligently performed as to cause a congestion of traffic upon the railway, thereby delaying trains carrying interstate commerce. But this is not the true test, for it is well settled that trainmen employed upon a train carrying intrastate commerce exclusively are not engaged in interstate commerce simply because the movement of the train over an interstate highway may bear some relation to the movement of interstate trains.

In this case, it was the duty of the watchman to safeguard the lives of the public using the streets, as well as the passengers traveling upon the petitioner's trains. At the time of the accident he was engaged in preventing a collision between the San Jose local and the horse and wagon. If the performance of such duty had any relation to interstate commerce, I think the burden was upon the petitioner to prove it. That is, the petitioner ought to have shown that the watchman, in the situation presented, should have reasonably contemplated that the result of the collision would actually be to interfere with the passage according to schedule of interstate trains. No such evidence was offered. It is shown that train No. 102, a through train to New Orleans, left San Francisco at 5 p. m., while the San Jose local left 20 minutes later. It does not appear, however, when an interstate train, going in either direction, was scheduled to pass the crossing after the accident, which happened at 5:57 p. m. Furthermore, there is no showing that a derailment might be caused by the train striking a horse and wagon. Indeed, the slight delay resulting from stopping to investigate such a collision would, under ordinary circumstances, probably not have interfered, even in a remote sense, with interstate traffic. Upon the record presented here, I think it must be held on principle that the watchman was engaged in work related purely to intrastate commerce, and that the possible bearing of the accident upon the interstate commerce carried by the petitioner is too remote to deprive the state of jurisdiction. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Barrett (Ga.) 85 S. E. 923.

Nor is the contrary view supported by the authorities. It is true, under the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, that men employed in the repair of bridges, tunnels, station houses, coal pits, overhead trolley wires, and the like, where such instrumentalities are used indiscriminately by carriers of both interstate and intrastate commerce, are engaged in interstate commerce. The reason is clear, since the very labor and materials the workman performs or uses in making repairs promote the operation of trains carrying interstate commerce. A workman, for instance, replacing a broken rail on a bridge over which interstate trains must pass, is directly engaged in the performance of a duty for the protection of such trains. The mere fact that other trains carrying only intrastate commerce may also pass over the same bridge does not make the rail any the less a part of an instrumentality of interstate commerce. But the watchman's work here at the time of the collision may or may not have affected the interstate commerce of the petitioner.

Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Rigby, quoted in the majority opinion, is also to be distinguished from the case before us. The sole question determined by the Supreme Court in that case was whether it was "beyond the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution to create such a liability in favor of one not employed in interstate commerce" as it had attempted to create by virtue of the Safety Appliance Act. The provisions of that act expressly apply "to all trains, locomotives, tenders, cars, and similar vehicles used on any railroad engaged in interstate commerce, * * * and * * * used in connection therewith." U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 8613. The court merely held that, in the exercise of its plenary power to regulate commerce among the several states, and because of the interdependency of all trains using the same track, Congress could adopt such an act—that for the proper protection of interstate trains it had authority to regulate the appliances of all cars "used upon a highway of interstate commerce, irrespective of the use made of any particular car at any particular time." As the court declared:

"In this respect there is no distinction dependent upon whether the suitor was injured while employed or traveling in one kind of commerce rather than the other."

But the broad power of Congress to require safety appliances upon all trains operating upon a highway of interstate commerce has no relation to the liability of a railroad company to compensate employes injured in the performance of their work by means other than defective or unsafe appliances. This was the conclusion reached in Boyle v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 228 Fed. 266, 142 C. C. A. 558. In that case an inspector of both interstate and intrastate trains, having just completed his inspection of a train which was engaged at the time in intrastate commerce, was injured by being struck by a second intrastate train approaching from an opposite direction. It was contended that his employment was so closely related to interstate commerce as to be a part of it. One of the considerations urged was:

"That the prompt and safe movement of an intrastate train is so necessary to the safety and unimpeded movement of interstate trains moving over the same track, that inspection of the intrastate train becomes a part of interstate commerce."

As in our case, reliance was placed upon the decisions of the federal courts under the Safety Appliance Act. But the court, in holding that such decisions were not "authority for the contention so broadly made that acts which are primarily intrastate become interstate in their nature when they affect the safety or movement of interstate commerce," made this pertinent remark:

"While the movement of an intrastate train, like the use of any intrastate instrument, may in some measure affect the safe movement of interstate commerce, we believe that in the present case the inspection of such an intrastate train is so remotely related to interstate commerce that under the tests prescribed by the Supreme Court it cannot be considered a part of it."

The court held that the injured inspector could not recover compensation under the federal Employers' Liability Act; and so, here, the employment of the watchman at the time of the accident was so remotely related to interstate commerce as not to be a part of it.

The award of the commission should therefore be affirmed.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding to review an award against petitioner made by the industrial accident commission to Bertha S. Smith, widow of Austin A. Smith, on account of the death of the latter by reason of accident arising out of and happening in the course of his employment by petitioner.

The admitted facts of this case are such as to present the same question that is decided in Southern Pacific Company v. Industrial Accident Commission (S. F. No. 7818) 161 Pac. 1139, filed herewith. Deceased was a crossing watchman at the place in Berkeley, Alameda county, where certain railroad tracks of petitioner crossed Alcatraz avenue and Adeline street; his duties being substantially the same as those of Mr. Rolfe in the case just referred to. The showing as to the nature and purpose of his employment was substantially the same as in that case. While engaged in "flagging" one of petitioner's electric trains at that point, he was struck by such train and received injuries which resulted in his death. The only difference worthy of note between the facts of the two cases is that in this case the tracks were not main line tracks of petitioner, but were parts of a line maintained by it from Oakland Pier, the main line terminus, through Oakland to and partly through the city of Berkeley, on which it operated electric passenger and steam freight trains. The difference, however, is not material in view of the further uncontradicted showing that at the time of the accident the line was being used indiscriminately by petitioner in its interstate and intrastate commerce. The steam freight trains operated thereon carried all the freight that was "handled to and from Berkeley," it being the only way that the same could be taken to or from the Berkeley freight station, and was thus being constantly used for its handling of the interstate freight carried by petitioner to and from that place. "When a carload of freight would come from an interstate point of origin into the West Oakland yard, the entire car with its contents" would be sent over this line to Berkeley. Then, too, at the Shattuck avenue station on this line interstate passenger tickets were sold, and these tickets were honored on the electric trains when presented by purchasers journeying thereon to a point where they could take the steam train of petitioner, as were also tickets presented by interstate passengers going to Berkeley who had left their steam train at the Sixteenth street station in Oakland. The line was thus a part of petitioner's passenger and freight system, both interstate and intrastate, and was in constant use for both purposes.

There is no material distinction between the cases.

The award of the accident commission is annulled.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent.

It is conceded in the petition in this case that:

"It was not shown at the hearing before the said commission that the train which struck deceased was actually then carrying interstate freight, passengers, express, mail, or baggage."

Nor is it shown when the next interstate train going in either direction would pass the point where the collision occurred. Upon the conclusions reached in my dissent in Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (S. F. No. 7818) 161 Pac. 1139, I think the award of the commission should be affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 7962.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1916.)

COMMERCE ⇨ 27—RAILROADS—"ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE"—LINEMAN—JURISDICTION.

An electric lineman employed by a railroad, killed while removing an overhead telephone wire which had fallen on a trolley wire used by the railroad for the furnishing of electric power for the operation of its cars on a line of electric railway constituting a part of its passenger system both interstate and intrastate, and the removal of which was necessary before the cars could be operated, was engaged in removing an obstruction to the use of an instrumentality in actual use for interstate commerce, and hence was "engaged in interstate commerce," so that the state industrial accident commission was without jurisdiction to make an award.

In Bank. Proceedings by the Southern Pacific Company to review an award by the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and others, made to Jessie Covell, widow of Marcus Victor Covell, on account of his death by accident arising out of and happening in the course of his employment. Award annulled.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding to review an award against petitioner made by the industrial accident commission to Jessie Covell, widow of Marcus Victor Covell, on account of the death of the latter by reason of accident arising out of and happening in the course of his employment by petitioner.

At the time of the accident the deceased was employed by petitioner as an electric lineman, and was engaged in the removal of an overhead telephone wire which had fallen en from its position down onto the trolley wire used by petitioner for the furnishing of electric power for the operation of its cars on a line of electric railway constituting a part of petitioner's passenger system, both interstate and intrastate, and in constant use as such. The facts bearing on the question of the status of this line as an instrumentality of interstate commerce are substantially the same, in so far as passenger traffic is concerned, as those in the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (S. F. No. 7845) 161 Pac. 1142, decided this day. It was necessary that this telephone wire be removed in order that cars might be operated, as it was impossible to operate cars over the line until such wire had been removed. As is shown by the opinion in Southern Pacific Company v. Industrial Accident Commission (S. F. No. 7818) 161 Pac. 1139, decided this day, deceased being thus engaged directly in removing an obstruction to the use of an instrumentality in actual use for purposes of interstate commerce was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the accident. On the authority of the two decisions we have cited it must be held that the commission was without jurisdiction to make the award.

The award of the industrial accident commission is annulled.

We concur: SHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.; SLOSS, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action for injunction by A. P. Matson against John Batto & Sons. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. C. Cowgill, of Sonoma, for appellant. Phil Ware, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The defendant corporation obtained a default judgment against plaintiff in a justice's court. The plaintiff, claiming that the default and judgment had been rendered upon an insufficient service of summons, brought this action to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from enforcing said judgment. The defendant's demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and judgment was entered, granting the plaintiff the relief demanded. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The complaint fails to allege that the plaintiff has or ever had any defense on the merits to the action in the justice's court, or that the judgment there given was not in fact just. Without regard to other points made, this alone is a complete obstacle to the granting of equitable relief. Gregory v. Ford, 14 Cal. 138, 73 Am. Dec. 639; Gibbons v. Scott, 15 Cal. 284; *Logan v. 1. MASTER AND SERVANT $\Leftrightarrow$ 111(1)—FEDERAL EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT—INJURY—NEGLIGENCE.

Under Employers' Liability Act April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 8657–8665), making employers liable to their employés for death from any defect or insufficiency due to their negligence as to cars, etc., and in the absence of some rule of law prescribing the character of maintenance of way cars, no negligence could be predicated upon the use of such a car which was duly inspected, which was in continuous service, and which had always stood up under the work for which it was designed and was wrecked by collision caused by the deceased brakeman himself.

2. NEGLIGENCE $\Leftrightarrow$ 62(1)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

If an injury results in consequence of an unlawful act or omission, but only through or by means of some intervening cause, from which last cause the injury followed as a direct and immediate consequence, the law will refer the damages to the last or proximate cause, and refuse to trace it to that which was more remote.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by A. J. Trice, as administrator of the estate of Asa Philip McFarling, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff, new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

George F. Buck, of Stockton, for appellant. Hatton & Scott, of Modesto, and Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Action under federal Employers' Liability Act. Asa Philip McFarling was an experienced brakeman in the employ of the appellant. He met his death while in that employ under circumstances hereinafter to be narrated, and his administrator brought this action to recover damages from the defendant for having through its negligence occasioned his death. The complaint charged that the deceased at the time he met his death was a brakeman on a freight train, which train was composed of a steam locomotive and about 20 railroad cars, some of which were flat cars and others of which were box cars; that when this train arrived at Thalheim it became necessary to switch some of the cars composing the freight train from the main track to a side or spur track, and in this switching deceased was called upon to assist and did assist; that while the deceased was in the performance of his duty as such brakeman, and while the railroad cars were so being switched, one of the box cars forming a part of the freight train "collapsed and became a complete wreck, and a portion of said box car and the contents of said box car were precipitated onto one of the flat cars which formed a part of the train, and which flat car was immediately ahead of and coupled to the box car"; the deceased "was on said flat car performing his duties as such brakeman at the time the said box car collapsed; that portions of said box car and a portion of the contents of said box car were precipitated upon and fell upon said Asa Philip McFarling," causing the injuries which resulted in his death. The gravamen of the charge of negligence is:

"That said box car which collapsed and became a wreck as aforesaid was not properly or safely constructed, but was defectively and insufficiently constructed, due to the negligence of said defendant; that said box car was constructed of wood, and that the beams which formed the framework of said box car were wooden beams, and that the beams which extended from the front end of said box car to the rear end of said box car were wooden beams, and that on said 22d day of April, 1913, said wooden beams which formed the framework of said box car were defective and insufficient, due to the negligence of defendant, and were not of sufficient strength to enable said box car to withstand the aforesaid running and operation and use of said box car by said defendant on said 22d day of April, 1913, and that said box car by reason of the manner of its construction and by reason of the material used in its construction was a weak and unsafe and unfit car to be run and to be operated and used by defendant as aforesaid, and that on the 22d day of April, 1913, said box car was old and worn out, and was, due to the negligence of defendant, defective and insufficient, and that by reason of its said weak and defective construction, and by reason of its said age, and by reason of its being so worn out, said box car, on said 22d day of April, 1913, was, due to the negligence of defendant, wholly defective and insufficient and wholly unsafe and unfit to be run and operated by defendant as aforesaid, and was wholly defective, insufficient, unfit, and unsafe to be used for the purposes for which the same was being used as aforesaid by defendant at the time of its said collapse and of its becoming a wreck as aforesaid, and that, owing to its unsafe, unfit, worn-out, defective, and insufficient condition, said box car on said 22d day of April, 1913, was not a fit or proper or safe car to be run and operated as aforesaid and to be used for the purposes for which it was being used by defendant at the time said box car collapsed and became a wreck as aforesaid; that said unsafe, unfit, worn-out, defective, and insufficient condition of said box car on said 22d day of April, 1913, was due to the negligence of said defendant."

This complaint would lead to the belief that the box car in question was so old, so rotten, and so defective that it collapsed in the ordinary operation of switching. The uncontested facts, however, disclose the following: The freight train of the crew of which McFarling was head brakeman was composed of the locomotive, followed by six freight cars. This train had picked up seven maintenance of way cars, which were to be switched onto a spur track near Thalheim. These maintenance of way cars were construction cars with the usual materials, tools, and equipment to do track work. The seven cars comprised, in order, two flat cars loaded with lumber, one box car which carried tools, appliances, and cement, two bunk cars, a dining car, and a water tank car. Approaching Thalheim, where these maintenance of way cars were to be sidetracked, McFarling rode on the engine with the fireman and engineer and his fellow brakeman, Bays, and the method of switching the maintenance of way cars was agreed upon. But little discussion was required; for the men were experienced in railroad work and the method adopted was a usual one. It was as follows: The train was stopped some distance before it reached the switch. In the picturesque language of the trainmen, it was then "bled out"; that is to say, the compressed air operating the air brakes was released. While this was being done McFarling, as head brakeman, was charged with the duty of operating the switch, and in the performance of that duty he walked to this switch and tested it. Finding it in working order, he threw the switch so that the engine would leave the main line track and run onto it; the plan being thus to run the engine and the regular freight cars onto the switch. When they were safely thereon the switch was to be thrown back and the maintenance of way cars following, under the impetus given to them, were to pass ahead on the main line track. The engine would then back onto the main line track, go forward and take hold of the maintenance of way cars, back with them down the main line track until they cleared the switch, which again would be thrown so that the maintenance of way cars could be pushed onto the spur track, after which the regular freight train on the main line track would pursue its way. When McFarling found the switch in working order and had set it so as to connect with the spur track, he "gave a high ball," or a signal to the train crew that all was in order for them to make this flying switch. The engineer started the train. It was under sufficient momentum to carry the maintenance of way cars on the main line track past the switch. He gave the train "slack," or checked its momentum for a moment, so that the brakeman stationed between the regular freight cars and the maintenance of way cars could "get the pin" or uncouple the latter cars from the former. This was done. The engine, with the regular freight cars, then shot more rapidly ahead, made the switch, and passed onto it. It was the duty of McFarling, in control of the switch, when the last of these cars had thus successfully passed onto the switch, to throw the switch so that the maintenance of way cars should continue on the main track. There was time and opportunity to perform this ordinary act of switching. His fellow brakeman, Bays, who had uncoupled the train, and who had changed his position from the front end of the first maintenance of way car to the rear end of that car, looked at McFarling as these cars were approaching the switch, saw that McFarling had thrown the switch but partly over, that he seemed to hesitate as if confused, and threw it back to its former position. Bays had never seen him act in that way before. Why McFarling did not completely throw the switch is not known. He had just tested it, and it was in working order, as evidenced by the fact that the engine and freight cars had just passed over it. Whether he thought he had completely thrown the switch until it was too late for him to correct his mistake will never be known, but the unquestioned fact is that the switch was not thrown, and the maintenance of way cars proceeded to follow the freight train onto the spur track. Bays, on a flat car, realizing that a collision was inevitable, "cinched his brake up," and jumped. The conductor, upon the top of one of the rearward box cars, also recognizing the inevitableness of the collision, and unable to jump, braced himself to meet it as well as possible. McFarling, who was in a place of perfect safety at his post of duty at the switching point, sprang onto the rear end of the second flat car, immediately behind which was the box car containing tools, cement, etc. He did this apparently for the purpose of setting the brake on the flat car. He was seen at the brake. The collision came. The drawhead of the box car rose over the drawhead of the flat car, and McFarling was found with the upper part of his body on the box car and crushed from the waist down between the end sills of the two cars. These end sills were checked and splintered, but not broken, but the side sills or girders of the box car gave way and the car "buckled." A part of the roof, the forward end, and some of the contents of the car were projected onto the flat car. When the cars were separated McFarling's body fell to the ground, and with it a small portion of the front end of the box car and some of the material that was in it. There is some general testimony in the record taken from the evidence given by one of the trainmen at the coroner's inquest to the effect that when the box car buckled it fell on the end of the flat car where McFarling was standing "and just smashed him." But the detailed and specific evidence is that his body was caught between the ends of the flat car and the box car—their sills—and his mortal injuries came from this crushing at and below the waist line. The upper part of his body, which would have been the first to sustain injury from anything falling from above, was lying against the end of the flat car uninjured. Such is the testimony of plaintiff's witness, the county physician of Stanislaus county, who made the official examination of the body of the deceased and testified to its conditions at the coroner's inquest and at the trial.

Concerning the car, witnesses for the plaintiff testified that they examined the side girders of the car where they had been fractured by the buckling of the car, and found the wood to be rotten; that is to say, there were streaks of rotten or "punky" wood. This defect did not show from the outside. "I say from the general appearance outside it didn't appear so much decayed, until you pierced a hole in, and there was places I put the tool in an inch and an inch and a half and it would bring out rotten wood." Defendant showed that the car was one of the older type of its freight cars, which for lack of size and capacity for profitable use in the business had been turned over to the use of the maintenance of way department. A complete record of its service during the year previous to the accident was given. It was shown that it was in regular and constant service, and had stood up under this regular and constant service, and had been regularly inspected by defendant's competent car inspector but a short time before the accident. There was conflicting testimony to that offered by plaintiff to the effect that the girders were sound and in good condition. But, aside from this, there was the positive and uncontradicted testimony that the pressure exerted by this collision was of 1,000,000 pounds, and that the longitudinal sills or girders of the car made of Oregon pine, as they were, would have given way, even if perfectly sound, under a pressure of approximately 200,000 pounds.

[1, 2] This action, as has been said, is brought under the federal Liability Act. That act provides that employers shall be liable to their employés in damages "for injury or death resulting * * * by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars," etc. U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 8657. The evidence has been sufficiently set forth. Wherein can it be said that that evidence shows that McFarling met his death by reason of a defect due to defendant's negligence in its car? The car, it was shown, had been regularly and duly inspected. The car, it was proved, was suitable and efficient for the character of work for which it was employed. The injury, it is established, did not arise, as indicated from the allegations of the complaint, by a collapse of the car while it was being switched. It arose as the result of a use to which it was never in contemplation that the car should be put. It arose as the result of a violent collision, for the occasion of which collision the deceased, and the deceased alone, was in fault. It was the deceased's own act of negligence which brought about his death. In the absence of some rule of law prescribing the character of a maintenance of way car, no negligence can be predicated upon the use of a car such as this, which was duly inspected, which was in continuous service, and which had always stood up under the work for which it was designed, and was wrecked by a collision brought about by the deceased himself. This case in principle is precisely that of Vizelich v. Southern Pacific Co., 126 Cal. 587, 59 Pac. 129, saying that in the latter case the collision was occasioned by a fellow employé of the injured plaintiff, while in the case at bar it was occasioned by the injured man himself. In that case, by the faulty manipulation of a switch, a switch engine was thrown into collision. The water tank of the engine became unfastened by the collision and injured the plaintiff. It was there held that the faulty manipulation of the switch was the proximate cause of the injury, notwithstanding whatever defect there might have been in the fastenings of the water tank. There, as here, it was shown that the engine had been about the yard engaged in its ordinary duties, and from its ordinary employment no injury had ever resulted from the alleged insecure fastenings of the water tank. The same is equally true of the car which was here wrecked. The same principle was announced in the earlier case of Kevern v. Gold & Silver Mining Co., 70 Cal. 394, 11 Pac. 740, where Wood on Master and Servant, p. 812, is quoted to the effect that even where machinery is defective, so that otherwise a recovery might be had for an injury received, yet, if the promoting cause is the negligence of a fellow servant, no recovery can be had. The same rule is laid down by Judge Cooley in the following language:

"It is well settled that, if injury has resulted in consequence of a certain unlawful act or omission, but only through or by means of some intervening cause, from which last cause the injury followed as a direct and immediate consequence, the law will refer the damage to the last or proximate cause, and refuse to trace it to that which was more remote." Cooley, Torts (2d Ed.) p. 73.

And that this rule finds universal acceptance will be sufficiently evidenced by the further citations to 4 Labatt's Master and Servant (2d Ed.) pp. 47, 69; Rose v. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. (Tex.) 17 S. W. 789; Quinn v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 84 S. W. 395; Norfolk & Western R. R. Co. v. Brown, 91 Va. 668, 22 S. E. 496.

It thus becomes unnecessary to consider any of the added propositions advanced by appellant upon its appeal. Thus, since the employer was not negligent, there is no question here of contributory negligence. The proximate cause was the sole negligence of McFarling. Equally unnecessary is it to consider rulings in the admission and rejection of evidence which are complained of.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

TUCKER v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.
(L. A. 3803.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1010(1)—PRESUMPTIONS—CORRECTNESS OF FINDINGS.

Findings must be upheld on appeal if there is substantial evidence to support them.

2. CARRIERS ⇨318(4)—PASSENGERS—ACTION FOR INJURIES—EVIDENCE.

In action for injuries from being struck by electric car, evidence that the car came into the station at one mile an hour equipped with strong headlight and sounding proper signals, and that there was sufficient room for people to move about alongside the track without being struck, and that the front of the car passed plaintiff before she was struck, and her injury was probably caused by other persons crowding her against a car while trying to board it, supported a finding for defendant.

3. CARRIERS ⇨340 — PASSENGERS — LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

Where a person was injured by being struck by an electric car, the doctrine of last clear chance did not apply where the motorman did not know plaintiff was in a position of danger.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by Mary Tucker against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Paul M. Nash and L. D. Barnett, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. J. W. McKinley, Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and A. W. Ashburn, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence in the operation of one of its cars. There was a trial by the court, a jury having been expressly waived. The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the defendant and thereafter entered judgment that plaintiff take nothing by her action. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The court found, in substance, that the plaintiff, while standing at the defendant's station at Playa Del Rey on October 19, 1912, was struck by one of defendant's cars and thereby received the injuries complained of, that the injuries were incurred by reason of negligence on the part of the plaintiff and were not due to any negligence of the defendant or any of its servants.

[1] The appellant contends that there is not sufficient evidence to support the findings. In view of the well-established rule that findings must be upheld on appeal if there is substantial evidence to support them, we find no merit in this contention.

[2] There is substantial evidence to the effect that the defendant's motorman, upon rounding the curve some 350 feet distant from the station at Playa Del Rey, reduced the speed of his train to some 6 or 7 miles an hour halfway in to the station, and to 1 mile per hour running through the crowd just before the car came to a stop, that he rang the bell and blew the whistle all the way in, that the car was equipped with a strong headlight visible from the station after rounding the curve. It also appears that the crowd was scattered along by the side of the track a distance of 100 to 150 feet, many persons getting on the train before it came to a stop, that there was plenty of room for the people to move about alongside the track and near the station without being struck by the oncoming car, that the track appeared clear to the motorman, everybody being a sufficient distance from the track to allow clear passage of the front end of the train, and that the plaintiff was in no danger prior to this time, that the defendant's motorman exercised every necessary precaution in approaching the station, that the plaintiff's injuries were confined to the right foot. There was also evidence tending to prove that the front end of the first car of the train had passed her before she was struck and that her injury was probably caused by other persons crowding her against the second car while they were trying to get aboard before it stopped. From this the court was authorized to find that the injury was not the result of negligence on the part of the defendant, but was caused either by her own neglect or that of other persons not connected with the management of the train, nor in the service of the defendant.

[3] There is no sufficient basis in the facts, as found, for the application of the doctrine of the "last clear chance." The court found that the defendant's motorman did not know of the plaintiff being in a position of danger. This finding, supported as it is by substantial evidence, removes the basis upon which that doctrine rests.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by D. F. Royer against D. N. Kelly, executor. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Williams & Rutan, of Santa Ana, and Wm. M. Brown, of Orange, for appellant. Scarborough & Forgry, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff sued to recover the sum of $22,400, claimed to have been owing to him from the decedent, Caroline M.

Conn, at the time of her death, upon two agreements in writing between them, one executed on September 10, 1907, the other on October 6, 1911. The answer alleged as a defense, among other things, that each of said agreements was executed without any consideration and was obtained by undue influence. The court found that there was no consideration for either of the contracts and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals. He claims that said finding is contrary to the evidence.

By the writing of 1907, Mrs. Conn agreed to furnish and establish a machine plant for light manufacturing, at a cost not to exceed $25,000, to be located near Los Angeles, and to authorize Royer, as her agent, to buy the machinery therefor, ship the same to Los Angeles, secure a suitable location and set it up ready for operation, and she thereby appointed him as general manager of the plant. She was to have all the net profits of the operation of the factory until the "entire purchase price," with 6 per cent. interest, was returned to her, whereupon the title to the plant should rest in Royer. He agreed to manage the plant and pay her the net profits, to be applied as first stated. It further provided that, if she died before the net profits had fully paid for the plant, Royer should have the option either to take the plant as his own without further payment, or in lieu thereof, to accept from the estate of Mrs. Conn, the sum of $25,000. It further declared that the agreement was made to carry out the wishes of the deceased husband of Mrs. Conn, said wishes being that on the death of both Mrs. Conn and her husband, Royer "should, at his option, have said plant, or the sum of $25,000, for services performed by said second party [Royer] for said first party [Mrs. Conn] and her husband."

The agreement of 1911 recited that whereas, Mrs. Conn and Royer have had "numerous dealings with each other, which have never been properly adjusted, now this agreement is made for the purpose of settling all differences now existing between the said parties." It then declared that the agreement of 1907 "is now in full force and effect," except as in the later agreement specified. It then provided that whereas, Royer has not received the machine plant, as provided in the agreement of 1907, now, therefore, he is entitled to $25,000 out of the estate of Mrs. Conn, to be paid as a debt against her, and that all sums then owing by Royer to her on promissory notes shall be deducted from said $25,000. At her death he was owing her $2,600 on a promissory note, which sum he deducted in the statement of his claim filed against her estate, leaving the balance of $22,400.

[1] The recitals of the two agreements furnish presumptive evidence of a valuable consideration. But the rule is that the parties are not estopped by recitals in an agreement with respect to its consideration. The true consideration, or the want of consideration, may always be shown by extrinsic evidence for the purpose of impeaching a contract, notwithstanding that it states facts which show a valuable consideration. Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 220, 41 Pac. 1028; National Hardwood Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 7, 130 Pac. 881; Stanton v. Weldy, 19 Cal. App. 374, 126 Pac. 175. The question must, therefore, be determined by an examination of the evidence.

[2] In so far as the consideration recited in the agreements consisted of services performed by Royer for the deceased husband of Mrs. Conn in his lifetime, it was not sufficient to support the agreement. She was under no legal or moral obligation to pay for such services, and her agreement to do so, made after his death, is to be regarded as purely voluntary and without binding force. Rosenberg v. Ford, 85 Cal. 612, 24 Pac. 779; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 99 Cal. 193, 33 Pac. 862; Chaffee v. Browne, supra.

Under the first agreement Royer was to act as Mrs. Conn's agent to buy the machinery referred to therein, ship it to Los Angeles, secure a site, and set up the machinery ready for operation. He was to be thereafter the general manager of the factory, and to continue in that capacity until the net profits repaid the cost of the machinery. This was the entire consideration to be rendered by him. The agreement of 1911 does not purport to express any consideration, except the settlement and adjustment of previous dealings and of all existing difficulties between them.

[3] The finding being against Royer on this subject, every fact against him, of which there is a reasonable inference arising from the evidence, is to be taken as proven. Applying this rule, the finding of the court is supported by the evidence.

[4] Frederick Conn, the husband of Mrs. Conn, died in August, 1907, only a few weeks prior to the making of the first agreement. Before his death he and Royer and several other persons were stockholders and directors of a corporation, known as the Electric Razor Company, which was carrying on a razor factory. Royer was general manager and president of this corporation. It continued to operate the factory, under the management of Royer, for several years after Frederick Conn's death. The plant referred to in the agreement of 1907 was never erected, established, or operated, no site therefor was ever secured, nor was Royer ever appointed manager of such a plant. After the execution of the agreement of 1907, this company needed more machinery, and Mrs. Conn, it appears, agreed to buy it and allow it to be used by said company under a lease. Royer, being general manager at that time, went to Chicago with one Brigham to buy this machinery. Brigham bought the machinery, it was shipped to California, and Mrs. Conn paid for it. The corporation paid Royer his railroad fare on the trip. The agreement of 1907 did not authorize him to buy machinery to be used in the plant of the Electric Razor Company. Obviously, this was not the machinery referred to in that agreement, and Royer, in going East to buy it, was not acting as her agent under that agreement. The court below might justly and reasonably have inferred that he was acting as general manager for the company. It is true, he testified that he bought it for Mrs. Conn, to be leased to and to be used in the factory. As the machinery was apparently to belong to her when purchased, he could truly say, in that sense, that it was bought for her; but it would not follow that she employed him to buy it. The fact that he was the manager of the Razor Company, which paid his expenses, raises a much stronger and more reasonable inference that he was acting for that corporation in the matter. The court below doubtless took this view of the transaction. No other proof of any services by him to her was given. The services contemplated by the agreement of 1907 were, therefore, wholly wanting, the enterprise there described was abandoned, or at all events was never begun, and no obligation from Mrs. Conn to Royer arose therefrom.

The evidence with reference to the second agreement tended to show that there were no differences to settle nor dealings to adjust between Royer and Mrs. Conn. There was no evidence that there had been any dealings between them which could be the basis of a claim by him upon her, except the first agreement, which, as we have said, furnished no foundation for such claim. The circumstances tend to support the theory that the second agreement was voluntary, if, indeed, it was not an attempt to obtain an unfair advantage of a feeble, decrepit, and ignorant old woman. The court below, however, exculpated Royer as to the charge of undue influence, and rested the decision entirely on the fact of want of consideration. We see no reason for interfering with its decision. There are no other points of sufficient merit to require mention.

The judgment is affirmed.

3. EVIDENCE $\S$ 230(5) — DECLARATIONS — FRAUD.

In a suit to set aside as fraudulent, a conveyance made on adequate consideration, declarations of the grantor as to his fraudulent intent are admissible against him, but not against his grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 848; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 230(5).]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 1047(3)—HARMLESS ERROR — STRIKING TESTIMONY — PARTY NOT ENTITLED TO RECOVER.

Error in striking such declarations entirely from the record, not merely striking them as against the grantee, is harmless, where the court found on sufficient evidence that the grantee had no fraudulent intent and paid an adequate price, since those facts alone are sufficient to defeat recovery regardless of the grantor's intent.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by J. B. Byerley against Bertha A. Conlin and another to set aside a deed as fraudulent. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis, Lantz & Wood, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Chas. S. McKelvy, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The object of the plaintiff's action was to set aside a deed executed by Clarence B. Conlin to his wife, Bertha A. Conlin, conveying to her a certain parcel of land. The complaint alleged that the deed was executed without consideration and with intent thereby to defraud the creditors of Clarence B. Conlin, and particularly the plaintiff, who was then one of the creditors. The court below found that the deed was executed for a valuable and adequate consideration, consisting of the separate property of Bertha A. Conlin, and that it was not made with the intent to defraud the plaintiff or any other person. There was sufficient evidence to support this finding. This is, of itself, sufficient to uphold the judgment. The plaintiff claims that there were certain errors of law at the trial, consisting of the exclusion of evidence offered by the plaintiff.

[1] The defendant C. B. Conlin, as a witness for the plaintiff, testified that at the time of the transfer complained of he had other property sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's debt. The appellant complains of the exclusion by the court of impeaching testimony showing previous declarations made by him inconsistent with this statement. As the court found in favor of the plaintiff that he did not have sufficient property at that time, the error, if any, is immaterial.

[2-4] As it sufficiently appeared that Mrs. Conlin paid an adequate price for the property, the plaintiff was required to show an intent to defraud creditors on the part of both defendants. Visher v. Webster, 8 Cal. 112. Declarations of C. B. Conlin, made while he held the title, and tending to show his fraudulent intent, were received as against him alone. They would not be evidence of the intent of Mrs. Conlin, unless she had notice thereof before purchasing the property. Landecker v. Houghtaling, 7 Cal. 392. As no notice was brought home to her, the court, on motion, struck out the evidence of his declarations. They should not have been stricken out entirely, for they were competent evidence of the fraudulent intent of C. B. Conlin. It is not clear that the court intended to do more than to strike them out as evidence of the intent of Mrs. Conlin. But, however that may be, as the court found, upon sufficient evidence, that she did not have such fraudulent intent and that she paid an adequate price, and as these facts alone are sufficient to defeat the plaintiff, the error in striking out the testimony could not have properly affected the judgment in favor of the defendants.

There are no other points that are of sufficient merit to deserve notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

LEONARD v. HOME BUILDERS.
(L. A. 3847.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1916.)

1. CONTRACTS ⇨305(2,3)—BUILDING CONTRACT—BREACH—WAIVER.

Breach of building contract by defective construction is not waived by occupation of the house by the owner nor his payment of the price with knowledge of the defective construction; his right of rescission being an elective and not an exclusive remedy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1398, 1463, 1469; Dec. Dig. ⇨305(2,3).]

2. COVENANTS ⇨104—BREACH—REMEDIES OF BUYER.

The buyer of property, with a warranty or covenant as to quality, need not rescind or reject the property when offered in a defective condition, but may stand upon the contract, rely on the covenant, accept the defective property, sue upon the covenant, and recover the damages caused by its breach.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. § 170; Dec. Dig. ⇨104.]

3. CONTRACTS ⇨305(1)—BUILDING CONTRACTS—BREACH—WAIVER.

Where one who had contracted with a building company to buy a lot upon which the company was to erect a house, having paid a substantial sum on the price, took possession and paid the balance due, giving written notice that he did not relinquish claim for damages from defective construction by making the payment, he did not waive his right to such damages, the contract making time of the essence, and having very stringent provisions for prompt payment and forfeiture after breach, and it being uncertain whether the owner's damages would exceed the balance due.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1398-1400, 1467-1475; Dec. Dig. ⇨305(1).]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by F. X. Leonard against the Home Builders. From judgment for defendant, and order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

M. O. Graves and F. X. Leonard, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. L. R. & S. H. Garrett and D. A. Jacobs, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant and the plaintiff executed an agreement in writing dated March 11, 1910, whereby the defendant agreed that it would, before June 15, 1910, erect for the plaintiff, in a good and workmanlike manner, a dwelling house on a certain lot, in accordance with plans and specifications agreed on between them, and would thereupon sell said lot and house to plaintiff for the sum of $2,750; $232.50 thereof to be paid in cash and the balance to be paid in installments of $25 each month until the whole, with 8 per cent. interest, was paid, whereupon the property was to be conveyed to plaintiff.

The house was built in due time, the payments were made in full, and the lot was conveyed to plaintiff. This action is to recover of defendant the sum of $2,000 as damages alleged to have been caused by the breach by the defendant of its agreement to erect the house in a good and workmanlike manner. It is alleged that certain faulty and imperfect work was done, and that certain imperfect materials were used in the construction of the building, whereby the plaintiff was damaged in the sum named. The answer admits the execution of the contract, the erection of the building, the making of the payments, and the conveyance of the lot to plaintiff. It denies the alleged breaches of the covenant to erect the house in a good and workmanlike manner, and alleges that on the completion of the house the plaintiff accepted it, took possession, and moved into it, with full knowledge of its condition and of the kind of work and materials used in its construction, and afterward, with full knowledge, paid to defendant the full balance of the price.

Upon the trial the court stated that it would first hear evidence for the plaintiff "with regard to the final payment of the balance due under the agreement in evidence, and as to the character of the same being voluntary or involuntary." Evidence in behalf of the plaintiff was then given, to the effect that he made full payment of the price of the house and lot on February 19, 1912; that at that time he had full knowledge of all the facts with regard to the building erected on the lot by the defendant; that defendant made no threats and exercised no duress to obtain said payment; that he was under no compulsion except by the terms of the agreement, and that at the time of making said payment, which amounted to $2,252.63, plaintiff informed defendant in writing that payment was involuntary; that it was made under protest, and that plaintiff retained a claim against defendant for the "defective construction," etc., of the house, and that the payment was not made "in relinquishment, abandonment, release, or prejudice of or to said claims." The agreement made time of the essence of the contract, and provided for a forfeiture of all plaintiff's rights upon the breach by him of any one of its terms. There had been no breach by him, so far as appears. Plaintiff then stated that he had no further proof as to the character of the payment, and he offered to prove the other allegations of his cause of action.

The court refused to receive further evidence, and thereupon gave judgment of nonsuit against the plaintiff. The appeal is from that judgment, and was taken within 60 days after its rendition. There is also an appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The appeals were taken to the district court of appeal of the second district. The district courts of appeal have no jurisdiction of appeals in cases at law in which the demand amounts to $2,000. Const. art. 6, § 4. The district court, discovering its want of jurisdiction, transferred the case to the Supreme Court, as provided in rule 32. 160 Cal. lvi, 119 Pac. xv.

[1] The payment was not "involuntary" in the sense in which that word is used in discussions of the right of the payor to recover back the money paid. Brumagim v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 272, 79 Am. Dec. 176. But the question whether the payment was voluntary or involuntary is not the real question in the case. The determinative question on this branch of the case is whether or not the conduct of the plaintiff in making the payment, under the circumstances shown, amounted to a waiver by him of the alleged breaches of the contract by the defendant. Where a contract is made with the owner of land to erect a building on the land, and there is a breach, by the contractor, of his covenant to build it in a good and workmanlike manner, neither the occupation of the house by the owner, after its supposed completion, nor the payment of the price, though accompanied by knowledge by the owner of the defective construction, is sufficient, taken alone, to operate as a waiver of the breach of the covenant. "A right of action for damages is not necessarily waived by the mere fact of payment with knowledge of the defects or the taking possession of the subject-matter of the contract, but these facts may be considered on the question of a waiver of this character." 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 2051; Katz v. Bedford, 77 Cal. 322, 19 Pac. 523, 1 L. R. A. 826; Halleck v. Bresnahan, 3 Wyo. 80, 2 Pac. 537; Flannery v. Rohrmayer, 46 Conn. 558, 33 Am. Rep. 33; Hattin v. Chase, 88 Me. 240, 33 Atl. 989; Moulton v. McOwen, 103 Mass. 597; Stewart v. Fulton, 31 Mo. 61; Cannon v. Hunt, 116 Ga. 457, 42 S. E. 734; Underwood v. Wolf, 131 Ill. 425, 23 N. E. 598, 19 Am. St. Rep. 40; Redlands, etc., Ass'n v. Gorman, 161 Mo. 208, 61 S. W. 820, 54 L. R. A. 718; Willey v. School Dist., 25 Mich. 427; 6 Cyc. 69; 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1232.

This rule applies here. The plaintiff had made a binding agreement to buy the house and lot and had paid a substantial sum on the price. He was entitled to possession of the lot on completion of the house, and he took possession accordingly. If he had known of the defects at that time, of which, however, there was no evidence, he would have had the right to refuse possession, rescind the contract, and recover the money paid thereon. But this was not his only remedy, and he was not obliged to rescind, or waive, the defects.

[2] One who buys property upon a warranty or covenant as to its quality need not rescind or reject the property when offered in a defective condition, but may stand upon the contract, rely on the covenant, accept the defective property, sue upon the covenant, and recover the damages caused by its breach. North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Hobbs, Wall & Co., 159 Cal. 384, 113 Pac. 870, 120 Pac. 27, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 501. That case involved a sale of goods, but the rule is the same with respect to the purchase of real property with a contract by the seller to build a house thereon. The buyer may sue on the covenant at once, whether the installments of the price are due or not due. The payments on the price, whether in part or in full, voluntary or involuntary, will not operate as a waiver of his demand for damages, unless the circumstances show an intent to waive the same, or create an estoppel against the subsequent assertion thereof.

[3] Here the payment was accompanied by a written notice, expressly declaring that the plaintiff claimed damages for the defective construction, and did not, by making the payment, relinquish, abandon, release, or prejudice said claim, but retained the same. There was therefore no intent to waive such claim, and nothing to create an estoppel against the subsequent assertion of it by an action at law. Not only is this true, but the contract furnished good ground for the belief that no such waiver was intended. It made time of the essence, and had very stringent provisions for prompt payment and for a forfeiture of all rights of plaintiff under it upon a breach of any of them. He was not in a safe position to refuse payment on the ground that his unliquidated damages would be sufficient to defeat or extinguish his fixed liability for the installments of the contract. While this was not legal duress or compulsion, it is strong evidence against the proposition that the payment in full was a waiver. The motion for nonsuit should have been denied.

The judgment and order are reversed.

GILL v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (S. F. 6826.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨909(1) — RECORD — PRESUMPTIONS.

On appeal from denial of motion to vacate order of substitution of attorneys, the record being silent as to whether notice of such substitution was deposited in the mail properly addressed as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1013, the presumption that such notice was deposited prevails.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3675; Dec. Dig. ⇨909(1).]

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT ⇨75(1) — SUBSTITUTION OF ATTORNEYS.

A party has the absolute right to change his attorney and have the one he prefers substituted as the attorney of record.

4. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT ⇨75(1) — SUBSTITUTION OF ATTORNEYS — EFFECT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 285, as to service upon the former attorney of notice of motion to substitute attorneys, a plaintiff, having chosen another attorney and procured an order of record substituting a new one, and having, with his new attorney, made settlement of a claim for damages with a defendant having no notice of any defects or irregularity in such substitution, cannot thereafter set aside the settlement because not sanctioned by the former attorney, upon showing that the order of substitution was made without due notice to such former attorney, especially where the plaintiff himself recognized the new attorney and advised him regarding the settlement.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by John Lewis Gill against the Southern Pacific Company. From order denying plaintiff's motion, he appeals. Affirmed.

Randall & Bartlett, of Los Angeles, for appellant. M. R. Jones, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In the year 1909 the plaintiff began an action against the defendant to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff because of the negligence of the defendant. An amended complaint was filed to which a demurrer was interposed, and the cause was pending awaiting action upon the demurrer. Paul C. Dormitzer was the attorney for the plaintiff, and M. R. Jones was the attorney for the defendant. On September 1, 1911, on motion of the plaintiff, the superior court made an order substituting L. F. Tormey as attorney for the plaintiff instead of said Dormitzer. Notice of this substitution was duly served upon Jones. Thereafter Tormey and the plaintiff effected a settlement of the case with an agent of the defendant whereby the plaintiff agreed to accept $500 in full settlement thereof. The money was paid and a release executed. In pursuance of this settlement, on January 18, 1912, by an order directed to the clerk and filed in the action the plaintiff dismissed the action.

In March following the plaintiff filed and served a so-called "motion" for relief as follows: First, to vacate the order of substitution of the attorneys aforesaid; second, to vacate and set aside the compromise and settlement above mentioned; third, to vacate and set aside the said dismissal of the action; and, fourth, for judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the pleadings for the amount prayed for in the complaint. Afterwards the matter was brought on for hearing, and thereupon the court made its order denying respectively the application to set aside the substitution, the application to set aside the settlement and compromise, the application to vacate the dismissal, and the motion for judgment on the pleadings. The plaintiff has appealed from the order denying the application to set aside the dismissal, and denying the application to set aside the settlement and compromise. The notice of appeal does not specify any other part of the order, but there is added to the specifications aforesaid the statement that "said plaintiff appeals from each and every part of said order and ruling as well as from the whole thereof."

[1] It is extremely doubtful if this notice can be considered as a sufficient notice of appeal from the order refusing to vacate the substitution proceedings. The plaintiff himself, in his proposed bill of exceptions, which was settled by the court, recites that he has filed his notice of appeal from the order denying the motion to set aside the dismissal and from the order denying the motion to set aside the settlement. Admitting, however, that it may be considered as an appeal from the first order mentioned, the record does not show that the order was erroneous, so far as the plaintiff is concerned. The bill of exceptions does not purport to contain all or any of the evidence introduced on the hearing of the motion to substitute attorneys. The order of substitution recites that it was made on motion of the plaintiff in person in open court. This is not disputed. Neither the defendant nor its attorney were present, nor was any notice given to them of the hearing of said motion. The only objection made to the validity of the order is that it does not appear that any notice of the time and place of the hearing of such motion was given to Dormitzer. Dormitzer filed an affidavit stating that he received no such notice. The case was pending in Contra Costa county, where plaintiff resided, and Dormitzer resided and had his office in Los Angeles county. Nearly a month prior to the making of the order of substitution the plaintiff mailed a letter to him stating that his future services were dispensed with. He does not deny that he received this letter. There is nothing in the record to show that upon the hearing of the motion to change attorneys the court did not have proof that due notice of the motion had been given to Dormitzer. The presumption is that such proof was duly made. The only evidence to the contrary is that he did not receive such notice. Upon the deposit of such notice in the mail, properly addressed the service thereof would be complete. Code Civ. Proc. § 1013. The record is silent upon the question whether or not such notice was deposited. The presumption that the fact was established must therefore prevail.

[2-5] Furthermore, this proceeding for substitution was one in which the defendant had no direct interest. The plaintiff had the absolute right to change his attorney and to have the one he preferred substituted as the attorney of record. Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 172, 68 Pac. 581. The only person who is entitled to notice of the motion for substitution is the attorney first employed. Where a plaintiff has obtained a substitution without sufficient notice to the attorney, such attorney may object to the substitution and have the same set aside. So also the defendant, if he learns of such defective notice or want of notice, may perhaps have the order avoided. But we know of no authority for the proposition that the plaintiff, having chosen another attorney and having procured an order substituting a new attorney in the place of the old, and having proceeded thereupon with his new attorney to make a settlement of the cause with the defendant, may thereafter ask to have the settlement set aside on the ground that it was not sanctioned by the former attorney, and support this claim by showing that the order of substitution was made without due notice to such former attorney. In the absence of fraud, reason and good sense demand the rule that the plaintiff should be bound by such a contract and the defendant protected therein. The order was made, and was regularly entered of record. The defendant's attorney was served with notice thereof as provided in section 285 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Nothing appeared of record to impeach its validity. The defendant's attorney had the right to recognize the new attorney and proceed to deal with him, at least so long as he had no information to impugn the validity of the order. The want of any recital of the giving of notice to the former attorney did not affect its validity nor put him on inquiry. It was not incumbent on him to examine the record and make inquiries to learn of the lack of notice not apparent upon the face of the order. In view of the fact that the plaintiff himself recognized the new attorney and advised with him regarding the settlement, the defendant and its attorney had a right to presume that the order was regularly made.

Moreover, this presumption attends the order of the superior court when presented to this court for review upon appeal, and it is incumbent upon the appellant, in order to procure a reversal, to overcome the presumption by affirmative proof in the record to the effect that no such notice was given. As we have seen, the record fails to contain such proof. From all these considerations we are satisfied that the order appealed from, so far as it rests upon the validity of the change of attorneys, must be considered upon the theory that the change was regularly made. This being the case, there was no ground for the claim that the court below should have vacated the order of dismissal.

[6-8] There was no evidence of fraud in making the settlement. The money agreed upon was paid by the defendant and accepted by the plaintiff. He has neither returned it or offered to return it. The only statement in the record tending to establish fraud is that of the plaintiff and his former attorney, Dormitzer, that the consideration paid was small and inadequate. These statements are mere matters of opinion, not binding upon the court below, and they are directly denied by the affidavit on behalf of the defendant. Even if true, it is well settled that inadequacy of consideration alone, at least unless such as to shock the conscience, does not constitute or establish fraud. 2 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. § 926. There is no proof of any advantage whatever having been taken of the plaintiff. In the course of the negotiations for settlement he consulted several attorneys. The defendant's attorney persistently refused to advise him in the matter. After consulting with such attorneys as he desired he voluntarily accepted the offer made by the defendant's agent. No reason appears why it should not have been confirmed by the court if the matter had come before it on the merits. Under these circumstances it would be idle to vacate the proceedings even if there were irregularities sufficient for that purpose. A judgment will not be vacated for irregularity in procedure if it appears that upon the merits it was just and right. The party applying for such relief must show that he would be injured if the judgment is allowed to stand. Preston v. Hill, 38 Cal. 686; Collins v. Scott, 100 Cal. 446, 34 Pac. 1085; Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 417, 77 Pac. 1007. It is a proper case for the application of section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution, providing that no judgment shall be reversed unless upon a consideration of the whole record the court is of the opinion that there has been a miscarriage of justice in the court below.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Jennie Harris and another against A. P. Johnson. From an adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert C. Gortner and Charles S. Davis, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Stephen Monteleone and Fulwider & Monteleone, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff Jennie Harris in a collision with the defendant's automobile. The case was tried by the court, a jury having been expressly waived. The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the plaintiffs, and thereupon entered judgment against the defendant for $1,500. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for new trial.

The court found that while plaintiff Jennie Harris was crossing West Seventh street in Los Angeles, after alighting from a street car, the "defendant's automobile was carelessly and negligently being driven on the left side of said West Seventh street, and while so traveling on the left-hand side of said West Seventh street, said defendant struck said plaintiff Jennie Harris with his automobile," causing the injury complained of. It is contended that this finding is unsupported by the evidence.

[1] It must be noted that there is no finding that the defendant was driving faster than was consistent with reasonable care or that he was guilty of any negligence, except that of driving his automobile westerly on the left side of the street. Seventh street runs easterly and westerly. Driving along the left-hand side of a street is not, of itself, an act of negligence. It becomes so, if at all, only because of the surrounding circumstances or because it has been forbidden by law, or by an ordinance of the city.

The evidence shows without conflict that the plaintiff had alighted from a street car going westerly on Seventh street and was standing on the northerly curb intending to go to the southerly side of the street. Before attempting to cross she waited until the car from which she alighted had passed on. There was another street car standing still immediately behind that car. The motorman of the standing car motioned to her to cross in front of the car, which she proceeded to do. The defendant was, at this time, coming westerly in his automobile on the same street and behind this street car, and seeing the standing car and the right-hand side of the street blockaded temporarily by several wagons, passed the street car on the left side and in doing so ran his automobile along the left half of the street, striking the plaintiff and knocking her down as she emerged from in front of the standing street car and was crossing the street.

At the time of the accident there was in force in Los Angeles city ordinance No. 21,552, N. S., sections 2 to 6, inclusive, being introduced in evidence. The material portions thereof read as follows:

"Sec. 2. Every person riding, propelling or in charge of any vehicle in or upon any street in the city of Los Angeles shall ride, drive or propel such vehicle upon such streets in a careful manner and with due regard for the safety and convenience of the pedestrians and all other vehicles upon such streets."

"Sec. 3. Every person riding, driving propelling or in charge of any vehicle upon meeting any other vehicle at any place, upon any street within the city of Los Angeles, shall turn to the right and upon all occasions shall travel upon the right-hand side of said street, and as near the right-hand curb thereof as possible."

"Sec. 5. Every person riding, driving, propelling or in charge of any vehicle shall, in overtaking and passing other vehicles, in and upon any streets within the city of Los Angeles, pass to the left of said vehicle, and the person in charge of such vehicle so overtaken and passed shall give way to the right."

[2, 3] The contention of the appellant is that he was acting entirely within his rights in using the northerly or right-hand portion of the southerly half of said street; the claim being that such portion was the only part of the street open for travel at that time, and further that section 5 of the ordinance, above quoted, authorized the defendant to pass to the left of the street car, as he did. Section 3 of the ordinance, above quoted, provides that any person driving or in charge of a vehicle on any street in Los Angeles shall upon all occasions travel on the right-hand side of said street. The use of the left side of Seventh street was, under the circumstances, a violation of that section. It is well settled in this state that the violation of an ordinance is a breach of duty toward the person injured by such violation. It is presumptive evidence of negligence, which, if not excused by the circumstances shown, is sufficient proof of negligence to support an award of damages to the injured person in an action based on such charge of negligence. McKune v. Santa Clara, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 486, 42 Pac. 980; Cragg v. Los Angeles Trust Co., 154 Cal. 667, 98 Pac. 1063, 16 Ann. Cas. 1061; 1 Shear. & Redf. on Negligence, § 13. The defendant must therefore be deemed to have been negligent unless he is excused by section 5 of the ordinance above quoted, providing that any person in overtaking and passing other vehicles shall pass to the left of said vehicle and the vehicle being so overtaken and passed shall give way to the right. Obviously, the word "vehicles," in this section, does not include street cars, since they must travel upon a fixed track and cannot give way to the right. The section applies only to vehicles that are able to turn to the right or left, and it does not authorize or require the driver of an automobile to go upon the left-hand side of the street in order to pass a street car. In that operation the driver must follow section 3 and pass along the right-hand side. Defendant's negligence was therefore clearly established.

[4, 5] The appellant further contends that even if it is shown that he was negligent, the evidence also shows that plaintiff was equally negligent in crossing the street as she did. The contention is without merit. "The general rule is that every person has a right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law, and in the absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise it is not negligence to assume that he is not exposed to danger which comes to him only from violation of law or duty by such other-person." 29 Cyc. 516; Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal. App. 242, 137 Pac. 1078. Such person must, of course, himself use reasonable care to observe the conduct of the other person so far as such conduct may affect his own safety at the time. The plaintiff had the right to assume that the defendant's automobile, or any other vehicle coming westerly on Seventh street, would confine its travel to the right-hand side of the street as provided in the ordinance aforesaid, unless and until, in the reasonably careful use of her faculties, she had reasonable cause to believe otherwise. There was evidence to show that before attempting to cross the street she looked in both directions, and used ordinary care to ascertain whether or not any vehicle was approaching, and that she did not see the defendant's automobile coming, notwithstanding such caution. The defendant testified that he was traveling at the rate of 15 to 18 miles an hour at the time he discovered the plaintiff crossing the street 15 or 20 feet in front of him. Assuming that the defendant was, obedient to the ordinance aforesaid, traveling on the right-hand side of the street before he attempted to overtake and pass the street car, and bearing in mind the rate of speed at which he was traveling, it would have been possible for the plaintiff, when passing from in front of the standing street car to the south side of the street, to have looked toward the east without seeing anything of the defendant's approaching automobile. The evidence was sufficient to exonerate her from the charge of contributory negligence.

No other points are presented in support of the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

AUERBACH et al. v. HEALY et al.

HEALY et al. v. AUERBACH et al.

(L. A. 3868.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡36(1) — PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

In action for reformation of contracts the complaint should allege what the real agreement was, what the agreement as reduced to writing was, and where the writing fails to embody the real agreement, and, if correction of the description of land is sought, the complaint must describe the premises so as to render certain the location and boundaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 141, 143, 146; Dec. Dig. ⚡36(1).]

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡36(3)—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

The complaint should aver facts showing how the mistake was made, whose mistake it was, and what brought it about, so that the mutuality may appear; and, if the mistake was of one party which the other at the time knew or suspected, as specified in Civ. Code, § 3399, stating grounds for revision of contracts, the facts showing such mistake must be alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 144; Dec. Dig. ⚡36(3).]

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡36(1)—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

A complaint in action to reform deed, not alleging agreement to sell and convey, nor the true description of the land, nor the claimed interest of the plaintiff, was fatally defective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 141, 143, 146; Dec. Dig. ⚡36(1).]

4. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡26—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

No one can maintain an action to reform a deed or other contract unless he has some title or interest to be subserved or protected by such reformation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 91-100; Dec. Dig. ⚡26.]

5. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡36(3) — PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

A complaint to reform a deed, alleging that the words "in block 7" were omitted, is defective where it does not show that the lot is not accurately described without these words, as by averment that there is more than one block in the subdivision described so that the number of the lot alone would not suffice to locate the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 144; Dec. Dig. ⚡36(3).]

6. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡36(3) — PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

A complaint in action to reform a deed declaring merely that "the draftsman omitted to insert in said description the block in which said lot of land was located" is insufficient, as not showing a mistake was made, since both parties may have fully understood and intended the omission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 144; Dec. Dig. ⚡36(3).]

7. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡36(1) — PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

In a complaint in action to reform a deed, the statement that, in order to make the deed "conform to the actual intention of the parties," it must be amended as stated, is a mere conclusion as to the effect of the deed, and is not sufficient as a statement of the intention of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 141, 143, 146; Dec. Dig. ⚡36(1).]

8. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡46 — FINDINGS.

In action to reform a deed, findings omitting to find on the issue of execution of the deed sought to be reformed were insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 194; Dec. Dig. ⚡46.]

9. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡26—PERSONS ENTITLED TO REFORMATION.

A husband cannot sue to reform a deed to property which is the separate property of his wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. ⚡91-100; Dec. Dig. ⚡26.]

10. TRIAL ⚡404(1)—FINDINGS.

A finding that all the allegations of a pleading "are not true" is not a finding that all of them are untrue or that any particular one of them is untrue.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Actions by Joseph Auerbach and another against Eva G. Healy and another, and by Charles F. Healy and another against Joseph Auerbach and another, consolidated by order of the superior court for purposes of trial, decision, and judgment. From judgment for Joseph Auerbach and another, Charles F. Healy and another appeal. Reversed.

W. R. Law, of Los Angeles, for appellants. M. Randall, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Although two actions are here involved, there was but one judgment and but one appeal.

On September 27, 1913, Charles F. Healy and Eva G. Healy, his wife, filed a complaint against Joseph Auerbach and Louise Auerbach, his wife, to recover possession of and quiet title to a parcel of land, of which said plaintiffs were alleged to be the owners, described as "lot 13, block 7, of Belle-Vernon Acres," according to the map thereof recorded in the office of the county recorder, situated in Los Angeles county. This action was numbered in the superior court B-5060. Auerbach and wife filed an answer on October 10, 1913, denying the ownership of the Healys, and alleging that said defendants were the owners in fee and were in possession of the premises.

On December 12, 1913, Auerbach and wife filed a complaint against Healy and wife praying for the reformation of a certain deed therein set forth in full, executed by Eva G. Healy, the defendant, to Joseph Auerbach. This action was numbered in the superior court B-7391. Healy and wife answered this complaint, denying the execution of the deed sought to be reformed, and denying that there was any mistake therein, or that it does not properly describe the premises intended to be conveyed, and alleging that the deed was executed without any consideration and that it was obtained by means of threats to imprison the husband of the said Eva G. Healy. They also filed a cross-complaint to quiet title against the claims of Auerbach and wife to the lot and to recover possession thereof.

For the purposes of trial, decision, and judgment the cases were consolidated by order of the superior court. The court made its decision in writing intended to cover both cases, and thereupon gave judgment dismissing the action of the Healys, and further, that the deed set forth in the complaint in Auerbach v. Healy be reformed in accordance with the complaint in said action so that the description of the lot conveyed thereby should read thus, "Lot 13, block 7, of Belle-Vernon Acres, as per map recorded in Book 9, page 196, of Maps, in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, state of California," and directing the defendant Eva G. Healy to make and deliver to Joseph Auerbach a grant deed in accordance with the judgment, and for costs. From this judgment, Healy and wife appeal.

[1, 2] The rules of pleading in actions for the reformation of contracts are well established and should be familiar. The complaint should allege "what the real agreement was, what the agreement as reduced to writing was, and where the writing fails to embody the real agreement." 34 Cyc. 972. If the complaint seeks the correction of a description of land, "the pleading must describe the premises so as to render certain the location and boundaries." 34 Cyc. 973. It is necessary to aver facts showing how the mistake was made, whose mistake it was, and what brought it about, so that the mutuality may appear. 34 Cyc. 974; 14 Ency. Plead. & Prac. 42; Wright v. Shafter, 48 Cal. 275. In this state mutuality is not always necessary. It is sufficient if there was "a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected." Civ. Code, § 3399. But the facts showing a mistake of that character in such a case must likewise be alleged.

[3-5] The complaint in Auerbach v. Healy and the findings are fatally defective in many particulars. In the absence of a demurrer, great liberality has been indulged in order to sustain faulty complaints in actions to reform contracts. Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 495, 27 Pac. 429; Seegelken v. Corey, 93 Cal. 95, 28 Pac. 849; Peasley v. McFadden, 68 Cal. 616, 10 Pac. 179; Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 488, 24 Pac. 930. But the complaint in Auerbach v. Healy is lacking in substance as well as in form, and cannot be upheld under the most liberal rule. From the record as a whole we infer that Eva G. Healy has sold and agreed to convey to Joseph Auerbach the tract of land above described. These facts, however, are not alleged in the complaint. It is alleged that on July 15, 1913, Eva G. Healy executed to Joseph Auerbach the grant deed copied in the complaint, but whether in pursuance of a sale or other agreement does not appear. The claim of Auerbach, as appearing elsewhere, is that the true description of the lot is "lot numbered 13 in Block numbered 7 of Belle-Vernon Acres." But this is not alleged in the complaint. Nor is it alleged that Auerbach or his wife, or both of them, have or claim any right, title, or interest, legal or equitable, in the lot in question, or in any property whatever. There can be no doubt of the proposition that no one can maintain an action to reform a deed or other contract unless he has some title or interest to be subverted or protected by such reformation. None appears in this complaint. Again, it does not appear that the mistake would be material if it were properly alleged. The claim is that the words "in block 7" were omitted from the description. Nothing is alleged to show that the lot is not accurately described without these words. There is no averment that there is more than one block in Belle-Vernon Acres, or that there is more than one lot numbered 13 in the entire tract. If, as a matter of fact, Belle-Vernon Acres contains but one lot 13, the deed would be effective as it is, and no reformation would be necessary. The statement that the description "should have contained the words 'block 7' after the word 'of' and before the words 'Belle-Vernon Acres'" is a mere opinion, since the complaint nowhere alleges the fact that the words "block 7" are a part of the true description.

[6, 7] The making of the mistake itself is not properly alleged. It declares that "the draftsman omitted to insert in said description the block in which said lot of land was located." Nevertheless, both parties may have fully understood it, and may have intended it to be as it is. The identity of the draftsman does not appear. The statement "that in order to make said deed properly pass the title to said premises and properly describe the same and to make it conform to the actual intention of the parties, it is necessary that the description should be amended so as to read as follows: Lot 13, block 7, 'Belle-Vernon Acres,' as per map, recorded in Book 9, page 196, of Maps, in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles County, state of California"—is not an allegation stating what the intention of the parties was. It states only that, in order to make the deed "conform to the actual intention of the parties," it must be amended as stated. This is a mere conclusion as to the effect of the deed, and is not a statement of the intention. Under the liberal rule applying in the absence of a demurrer for uncertainty, this might be held to be sufficient, if there were no other defects in the complaint. But, in view of the other faults we have mentioned, we cannot approve of the pleading nor hold that it states a cause of action.

[8-10] The findings do not cover all of the material issues. The answer in Auerbach v. Healy denied the execution of the deed sought to be reformed. This was a material allegation. If it was never executed at all, it is plain that no action could be maintained for its reformation. There is no finding on that issue. The findings state that the real property mentioned in plaintiff's complaint "at the commencement of this action was the separate property of Eva Healy." If this finding were true, it is clear that Joseph Auerbach could have no interest therein and no right to claim a reformation of the deed. Further, the findings say "that all of the allegations in defendants' answer are not true," and as to the second defense "that all of the allegations therein contained are not true at the time of the commencement of this action." The allegations of the "second defense," assuming the phrase to mean the second defense of the Heals to the action of Auerbach and wife, do not relate to the time of the commencement of the action. Moreover, a finding that all of the allegations "are not true" is not a finding that all of them are untrue, or that any particular one of them is untrue. The finding does not negative the fact that some of them may have been true. The respondent Joseph Auerbach should be allowed to amend his pleadings. It seems altogether probable that he may be able truthfully to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. As the record stands, the judgment is not sustained by the pleadings or by the findings. The judgment is reversed.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 15, 1917.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 132(4) — NOTICE OF LIEN—NOTICE OF COMPLETION OF CONTRACT—COMPUTATION OF TIME.

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1187, provides that every person save the original contractor who claims a lien shall within 30 days after cessation of labor, or 30 days after completion of the original contract, file for record a claim of lien, and that filing of notice of completion shall be equivalent to a completion, and that the owner may within 10 days of the completion of any contract or within 40 days after cessation from labor thereon file notice of completion. Held, that a claim of a materialman if filed within 30 days after filing of notice of completion is within the time, whether filed within 30 days of actual completion or not.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 132(4) — NOTICE OF LIEN—NOTICE OF COMPLETION OF CONTRACT—COMPUTATION OF TIME.

If no notice of completion is filed, the claimant need only see that his claim is filed within 90 days after completion, and if the owner fails to file a notice of completion within 10 days after actual completion or 40 days after cessation of labor, the claimant may rely on the estoppel to prevent the owner from disputing the timely filing of the action.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Hughes Manufacturing & Lumber Company against Lillian Hathaway. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Arthur Wright, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Frank D. McClure, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff sued to foreclose a lien for the price of certain materials furnished by it to a building contractor to be used in the construction of four buildings upon a lot owned by the defendants, which said contractor had agreed to erect thereon for said owners. The building contract was not recorded in the office of the county recorder. It appears to have been a single contract for the erection of the four buildings.

The buildings were completed on August 7, 1913. On August 16, 1913, the defendants, as owners, filed in the office of the county recorder a notice of completion of said buildings, in accordance with section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thirty days thereafter, that is, on September 15, 1913, the plaintiff filed for record in said recorder's office a claim of lien on said lot for the amount due it from said contractor for said materials.

[1] The court below sustained the demurrer on the ground that the 30-day period of time after completion, allowed for filing claims of lien by a materialman, begins to run upon the date of the completion of the contract under which the materials were furnished, and not upon the date of the filing of the notice of completion thereof, and hence, that where the actual completion was on August 7th, a claim of lien filed on September 15th is too late, although it was filed within 30 days from the filing of the notice of completion. The soundness of this theory is the sole question presented for decision. No other objection is made to the complaint. We are of the opinion that the court below was in error.

The portions of section 1187 material to the question are as follows:

"Every person save the original contractor claiming the benefit of this chapter, within thirty days after he has ceased to labor or has ceased to furnish materials, or both; or at his option, within thirty days after the completion of the original contract, if any, under which he was employed, must file for record with the county recorder of the county, * * * a claim of lien. * * * Any trivial imperfection in the said work, or in the completion of any contract by any lien claimant, or in the construction of any building, * * * shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien; and, in all cases, any of the following shall be deemed equivalent to a completion for all the purposes of this chapter:

The occupation or use of a building, improvement, or structure, by the owner, or his representative; or the acceptance by said owner or said agent, of said building, improvement, or structure, or cessation from labor for thirty days upon any contract or upon any building, improvement or structure or the alteration, addition to, or repair thereof; the filing of the notice hereinafter provided for. The owner may within ten days after completion of any contract, or within forty days after cessation from labor thereon, file for record in the office of the county recorder of the county where the property is situated, a notice setting forth the date when the same was completed, or on which cessation from labor occurred" (with other particulars). "In case such notice be not so filed then the said owner and all persons derailing title from or claiming any interest through him shall be estopped in any proceedings for the foreclosure of any lien provided for in this chapter from maintaining any defense therein * * * on the ground that said lien was not filed within the time provided in this chapter: Provided, that all claims of lien must be filed within ninety days after the completion of any building," etc.

The filing of a notice of completion is therein declared to be "equivalent to a completion for all the purposes of this chapter." In connection with the language preceding this declaration it must be understood to mean that the filing of such notice of completion is the equivalent of the "completion of the original contract," previously mentioned as the thing which starts running the 30-day period, and that a claim of lien by a materialman or laborer, if filed within 30 days after the filing of such notice, will be deemed to be within the time prescribed, whether within 30 days after the actual completion or not.

The scheme of the section with respect to liens under the optional clause, that is, lien claims not filed within 30 days after the doing of the labor or furnishing of the material, but within 30 days after the completion of the contract, is comparatively simple.

It is to be noted that it is not always the completion of the entire building that sets running the time for filing the notice of completion and the optional time for the filing of claims. It may be "the completion of the original contract," as to claims of lien, or the "completion of any contract," as to the notice of completion, and in either case such contract may be for the construction of only a part of the building, the stone work, the brick work, or the foundations, for example, and such "contract" may be completed long before the completion of the entire building. The 10 days allowed for filing the notice of completion of such a contract begins to run at the time of its actual completion by the contractor. The lien claimant for materials furnished or labor done under such contract may not know the time of actual completion thereof, and the statute intends that he need not inquire diligently concerning it. He may watch the files of the county recorder and rely on the filing of the notice of completion, which, for the purpose of his time to file his claim of lien, is deemed to be the equivalent of the completion of the original contract under which he claims, and he may then file his claim within 30 days after the filing of such notice.

[2] If no notice of completion is filed, the claimant is only required to see that his claim is filed before the expiration of the period of 90 days after the completion of the building, that is, of the building as a whole, as provided in the last clause of the section. If his claim is filed within that period and also within 30 days after the filing of the notice of completion of the contract under which he claims, he may rest secure that it is filed in time. If he files the claim within 90 days after completion of the building, and the owner fails to file a notice of the completion of the original contract under which the lien is claimed, within 10 days after its actual completion or 40 days after cessation of labor thereon, the claimant may rely on the estoppel created by the statute to prevent the owner from disputing the timely filing of the action.

[3] The phrase "completion of the building," etc., as used in the last clause of the section, fixing the 90-day period, must be understood to mean either the actual completion, or the completion by cessation of labor for 30 days upon the building, etc., or completion by occupation or acceptance, as the case may be. As used in that clause it cannot be held to mean the completion effected by operation of law when the notice of actual completion is filed.

The allegations of the complaint show that the claim of lien was filed in time. The demurrer should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨80(5), 82(1)—FINAL JUDGMENTS.

In corporation dissolution proceedings, where a judgment was rendered that the charter was forfeited, and thereafter the court ordered the trustees to distribute moneys in their hands, and further ordered them to sell the property of the company at public auction, the later orders were appealable either as special orders made after final judgment, under direct provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, or as final judgments; for, since the effect of the execution of the orders would be to take the property sold from the control of the court and of the parties and to put the money distributed beyond the power of the court and out of the litigation so that it could not be regained or affected by subsequent proceedings, the orders were final so far as the property to be disposed of under them was concerned.

3. VENUE ⇨5(1)—ACTIONS REGARDING REALTY—CORPORATION DISSOLUTION PROCEEDINGS.

Notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that actions involving real estate shall be brought in the county where the land is situated, corporation dissolution proceedings, although involving sale of the real property of the corporation, may be brought in another county than that in which the real property of the corporation lies, since the determination of an interest in real estate is but incidental to the main relief sought.

9. CORPORATIONS ⇨619—DISSOLUTION—POWER OF STATUTORY TRUSTEES—INTERVENTION BY EQUITY.

By St. 1907, p. 746, § 2, giving statutory trustees, upon the forfeiture of corporate charter for nonpayment of license tax, full powers to settle the affairs of the corporation, etc., the whole matter of liquidation and distribution to the stockholders is left to the exclusive control of such trustees, whose exercise of power is not subject to judicial intervention or control in the absence of a showing of neglect or abuse of power.

10. CORPORATIONS ¶619—DISSOLUTION—POWER OF STATUTORY TRUSTEES—INTERVENTION BY EQUITY.

Under such statutes it is not a necessary part of the duty of the trustees to find a buyer for the corporation's land, or sell the same, provided they have sufficient money to pay the debts and settle the corporate affairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2459, 2460; Dec. Dig. ¶619.]

11. CORPORATIONS ¶629—DISSOLUTION—DUTIES OF STATUTORY TRUSTEES.

Statutory trustees are not required to distribute the excess of the corporation's money in their hands over the corporation's debts, where it does not appear that such excess may not be necessary to pay expenses of settling the corporate affairs, etc.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Edmund A. Rossi against Arthur J. Caire and others. From an order directing the distribution of certain money among stockholders, etc., and from an order denying new trial, the named and certain other defendants appeal. Reversed, and interlocutory judgment and subsequent proceedings vacated.

Joseph F. Bluxome and Frank P. Deering, both of San Francisco, for appellants. D. Freidenrich, Ambrose Gherini, and George J. Steiger, Jr., all of San Francisco (Orrin K. McMurray, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. This case involves two appeals, one from an order made on April 3, 1914, directing the distribution of certain money among the stockholders of the Santa Cruz Island Company and directing the defendants as trustees to sell the real and personal property of said company at public auction, the other being an appeal from an order denying the motion of the appellants for a new trial.

The Santa Cruz Island Company was incorporated under the California law in 1869 for the purpose of carrying on the business of raising and selling cattle and acquiring such property, real and personal, as should be convenient for that business. Its principal place of business was San Francisco. It acquired a large amount of personal property, and also Santa Cruz island, situated in the Pacific Ocean in Santa Barbara county, containing about 54,000 acres of land. On the 30th day of November, 1911, by reason of its failure to pay the license tax due under the act of March 20, 1905, and amendments thereto, said company forfeited its corporate charter. At that time the defendants, Arthur J. Caire, Fred F. Caire, Albina

C. S. Caire, Delphine A. Caire, and Aglae S. Capuccio, were the directors of said corporation. The capital stock of the corporation was $50,000, divided into one hundred shares of the par value of $500 each. At the time of said forfeiture of the corporate charter one Amelie A. Rossi owned seven of said shares. The remaining shares were owned in various amounts by the defendants in the case. On May 23, 1912, Amelie A. Rossi transferred to the plaintiff, Edmund A. Rossi, her seven shares and all her interest as stockholder in and to the property and assets of the corporation. Thereafter the said plaintiff began this action. Its object as shown by the prayer of the complaint, is to enjoin the aforesaid directors from carrying on the business of the corporation and to compel them, as trustees thereof, to wind up its affairs, pay its debts, and distribute its assets to the stockholders according to their interests, and, specifically, that they thereupon distribute to the plaintiff seven one-hundredths of said assets.

Answers were filed raising issues of fact, the cause was tried and on June 9, 1913, the court made its findings and conclusions of law and thereupon gave an interlocutory judgment declaring that the charter of the company was forfeited on November 30, 1911; that the said directors thereupon became trustees of said corporation and its stockholders, charged with the duty of settling its affairs; that the plaintiff and the other stockholders were entitled to an accounting from the trustees of the property and effects of the corporation and to have distributed to them, after payment of its debts, their respective shares of said property. The decree also directed the trustees to publish a notice to the creditors requiring them to present their claims within a time stated, and that all claims not so presented would be barred from payment out of the funds in the hands of the trustees, and that they file a true and correct inventory of all of said property. It declared that all other proceedings in the settlement of the affairs of the company and distribution of its property were reserved for subsequent determination.

Thereafter the plaintiff moved the court for an order requiring the said trustees to distribute to the plaintiff and other stockholders the surplus funds in their hands, as shown by their account filed December 19, 1913, and also directing them to sell the real and personal property of the corporation in their possession as trustees at public auction, after such notice and on such terms as the court should see proper. On April 3, 1914, the court, in pursuance of said motion, ordered the trustees to distribute $35,000 of the money in their hands derived from the property of said corporation, proportionately to the respective stockholders, within 20 days thereafter, and further ordered that said trustees proceed to sell the real and personal property of said company, at public auction for cash, after giving a certain prescribed notice. It is from this order that the appeal first mentioned is taken. The order denying a new trial, from which the second appeal is taken, was made upon a motion of the defendants to vacate the interlocutory judgment and the orders aforesaid, and for a new trial, on the grounds that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and interlocutory judgment or the said orders, that each of them was against law, and for errors of law occurring at the trial.

Two preliminary jurisdictional questions are presented which must first be determined.

[1, 2] 1. The plaintiff contends that the orders of April 3, 1914, directing the sale and distribution of the corporate property are not appealable. We cannot assent to this proposition. If the judgment of June 9, 1913, is regarded as a final judgment, as plaintiff insists, then the orders of April 3, 1914, would be appealable as special orders made after final judgment. Code Civ. Proc., § 963, subd. 2. That judgment, however, merely declared the status of the plaintiff as a stockholder, the number of his shares, his right to distribution, and directed the trustees to give notice to creditors and file an inventory of the assets of the corporation. In its nature and effect it was preliminary and interlocutory, and not final. Grey v. Brennan, 147 Cal. 355, 81 Pac. 1014. The subsequent procedure by motion may have been unusual, but the result was the taking of further evidence and the making of orders for the distribution of the money on hand and the sale of the property. These orders were final in the same sense as any order for the sale of property or for the distribution of funds in litigation is final. The effect of the execution of the orders would be to take the property sold from the possession and control of the court and of the parties and put the money distributed beyond the power of the court and out of the litigation, so that it could not be regained or affected by the subsequent proceedings. Such adjudications have always been held to be appealable as final judgments, because they are final so far as the property to be disposed of under them is concerned. Los Angeles v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 134 Cal. 123, 66 Pac. 198; Anglo-Californian Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 755, 96 Pac. 803; Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 32. We are of the opinion that these orders are appealable as final judgments, and further that upon such appeal there may be a review of the previous proceedings including the sufficiency of the findings to support the interlocutory judgment.

[3] 2. The other objection to the jurisdiction is that the action is for the determination of an interest in real property situated in Santa Barbara county, and that, under section 5, art. 6, of the Constitution, jurisdiction thereof is vested exclusively in the superior court of that county, and that the action will not lie in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. The point is not tenable. The action is not for the determination of an interest in real property, but is an action in equity to compel the trustees to perform duties which it is claimed are imposed upon them by the law. The determination of the interests of the parties is only incidental to the relief which is the main object of the action; that object being to place the trustees under the control and supervision of the court and compel them to proceed in the execution of their trust. It is not the determination of an interest in specific property, but only of the number of the shares of the several stockholders in the corporate assets of every description which are to be administered by the trustees for their benefit.

3. The findings do not show any ground for the intervention of a court of equity to supervise or direct the proceedings of the trustees. They state the facts relating to the incorporation of the company, the approximate value and character of its property, the amount and number of shares of its capital stock, the names of the stockholders and the number of shares held by each, the forfeiture of its charter as aforesaid, and that the defendants were at that time its directors. They then proceed to state that, when this suit was begun, the debts of the corporation amounted to $10,000, and the trustees had on hand $17,000 in money of the corporation; that they did not apply the funds on hand to the payment of the debts, nor distribute the surplus thereof to the stockholders, nor make any effort to find a buyer for the real property; that plaintiff did not, before beginning the action, demand of said trustees that they wind up the affairs of the corporation and distribute the property thereof to the stockholders; and, further, that said trustees "have not since the forfeiture of the charter of said corporation conducted or carried on the business of said corporation, and said trustees have not neglected their duties. They have made sales of personal property of said corporation for cash, which they now have on hand."

The finding that the trustees have not conducted or carried on the corporate business since the forfeiture was apparently made in response to a charge in the complaint that since the forfeiture they had conducted and still continue to conduct the corporate business in the same manner as before the forfeiture, with the intent to reinstate the corporate existence under an enabling act which it was expected would be enacted by the Legislature, and that this was done without the consent of the plaintiff or his assignor. The finding disposes of that charge.

There is also a finding that Amelie A. Rossi, before transferring her seven shares to the plaintiff, had requested the trustees to convey to her an undivided seven one-hundredths of the real property of the corporation, claiming at the time that the personal property was ample for the payment of the corporate debts and of all the expenses of the settlement of its affairs.

It does not appear that at the time the request last mentioned was made the trustees had sold any personal property, or had on hand enough money to pay the debts and expenses. Consequently, even if we assume for the moment that the title to the land was vested in the trustees, and that a conveyance from them to the stockholders was necessary to clothe them with the title, the finding that the trustees have not neglected their duties necessarily implies that the affairs of the company were not then in a condition to make it their present duty to convey the title to the stockholders, and that the failure to convey was not a breach of their duty as trustees.

The amendment of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 746, § 2) to the act of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 493, § 10a) provides that upon the forfeiture of a corporate charter thereunder the directors then in office "are deemed to be trustees of the corporation and stockholders * * * and have full power to settle the affairs of the corporation." It also gives them power to maintain and defend actions pending by or against the corporation and to take all legal proceedings necessary to fully settle the corporate affairs, and provides that they may be sued by any person having a claim against the corporation.

[4-6] The directors of a corporation, before its dissolution, do not, by virtue of their office, hold or possess any title to or interest in the property of the corporation. The title is wholly vested in the corporation. The above statute providing that, upon forfeiture of the charter, the directors shall become trustees for the corporation and its stockholders to settle its affairs, does not purport to invest the trustees with any title to the property formerly belonging to the corporation. They get by the forfeiture nothing more than the statute gives them, and that is merely a power over the property, not the title. The corporation having ceased to exist, it is no longer capable of holding the title or the possession, the property belongs to the persons who were its stockholders at the time it ceased to be a corporation (Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 362, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192), and the right of possession passes to the directors by force of the statute making them trustees to settle the corporate affairs, since such right must be necessary for that purpose.

[7-9] The duties of the trustees are measured by their powers and by the principles of law and equity applicable to the conditions. They have in their possession property belonging to others, they are bound to settle the affairs of the former owner, and they have all the power to deal with and dispose of the property that is necessary to accomplish that object. The interests they are to serve are the interests of the stockholders to whom the property belongs and of the creditors of the defunct corporation whose debts constitute a paramount charge upon that property. The forfeiture declared by the statute takes place instantly upon the failure to pay the license tax within the time allowed. It may strike the corporation dead while it is a going concern with large operations or contracts in process of completion which, if not prosecuted to the end, may entail great loss to the stockholders. It may occur while debts are owing, but not yet due or payable. The property may be in a condition reasonably requiring further and continued work for its preservation or to make it valuable. The obvious purpose of this statute, in view of these circumstances, is, as was said in the Havemeyer Case above cited, "to leave the whole matter of liquidation and distribution to the exclusive control of the directors of the corporation in office at the date of dissolution" (84 Cal. 365, 24 Pac. 129, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192), and to render it unnecessary and improper for a court to intervene in their proceedings, or to supervise the same in any particular, unless they are guilty of "neglect of duty or abuse of power" (84 Cal. 367, 24 Pac. 129, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192). In order to justify the interference of a court, says the Supreme Court of Alabama, the mere fact of dissolution, or forfeiture of the charter, is not enough; the facts appearing "must be of a character to show that the trustees are incompetent or unfaithful, or are mismanaging the property to the injury of the complainant, or are without power and authority to subserve some peculiar interest or right of the party complaining and that he is being injured thereby." Weatherly v. Capital, etc., Co., 115 Ala. 172, 22 South. 142. This language was used with reference to an application for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and administer the corporate assets, as also was the language in the Havemeyer Case, but the same principles apply to any application for the intervention of the judicial power to supersede, supervise, or control the powers conferred by the statute upon the trustees.

[10] It was not a necessary part of the statutory duty of the trustees to find a buyer for the land, or to sell the same, otherwise than in order to settle the corporate affairs. If they had money to pay all debts and expenses and all other corporate affairs were disposed of, it would be no abuse of their discretion if they merely delivered the possession of the land to the stockholders as tenants in common according to their interests, leaving them to do with it what they pleased. The fact that they did not look for a buyer is not, of itself, a breach of duty. It must also appear, in order to justify judicial interference to order a sale, that the interests of the parties and the settlement of the corporate affairs required a sale. This does not appear.

[11] As to the finding that the trustees did not distribute to the stockholders the excess of the money in their hands over the debts, it is to be observed that there is no finding that the debts were then due or payable, or that the excess would not be necessary to pay the expenses of carrying on the affairs to that date and of settlement; also that, even if this were a dereliction of duty, it would not authorize the subsequent proceedings and orders for a sale, but only an order directing the distribution of the surplus.

The respondents rely on the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Mason v. Pewabic M. Co., 133 U. S. 58, 10 Sup. Ct. 224, 33 L. Ed. 524, to the effect that the rights of a stockholder in the corporate assets upon the dissolution do not differ from those of each partner on a dissolution to have the partnership property converted into money by a sale, even though a sale may not be necessary to pay the debts. The remark was made in the course of discussion and with reference to facts unlike those of the case at bar. There the corporation had dissolved by expiration of its charter. The directors in office had disregarded this fact, had carried on the business of the corporation for 11 months, had levied and collected an assessment of $88,000 on the stock, and in pursuance of a vote of the holders of a majority of the stock were about to transfer all the property to a new company with the intent to compel the minority stockholders to exchange their stock for a like amount of stock in the new company, without their consent and against their will. The suit was by the minority stockholders to enjoin this transfer and the proceedings to that end, to have a receiver appointed, and to compel a settlement of the corporate affairs. In such case it is doubtless true that the stockholders might ask for and obtain an order for a sale of the property. The decision is authority for the proposition that neither the trustees nor the majority stockholders can compel the minority to join in the formation of a new corporation and transfer their shares to it, but it is not applicable to the point under discussion. The trustees there were acting in violation of the duties of their trust. The case is not applicable here.

The consequence of these conclusions is that the interlocutory judgment, and all the subsequent proceedings and orders are unsupported by the facts and without authority. On the facts found the judgment should have been for the defendants.

The briefs discuss at length the question whether or not it was within the power of the trustees to relieve the corporation from the forfeiture and reinstate it as a corporation, without the consent of all the stockholders, by paying the license taxes, as provided in the amendment of section 6 of the act, which took effect August 10, 1913, after the entry of the interlocutory judgment. Stats. 1913, p. 513. A supplemental answer was filed by appellants alleging such reinstatement. The conclusions we have reached render it unnecessary to consider this question.

The orders appealed from are reversed, and the interlocutory judgment and all subsequent proceedings vacated.

NEALE v. MORROW. (S. F. 7034.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 15, 1917.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐528(3)—STATEMENT OF FACTS — DELAY IN MOVING FOR NEW TRIAL.

A proposed statement of facts prepared under Code Civ. Proc. § 661, providing for such a statement subsequent to the ruling on a motion for new trial, cannot be considered where the court had no jurisdiction over the motion for new trial because the notice thereof was not filed in time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2388; Dec. Dig. ⇐528(3).]

2. NEW TRIAL ⇐119 — MOTION — DELAY IN FILING—RELIEF.

The trial court, even under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing it in furtherance of justice to allow a party to amend any pleading, or proceeding, and to enlarge the time for answer or demurrer, could not relieve the defeated party of the consequences of his failure to file a motion for new trial within the time required.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 243; Dec. Dig. ⇐119.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐528(3)—STATEMENT OF FACTS — DELAY IN MOVING FOR NEW TRIAL.

A proposed statement of facts prepared under Code Civ. Proc. § 661, for appeal from the denial of a new trial, cannot be considered on the appeal from the judgment where the court was without jurisdiction of the motion for new trial, though a statement settled in connection with the motion for new trial may be used on appeal from the judgment regardless of whether it was actually used on the motion for new trial or whether any appeal was taken from the denial of the new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2388; Dec. Dig. ⇐528(3).]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐553(1)—STATEMENT OF FACTS—USE AS BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where a proposed statement of facts after motion for new trial was invalid because of delay in filing notice of the motion and was filed too late to serve as a bill of exceptions under Code Civ. Proc. § 650, either the lower court or the Supreme Court could, under section 473, authorizing courts to allow a party to amend any pleading or proceeding and to enlarge the time for demurrer or answer, relieve appellant from the effect of his delay, so that the statement might be considered as a bill of exceptions, but it cannot be so considered where no application for such relief was made or granted, and the court simply settled the statement over the protest of appellee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2461, 2462, 2466-2471; Dec. Dig. ⚡553(1).]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡544(3)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE — ABSENCE OF STATEMENT OF FACTS AND BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where there is no statement of facts or bill of exceptions which can be considered, the Supreme Court can only notice errors appearing on the judgment roll alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2417, 2424, 2479; Dec. Dig. ⚡544(3).]

6. PLEADING ⚡349 — JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS—ADMISSIONS IN ANSWER.

An answer admitting the execution and nonpayment of the note sued on does not entitle plaintiff to judgment on the pleadings, where the complaint alleged the circumstances under which the note was given as a guaranty, and the answer alleged facts relieving defendant from liability on his guaranty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1067-1069; Dec. Dig. ⚡349.]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1099(3) — SUBSEQUENT APPEALS—LAW OF THE CASE.

A decision by the Supreme Court on a former appeal that the plaintiff must prove certain facts as alleged in his complaint, and that the allegations of the answer were sufficient, is conclusive against the plaintiff on a subsequent appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4372; Dec. Dig. ⚡1099(3).]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Vincent Neale, as special administrator of the estate of James Laidley, deceased, against A. E. Head, in which Robert H. Morrow, as administrator with the will annexed, of the estate of A. E. Head, was substituted as defendant. Judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Vincent Neale, of San Rafael, in pro. per. R. H. Morrow, Garber, Creswell & Garber and John O'Gara, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal upon the granting of defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The action is a revival of one to recover judgment upon a promissory note which was the subject of consideration by this court in Neale v. Head, 133 Cal. 42, 65 Pac. 131, 576. See, also, Neale v. Morrow, 150 Cal. 414, 88 Pac. 815, and Neale v. Morrow, 163 Cal. 445, 125 Pac. 1052. In the case reported in 133 Cal. 42, 65 Pac. 131, 576, a judgment rendered in plaintiff's favor and an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial were reversed. Following the last appeal, a trial in the action was held which resulted in the judgment of dismissal.

[1] The plaintiff appeals solely from the judgment contending that the court erred, in several instances, in excluding certain evidence offered for the purpose of proving the testimony of material witnesses who had testified at the former trial, but who had since died. We cannot, however, consider any of these alleged errors, as there is no legal record upon which such errors can be reviewed. The only statement of the case contained in the record is one which the plaintiff attempted to prepare under section 661 of the Code of Civil Procedure, following a denial of his motion for a new trial which was made on the minutes of the court. But the plaintiff did not initiate any valid proceedings for a new trial as contemplated by that section. It was provided therein that the statement of the case "shall be proposed by the party appealing, or intending to appeal, within ten days after the entry of the order, or such further time as the court in which the action is pending, or a judge thereof, may allow." But the plaintiff, while serving his notice of intention within 10 days after notice of the entry of judgment, did not file the notice until 21 days thereafter, notwithstanding that he had neither applied for nor obtained an order of court or a stipulation of counsel allowing such extension of time. The motion, however, was heard on the minutes of the court, at which time the defendant filed an objection thereto, upon the ground that the filing of the notice of intention in time is essential, and that the court was therefore without jurisdiction to entertain the motion for a new trial.

[2] By way of answering the objection, the plaintiff filed an affidavit setting forth various reasons and facts in explanation of his failure to file his notice within the time prescribed by the Code. But the court did not have power to consider matters offered in excuse of such failure, even under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was wholly without jurisdiction to relieve the appellant of the consequences of his failure to file the notice in time, and the right to move for a new trial was lost. Union Collection Co. v. Oliver, 162 Cal. 755, 124 Pac. 436. There being therefore no proceeding for a new trial upon which the proposed statement could rest, it was not a good statement after decision of such a motion.

[3, 4] Nor can a statement, prepared under such circumstances, have any legal efficacy as a duly authorized statement on appeal from the judgment. It is true that a statement settled in connection with a motion for a new trial may be used on such an appeal, and that the right to so use it does not depend upon the fact that it was actually used on a motion for a new trial, or that an appeal was taken from the order denying the motion for a new trial. Wall v. Mines, 128 Cal. 136, 60 Pac. 682; Kelly v. Ning Yung, etc., 133 Cal. 602, 72 Pac. 148; Vinson v. L. A. Ry. Co., 141 Cal. 151, 74 Pac. 757; Blood v. La

Serena L. Co., 150 Cal. 764, 89 Pac. 1090. But these cases were all cases in which there was a valid proceeding on a motion for a new trial, and the statement was properly prepared in connection with such proceeding. Viewed as a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal from the judgment, the proposed statement was, of course, too late. Code Civ. Proc. § 650. Notwithstanding the failure to properly initiate a proceeding for a new trial, the moving party might have been relieved by the lower court under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure from his failure to present his statement or bill of exceptions in time, that is to say, the proposed statement might have been regarded as having a double aspect—as designed to be used both on a motion for a new trial and on appeal from the judgment, and though failing in the first aspect, might have been used in the other. The court would have had jurisdiction to relieve the plaintiff from his failure to serve his proposed statement in time. Haviland v. Southern Pac. Edison Co., 158 Pac. 328; Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 42, 29 Pac. 332. But here the plaintiff made no application for relief under section 473, and the court did not undertake to grant such relief. Scott v. Glenn, 97 Cal. 513, 32 Pac. 573. It merely settled the bill over the protest of the defendant. The statement is therefore wholly void for either use on an appeal from the order denying a new trial, or on an appeal from the judgment.

[5, 6] This leaves the case to stand upon the judgment roll alone, and we can only notice errors appearing therein. The plaintiff insists that the judgment of nonsuit cannot be upheld for the reason that:

"The complaint alleges the making of a promissory note, which is set out verbatim in the complaint, and the answer admits the delivery of said note and the nonpayment."

But the complaint, after setting out the note and alleging its delivery and nonpayment, states in elaborate detail the history of the various transactions and proceedings, following the execution of the note by A. E. Head, the defendant's testator, as one of 50 guarantors of the California Mutual Life Insurance Company, including the unsuccessful efforts of the company to realize a profit on its insurance business, the involuntary insolvency in 1885, the final liquidation of its affairs, and the sale of the notes under execution. These facts are all enumerated in our former decisions in this action and need not be repeated here. See, also, Morrow v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 383, 1 Pac. 354; In re Cal. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 81 Cal. 364, 22 Pac. 869. The complaint, apparently following the decision in 133 Cal. 42, 65 Pac. 131, 576, also alleges the assignment of the note to the estate, which the plaintiff represents as special administrator, in settlement and extinguishment of a claim against the company arising out of an insurance policy on the life of the deceased. Other allegations cover matters which need not be mentioned here. Finally the complaint alleges a demand in 1888 for payment of the note and interest, and the subsequent, unsuccessful attempts to recover judgment.

The answer, admitting the making of the note under the circumstances alleged, sets up by way of defense the same matters considered and approved in Neale v. Morrow, 133 Cal. 42, 65 Pac. 131, 576, and denies, for the most part on information and belief, various material allegations of the complaint, as, for instance, the demand upon defendant's testator for payment, the assignment of the note to plaintiff as a creditor of the company, and the proceedings whereby the company was decreed insolvent. The plaintiff filed a general demurrer to the answer. He contends that inasmuch as many of the allegations of the complaint were based upon the findings of the court at the former trial, the facts covered therein had been proved and were known to the defendant, and could not be denied upon information and belief—that such denials were for that reason insufficient and must be disregarded. But the findings were nullified by the reversal of the judgment, and it was not only necessary for the plaintiff to plead and prove over again the facts material to his cause of action, but proper for the defendant to deny them.

[7] The plaintiff further argues that "all the allegations in the complaint outside those alleging the making of the note, the demand, and the nonpayment, were only required or proper to offset and forestall the plea of the statute of limitations," and "became functus officio ad hoc" upon the decision in Neale v. Morrow, 150 Cal. 414, 88 Pac. 815. But the contention is without merit. The decision of this court in 133 Cal. 42, 65 Pac. 131, 576, determined that it was necessary for plaintiff to prove the facts alleged. And that decision also held that the acts and transactions set up in the answer operated to discharge the guarantors from their liability. Even assuming that the answer admits the demand and nonpayment of the note, we cannot see how the plaintiff, in view of the reasoning of the court in that decision, now stands in any better position than he did at the former trial. The plaintiff argues at great length that the decision "is not good law," and that the answer consequently presents no legal defense to his right to recover judgment on the note. But that case constitutes a final adjudication which is conclusive as to the rights of the plaintiff in regard to all questions decided therein, and this court cannot depart from its consequences. Southern Pac. Ry. Co. v. Edmunds, 168 Cal. 415, 143 Pac. 597; Higuero v. Corea, 168 Cal. 788, 145 Pac. 529. As the answer sets up a good defense, and denies material allegations of the complaint, it was sufficient as against a general demurrer, and the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment on the pleadings. This disposes of the appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

1. SALES 52(6)—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 989, providing that parties not summoned in action on joint contract may be summoned in the action after judgment, evidence that defendant was associated in the ownership of certain placer claims with the defendant against whom judgment had been recovered by default, and that he bought supplies, for developing such claims, from plaintiffs, for which the defaulting defendant also promised to pay, held to show that defendants were jointly indebted, in view of the presumption created by Civ. Code, § 1431, that an obligation imposed on several persons is joint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by W. W. Colquhoun against Thos. W. Pack and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and denial of new trial, defendant Henry E. Lee appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Clayberg, Clark Clement, and Clayberg & Whitmore, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Jos. K. Hutchinson, of San Francisco (Walter Slack, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an action for the value of goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff's assignors to the defendants Thomas W. Pack, T. O. Toland, and Henry E. Lee at their special instance and request. The original summons was not served upon the defendant Lee. On February 4, 1913, a default judgment was entered against the defendant Pack. With this judgment as a basis, plaintiff, pursuant to the provisions of section 989 of the Code of Civil Procedure, procured the issuance of a summons directed to the defendant Lee, commanding him to show cause why he should not be bound by the judgment against Pack in the same manner as though he had been originally served with summons. Responding to this summons, defendant Lee appeared in the action by filing an answer, in which, pursuant to the provisions of section 992 of the Code of Civil Procedure, he specifically denied any liability on the obligation upon which the judgment against the defendant Pack was recovered, and thereby put in issue all the material allegations of the plaintiff's complaint as fully and effectively as he might have done in the first instance had the original summons been served upon him. Upon the issues thus raised the trial court, among other things, and in addition to finding the prior rendition and entry of the judgment against the defendant Pack, found that the plaintiff's assignor had sold and delivered goods, wares, and merchandise of the reasonable value of $953.05 to the defendants Thomas W. Pack and Henry E. Lee, and to each of them, at the special instance and request of each, and that no part of said sum had been paid save the sum of $300. From its findings the trial court deduced the conclusion of law that the defendant Lee was bound by the judgment against the defendant Pack to the extent of $653.05 with interest thereon from the 1st day of March, 1912, in the same manner as though he had been originally served with summons. Judgment was accordingly entered against Lee in the sum of $786.25, from which and an order denying a new trial he has appealed.

Upon the trial of the case the plaintiff presented the testimony of three witnesses—that of the defendant Pack and C. J. and E. J. Teagle, plaintiff's assignors. No evidence was produced and no evidence of any kind offered on behalf of the appealing defendant. The defendant Pack testified, in effect, that he and the defendants Lee and Toland were associated in the ownership of certain placer claims located by them at Searles Borax Lake; that he and they had arranged for the performance of certain assessment work to be done on these claims; that defendants Lee and Toland instructed him to take a party of laborers to the claims to do that work; that the defendant Lee employed one Varney to take these laborers and provisions for them in automobiles to the camp which he (Pack) was to establish on the lake; that he established the camp and bought supplies for several days from the Teagles, plaintiff's assignors; that he requested the Teagles to let Varney have what was needed at the camp; that he later repeated this request at the express direction of the defendant Lee; that subsequently in April, 1912, he, at the defendant Lee's direction, wrote the Teagles promising payment; that Lee, during the spring of 1912, endeavored to raise the money necessary to pay the Teagles for the goods purchased from them; that the defendant Lee never at any time repudiated the bill due the Teagles, but, on the contrary, declared that he would pay the same "as soon as he could get the money." The testimony of the Teagles, which was presented in the form of depositions, established the reasonable value of the merchandise in question to be the sum of $953.05, and the delivery of the same to Varney for use at the camp established by Pack and maintained by all of the defendants for the performance of the assessment work hereinbefore referred to. Their testimony, however, showed that but $300 had been paid on account, and that their claim against the defendants had been duly assigned to the plaintiff.

The foregoing résumé of the evidence adduced in support of the plaintiff's case is made in response to the contention that the evidence fails to show that the defendants Pack and Lee were jointly indebted to plaintiff's assignor, and that therefore the plaintiff failed to bring his case within the provisions of section 989 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] That the defendant Pack was liable for the payment of the indebtedness in suit was established beyond controversy by the judgment previously entered against him; and that the defendants Lee and Pack were principals in the transaction out of which the obligation arose was, we think, sufficiently shown, and therefore the obligation in suit was imposed upon both. Consequently the presumption prevails that the obligation was joint. Civil Code, § 1431. The fact that the defendant Lee's connection as a principal in the transaction was not disclosed to plaintiff's assignors will not avail to relieve him of an obligation which was created for and in behalf of him and his codefendant. Dashaway Ass'n v. Rogers, 79 Cal. 211, 21 Pac. 742.

[3] The trial court did not err in its ruling permitting the defendant Pack to testify to conversations with the defendant Lee without first showing that the relation of principal and agent existed between them. The testimony of the defendant Pack contained no suggestion that he was acting as the agent of the defendant Lee in the transaction in suit in any respect save that which may have been implied from the fact that the defendants Toland and Lee were associated with him in the ownership and operation of the placer claims which they had located at Searles Borax Lake. Moreover, the joint obligation having been established, the testimony of Pack concerning the conduct and conversations of Lee in connection with the transaction in suit was rightfully received in evidence. Subdivision 5, § 1870, Code Civ. Proc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Clarence E. Boling was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment and order denying new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

E. A. Williams, E. D. Edwards, and James A. Burns, all of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant of the crime of grand larceny, and an order denying him a new trial upon his demand therefor, made under and by virtue of sections 1191 and 1202 of the Penal Code.

The verdict of the jury, finding the defendant guilty of the offense charged, was rendered on March 25, 1916, and the court on that day made an order, fixing March 28, 1916, as the time for pronouncing sentence. On the last-named day an order was made, further continuing the time for sentence to April 4, 1916, on which day a motion for a new trial was made by the defendant and denied by the court, whereupon the defendant made an application to the court for probation, and the court extended the time for pronouncing judgment until April 20th in order to receive a report from the probation officer. On April 20th at the request of the defendant the court made an order continuing the time for pronouncing judgment until July 19, 1916, on which day the defendant moved the court for a new trial upon the ground that judgment had not been pronounced within the time limited by sections 1191 and 1202 of the Penal Code. Upon the hearing of said motion it appeared that these various extensions of time had resulted in continuing the time for pronouncing judgment of conviction for a period of 116 days after the day on which the verdict of the jury had been returned. The court denied the defendant's motion for a new trial made upon that ground, and proceeded to pronounce the judgment from which this appeal is taken.

We are able to see no escape from the appellant's contention that his motion for a new trial upon the last-named ground should have been granted in view of the terms of sections 1191 and 1202 of the Penal Code, and the construction which the Supreme and appellate courts have placed thereon. Section 1191 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

"After a plea or verdict of guilty, or after a verdict against the defendant on a plea of former conviction or acquittal, or once in jeopardy, the court must appoint a time for pronouncing judgment, which must not be less than two, nor more than five days after the verdict or plea of guilty; provided, however, that the court may extend the time not more than ten days for the purpose of hearing or determining any motion for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment; and provided, further, that the court may extend the time not more than twenty days in any case where the question of probation is considered in accordance with section 1203 of this Code; provided, however, that upon the request of the defendant such time may be further extended not more than 90 days additional. * * *

Section 1202 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

"If no sufficient cause is alleged or appears to the court at the time fixed for pronouncing judgment, as provided in section 1191 of this Code, why judgment should not be pronounced, it must thereupon be rendered; and if not rendered or pronounced within the time so fixed or to which it is continued under the provisions of section 1191 of this Code, then the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial. If the court shall refuse to hear a defendant's motion for a new trial or when made shall neglect to determine such motion within the time fixed for pronouncing judgment, or within the time to which the same is continued under the provisions of section 1191 of this Code then the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial."

In the case of Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 189, 106 Pac. 718, the Supreme Court, in construing the terms of these two sections of the Penal Code, held that the provisions for the extension of time to the extent of 10 days for the purpose of deciding a motion for a new trial, and of 20 days for the purpose of determining the question of probation upon the defendant's application therefor, were not cumulative, and that the latest date to which the court was authorized to extend the time for rendering judgment was a day not more than 25 days after the date of the return of the verdict. This decision of the Supreme Court was rendered prior to the amendment of section 1191 of the Penal Code in the year 1911, by the terms of which amendment the court was authorized to make an additional extension of 90 days at the request of the defendant; but the effect of this amendment cannot be held to have changed the rule already laid down in the Rankin Case; and, while it is strenuously contended by the respondent herein that the language of the Supreme Court in that case declaring the rule was obiter, it nevertheless has been followed by the appellate courts in later cases (People v. Polich, 25 Cal. App. 464, 143 Pac. 1065; People v. Winner, 160 Pac. 689), and that being so, this court feels that if a departure is to be made from the rule laid down in the Rankin Case, such departure should be made by the Supreme Court, and not by this tribunal.

It follows necessarily that the judgment and order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Husband against William A. Hussey. From a judgment for plaintiff and denial of new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robinson, Gillis & Sizer and Robinson & Sizer, all of Oakland, for appellant. Reed, Nusbaumer & Bingaman, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in the sum of $1,000 entered in favor of the plaintiff in an action for the value of 10 shares of the capital stock of a certain corporation which, it was alleged, the defendant for a valuable consideration had agreed to deliver to the plaintiff.

The evidence adduced upon the trial of the case was directed chiefly to the issue raised by the defendant's answer as to whether or not he had agreed to deliver to the plaintiff any number of shares of the corporate stock in controversy in excess of the 10 shares which the plaintiff's complaint alleged that he had received pursuant to his agreement with the defendant.

No point of law is involved in the appeal. It is grounded solely in the contention that the finding of the trial court that the defendant had agreed to deliver 20 and not 10 shares of the stock in question is contrary to the preponderance of the evidence, which, upon that phase of the case, is in pronounced conflict; and we are requested by the appellant to weigh the evidence and consider the credibility of witnesses. This, of course, under the familiar rule, we cannot do.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by George W. McGinn, doing business as G. W. McGinn & Co., against W. S. Pritchard, J. Maud Giles, and another. From a judgment for defendants Giles and another, and against defendant Pritchard, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Williams and John D. Harloe, both of San Francisco, for appellant. H. M. Owens, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants J. Maud Giles and Maurice Rosenthal, sued under the fictitious names of Jane Doe and John Doe, in an action brought to foreclose a lien for street work. The above named defendant J. Maud Giles was the owner of the property to be affected by this lien on the 6th day of December, 1911, and on that day entered into a contract with W. T. Pritchard for the purchase by the latter of said property, by the terms of which said Pritchard went into possession of the same. While so in possession of said property under said contract of purchase, Pritchard entered into a contract with the plaintiff herein for the doing of certain street work in front of said property, which work said plaintiff thereafter did. The defendant Pritchard, however, defaulted in the performance of his contract of purchase and abandoned the same, and the defendant Giles thereafter conveyed the property to Maurice Rosenthal. Upon the completion of the street improvement in front of said property by the plaintiff he filed his claim of lien therefor, and in due course brought this action to foreclose the same. The trial court rendered judgment against said Pritchard for the contract price of said street improvement, but refused to enforce a lien against the property.

The only question raised upon this appeal is as to whether the holder of a contract of purchase of a lot of land can impress the land with a lien for street improvements which shall be binding upon the owner thereof. The case of Santa Cruz Rock Paving Co. v. Lyons, 117 Cal. 212, 48 Pac. 1097, 59 Am. St. Rep. 174, is decisive of this question; and it was there held that it was no more within the constitutional power of the Legislature to authorize the reputed owner of a lot or parcel of land to create a lien thereon against the will of the real owner than it would be to authorize such reputed owner to transfer the title to said land. It has also been frequently held in other jurisdictions that one who is in possession of land under a contract of purchase cannot subject such land to a lien for improvements upon the property or upon the street adjacent thereto, in the absence of proof that the real owner of the premises has by his conduct so far concurred in such improvement as to be estopped to deny the validity of the lien. Johnson v. Soliday, 19 N. D. 463, 126 N. W. 99; Callaway v. Freeman, 29 Ga. 408; Wilkins v. Litchfield, 69 Iowa, 465; Jones on Liens (3d Ed.) § 1247.

The record in this case presents no evidence of such estoppel, and it therefore follows necessarily that the judgment should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Montgomery & Mullen Lumber Company against the Ocean Park Scenic Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff and order denying motion for new trial, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter M. Rheinschild and Valentine & Newby, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Sheldon Borden, George H. Moore, and Richard J. Culver, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant's appeal is from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover an alleged balance due to the plaintiff for lumber sold and delivered to the defendant. It was found by the court that the plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant lumber of the value of $2,875.15, of which sum $2,000 was paid by the defendant. Appellant claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that any lumber was delivered exceeding in value the amount paid. The controversy between the parties relates to the quantity of lumber delivered, and not to the prices charged with respect to the various items.

C. W. Pinkerton, the manager of plaintiff's business, testified to the sale of lumber by plaintiff to the defendant. Certain books were produced in court which he said contained the original charges. From those books a bill of particulars was compiled, which, prior to the trial, was served upon the defendant and which was used in connection with Pinkerton's testimony. He said:

"Our office system is such that, when we send an order to the yards to be loaded for delivery, we have working in the yards men that we call salesmen; they take that order; they load it on the wagon; and, after they get the load loaded on the wagon, they go to the office and make the charge on these books as the load is loaded. Those entries are made up in triplicate. The salesman in making that charge simply itemizes out so many pieces of each kind. The triplicate copy is given to the driver and delivered on the job with the load. Then in the course of business the office force makes the extension in dollars and cents. Although these books appear to have been written with a carbon, they were made at the time the original ticket was made. The original is sent at the end of the month to the customer. These books were kept under my direction, and I know to my own knowledge that these are correct charges."

Upon that statement, the books as a whole and as one exhibit were introduced in evidence. They are not contained in the record on appeal. The bill of particulars was by stipulation introduced into the bill of exceptions in lieu of setting out a copy of the books, and Pinkerton testified that the original bill of particulars corresponds with the charges as contained in the books, "so far as feet, etc., are concerned."

[1] The defendant objected to the bill of particulars when it was offered in evidence, and now urges that its admission was error. If the books themselves were admissible, we think that the defendant could not be prejudiced by the use which the court made of the bill of particulars. Its admission and use were distinctly stated by the court to be for purposes of convenience and the saving of time; the books being accepted as the original evidence.

[2] The only question then, as to this matter relates to appellant's contention that no sufficient foundation was laid for the admission of the books. Counsel for appellant point out that the men who actually made the entries in the books did not themselves testify to the correctness of the items entered by them. This was not necessary in order to make a prima facie showing, since Pinkerton testified that the books were kept under his direction and were correct. The record thus made substantially conforms to the requirements of the rule limiting the admission of books in evidence, as stated in Chan Kin Sing v. Gordon, 171 Cal. 28, 151 Pac. 657, as follows:

"In order to lay the foundation for the admission of such evidence, it must be shown that the books in question are books of account kept in the regular course of the business; that the business is of a character in which it is proper or customary to keep such books; that the entries were either original entries or the first permanent entries of the transactions; that they were made at the time, or within reasonable proximity to the time, of the respective transactions; and that the person making them had personal knowledge of the transactions, or obtained such knowledge from a report regularly made to him by some other person employed in the business whose duty it was to make the same in the regular course of business."

It is insisted that the court erred in admitting the testimony above stated of the witness Pinkerton as to the correctness of the accounts, of which accounts appellant says that Pinkerton had no personal knowledge. Chandler v. Robinett, 21 Cal. App.

333, 337, 131 Pac. 891, is cited in support of this objection. But in that case it appeared that the witness who testified that the book of account was "a true and correct account of the transaction" was a bookkeeper who had himself made the entries without having personal knowledge of the transactions, and the entry in the book itself was so indefinite and uncertain that it was held to be inadmissible as evidence of the fact sought to be proved. Neither was it shown that the entry had been made at a time contemporaneous with the transaction to which it was supposed to relate. We think that the testimony of Pinkerton to which this objection is urged was properly admitted.

[3] It is not disputed that according to these books the amount of lumber furnished was the full amount claimed by the plaintiff. Pinkerton further testified as follows concerning the lumber:

"It was delivered on the Fraser Pier at Ocean Park. It was the scene of the Ocean Park Scenic Railway. The lumber was used for the building of an extension on the Ocean Park Scenic Railway. I was on the Fraser Pier every day during that period, and saw lumber being delivered and used."

After a controversy had arisen over plaintiff's demands on this account, Pinkerton and another witness checked up the lumber piece by piece that was used in the extension of the road and found a total of a little over 120,000 feet, without making any allowance for waste. The plaintiff claims to have actually delivered about 146,000 feet. There is testimony that the wastage in the use of lumber for a structure of that kind would reasonably be from 20 to 25 per cent. Twenty per cent. would be sufficient to cover the discrepancy; and, although other witnesses testified that the wastage need not be more than 10 per cent., we must assume this controverted question in favor of the findings of the court. Appellant says there is no pretense that the 120,000 feet checked was identified as lumber furnished by the plaintiff. We find, however, in the testimony of Paul D. Hows, who superintended the building of the extension of the railway, a statement that he ordered a majority of the lumber that went into the road, and that he does not recall ordering any lumber from any other company except the plaintiff for use in the extension.

There are several other points wherein it is claimed that the court erred in the admission of testimony. Although counsel neglected to refer us to the pages of the transcript which we were expected to examine, we have given the matters some attention and are satisfied that the rulings of the court with reference thereto were substantially correct.

[4] Finally, it is urged that the court should have granted a new trial because of surprise to the appellant in the testimony of one of plaintiff's witnesses, and on account of newly discovered evidence which it is claimed would have enabled the defendant to overcome said surprising testimony. The unexpected element was that according to the witness Lain some of the lumber furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant was not used in the railroad extension, but was transferred to another company to replace lumber which the defendant had previously borrowed from that company for use in some of defendant's work. The testimony thus produced was merely incidental to that part of the evidence whereby the plaintiff was attempting to show why the amount of lumber found in the structure as built was less than the amount of lumber alleged to have been delivered. The court had before it other evidence tending to show that the percentage of waste ordinarily and reasonably occurring was sufficient to account for that difference. It was therefore a matter within the discretion of the court to determine whether or not the new evidence, which defendant claims that it could produce if allowed a second trial of the case, would be likely to lead to a different determination of the main issue.

"A motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is properly denied where in the opinion of the trial court it is not probable that the additional evidence would have produced a different result." Atkinson v. Western Development Syndicate, 170 Cal. 511, 150 Pac. 363.

PEOPLE v. BAENDER. (Cr. No. 642.) (District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 16, 1916. Rehearing denied by Supreme Court Jan. 11, 1917.) Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge. C. L. Baender was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing denied by Supreme Court. See Burke v. Maze, 10 Cal. App. 206, 101 Pac. 438, 440. C. L. Baender, of Oakland, in pro per. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case was charged by an information filed in the superior court of the county of Alameda with the crime of grand larceny. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment in the state prison, and now appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. The only point presented in support of the appeal involves the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict and support the judgment; and in that behalf it is insisted (1) that there is a variance between the allegations as to the ownership of the subject-matter of the larceny and the proof proffered in their support; and (2) that the verdict was had and rests solely upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. A thorough examination of the record has satisfied us that there is no merit in either phase of the point above stated, and that the evidence upon the whole case amply supports the verdict and judgment. The judgment and order denying the defendant a new trial are affirmed.
